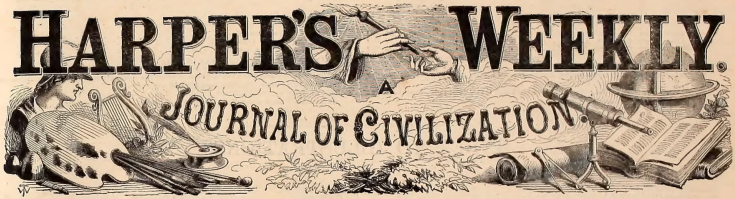
THE THIRD VOLUME

OF



THE YEAR 1859.

NEW YORK: HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE.

THE PAST AND THE FUTURE.

THE FIRST NUMBER of the Fourth Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY will appear on the 4th JANUARY, 1860. Last year over 4,500,000 Numbers of HARPER'S WEEKLY were sold, nearly half of which have been bound for reference. In commencing the New Volume, the Proprietors desire to state that the popularity which HARPER'S WEEKLY has attained will enable them to render it still more valuable in the future.

It has been their aim to render HARPER'S WEEKLY, in the first place, and before any thing else, A FIRST-CLASS NEWSPAPER—a Pictorial History of Current Events, equal to the daily press in fullness of description, and superior to the daily press as combining illustrations with text. How far they have attained their aim, the Three Volumes now published will show. The Illustrations in the Third Volume will bear evidence to the fidelity with which every important event of the past year has been related and illustrated in the pages of HARPER'S WEEKLY. They would refer especially, in this connection, to the Indian War, the Great Eastern Steamship, the HARPER'S Ferry Outbreak, the Utah Expedition, the Paraguay Expedition, China, etc. etc. The value of the paper can be best realized by supposing that it did not exist, and by trying to conceive how little people would really know of passing events if they had to rely on written descriptions alone. In this respect the arrangements for the coming year are more complete than they have been heretofore. HARPER'S WEEKLY has regular Artist Correspondents in almost every quarter of the globe, and is sure of promptly obtaining sketches of every leading event in which our countrymen are concerned. It commands the pencil of the first Artists at home; and, as in the case of the late outbreak at Harper's Ferry, can render its readers eyewitnesses of exciting scenes whereever they occur. It will, moreover, in order to present its readers with a complete illustrated history of our age, continue to engrave on its pages the best and most generally interesting pictures from foreign illustrated journals, just as the daily papers transfer to their columns the articles in foreign newspapers. In a word, the Subscriber to HARPER'S WEEKLY may rely on finding in its pages next year an accurate, well-drawn, well-engraved, and well-printed picture of every memorable event which occurs, and a portrait of every man who attracts the general attention of the people of this country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue, as heretofore, to publish the best Tales that are written by native and foreign Authors. It has already published A Tale of Two Cities, by CHARLES DICKENS (with Original Illustrations drawn for HARPER'S WEEKLY); What will he do with It? by SIR E. LYTTON BULWER; The Dead Secret, by WILKIE COLLINS; Lois the Witch, by MRS. GASKELL; A Good Fight, by CHARLES READE. It is now publishing Trespass, by GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, and The Woman in White, by WILKIE COLLINS. On, or before the conclusion of these Tales, others of equal merit will be commenced, it being the intention of the Publishers to secure every work of undoubted excellence that is written here or abroad. It is hardly necessary to add that the foreign Serials which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY are purchased from their Authors by the Proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY, who, in many instances, give for a mere right of priority what amounts to a handsome copyright to the Author.

In addition to Serials, each Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will contain a short, complete Tale by a native or foreign Author. In respect to these Tales, as with the Serials, the Publishers will publish the best that they can obtain, without regarding the origin. They are always ready to give the highest price for Original Matter; but they will not pass over a first-class Tale because it is foreign, in order to print an inferior one which happens to have been written at home.

The other departments of HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue to receive careful attention at the hands of the Publishers. They will endeavor to combine instruction with amusement, and grave current with light commentary on the affairs of the day. HARPER'S WEEKLY is not designed to be, nor will it ever become, the organ of any party in politics, religion, or letters; but it will not ignore passing events, nor will it shrink from expressing its sentiments whenever, in the opinion of its Conductors, the interests of religion, truth, or the country are jeopardied.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 105.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

I WISH YOU A HAPPY NEW YEAR,
Gentlemen one and all,
And you, most charming ladies,
Who grace this splendid hall.
The wind is free and biting cold,
But the fire is very near;
I watch its glare through the window-pane—
So I wish you a Happy New Year.

Excuse me if my nose is blue,
If my garments are not whole;
Your coats, I see, are of double cloth,
Your boots are a double sole.
It is gay and glorious wine you drink,
I can see it sparkle from here,
As I stand on the pavement, cold and wet,
And wish you a Happy New Year.

Oh! ladies, bright and beautiful,
I came but an hour ago
From a lonely room, in a lonely street,
That your footsteps never know.
I saw a woman whose blood I see
Stitched in your robes of silk—
How she would have relished a glass of wine
Instead of her bread and milk!

The times are very, very hard,
And labor very low—
In yonder garret there lies a man
Whose head is tinged with snow:
The landlord says he must die to-day,
He looks so gaunt and grim;
He says he owes for a quarter's rent—
It is very bad for him.

Fair lady, you with the golden hair,
Come gaze at this thin-lipped child;
See how she shivers and shrinks along,
And looks so wan and wild.
Did you notice, lady bright and fair,
That she had an eye like you?
It was dim and sad with hunger and cold,
But a perfectly heavenly blue.

It was but a few short minutes ago,
As I came through yonder lane,
That I met a pale and trembling girl,
Whose face was marked with pain.
She clutched her fingers long and thin,
And raised her tearless eye
To the tempting loaves in a baker's shop,
And—hurried swiftly by!

I knew that pale and tearless girl
When she was enshrined, like you,
The jewel of a peerless home,
The well beloved and true.
Change comes, my gentle lady fair,
Change to the loved and dear;
But change may never come to you—
So I wish you a Happy New Year.

Ah me! when I was a little boy,
That was a happy time;
The New Year was a New Year then,
My life a pleasant rhyme.
But the time has passed and brought a change,
A change for sorrow and woe;
But I will not speak of that happier time,
'Tis so very long ago.

And now, my gentle ladies all,
May you never know want or sin—
I see that the toes are out of my boots,
And the snow-water rushes in.
So I bid you all a gay good-by,
Though bread is very dear;
Ladies and gentlemen, fair and good,
I wish you a Happy New Year.

"I WISH YOU A HAPPY NEW YEAR."

EVEN IN THE ELEVENTH HOUR.

[The event which is commemorated in the following three-fold plaint at Chilicothe, Ala. Indictment woman was offered money by a man whom she knew; she refused it with scorn, bidding him "take it to his sister." Roused to fury by the imputation, the man stabbed her and fled. As she lay dying on the floor one of her unfortunate companions raised her head, with the entreaty, "Pray, Mary, pray; you are dying!" The dying woman recovered strength enough to utter an audible prayer for her child and her husband, and then gave up her spirit.]

Sun had fallen—fallen very low,
She was covered with paint and sin;
She flaunted her sparkle with rouge and gin,
To cover the stain within.
Cast to the world, and lost to herself,
With the curse of the Lord upon her,
The wreck of what was a womanly heart,
The wreck of a womanly home.

God and herself alone could know
The cause of her desperate fall;
Man alone can never be judge,
When God alone knows all:
But oh! this wreck of a womanly soul,
However deep it may sink,
Is the last to offer the deadly cup
That has pure of heart may drink.

She flaunted her silks in the gaslight's glare,
And glittered in jewels and gold,
While the sound and the sight was a sneering look
To convict the shame she sold:
There was music, wine, and the scoffing jest
That seemed to be born to say—
"Should you come, O Death! to this reckless group!
Which would you bear away?"

He had offered her gold in a sullen tone,
She had put it away in scorn;
They would not, in unwomanly shame,
Had still a heart to be torn.
He had torn it with a shameless word,
That cut like a sharp knife;
He had added a curse, like another stone,
To crush her lifted life.

She had bidden him take his dross of gold
To the light of the morning sun,
Whatever her shame in life might be,
Her shame with him was done:
He had a stoter, young and fair,
Let him give to her—he!
Perhaps it would keep a guiltless step
From the path where she would err.

Quick and short were the words of strife
That rose o'er the music's fret,
And quick as light was the flashing steel
Dimmed with her heart's warm blood.
Where now is the gay and the mocking laugh?
And where is the revelry's tune,
Since Death has stepped in the midst of the crowd
And silently claims his own?

There are pallid lips and staring eyes
To gaze on the bubbling gore
That is welling up from a woman's heart
Who is dying at the door.
She is dying, and in sighs and sobs,
In the blaze of the gaudy light,
And the jeweled hats with the dabbled blood
On her bosom warm and white.

There is one alone of that wanton crowd
As gay and as loud as she,
Who has raised the dying woman's head,
And is bathing her face with tears;
She is whispering to her closing ears,
And watching her parting eye.
"Pray, darling, pray! I have heard them say
In a few short minutes you die."

The words have arrested the flying word—
The soul shall it answer hear?
And the dimming eye grows bright again,
And the hands are clasped in prayer:
To pray aloud in a choking voice!
But never a prayer she said
For her lost, degraded, sinful self,
Dying in shivering dread:

She is praying aloud for the child she has left
For the one who was dead to her:
The prayer is babbling up with her blood,
And going out with her life.
Christian people, see!
Who have light with the Lord above,
Think of the sin and the shame
Who prayed for her earthly love!

SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1859.

PROTECTION TO UNITED STATES CITIZENS ABROAD.

THE most sarcastic thing that ever was said of the United States was a remark of Charles Dickens, in his "Child's History of England," to the effect that this country was "honorably remarkable for protecting its citizens wherever they went. There were many things in the "American Notes" that were snobbish and unfair. There were many unkind and ungenerous insinuations in "Martin Chuzzlewit." But neither Charles Dickens nor any one else ever uttered so cutting and cruel a sarcasm about the United States as the passage we have quoted from his "Child's History." Praising a miser for his liberality, extolling a rake for his virtue, commending a pirate for his regard for law, eulogizing a rowdy for his love for order—would be faint parallels to the biting sneer conveyed in these few words.

For it is well known that, in many parts of the world, American citizens have been or are still compelled to feign to be Englishmen in order to insure safety for their lives and property. Until very recently our countrymen in China were constantly compelled to place themselves under the protection of the British authorities whenever internal troubles interfered with the routine of Chinese affairs. Throughout Mexico, Central and South America, citizens of the United States have been constantly in the habit of claiming to be Englishmen, whenever the mob assailed them, or threatened them; knowing well how utterly the name of United States citizen was derided, and how much that of subject of the Queen of England was respected. Every one remembers the case of a poor countryman of ours who was seized and condemned to death some years since by the Spanish Americans, and who was rescued from judicial murder only by the timely humanity of the British Consul. That official, in spite of the patriotic scruples of our countryman, drove the Union Jack round him as he was led to the place of execution, and defied the Spaniards to shoot him through that shield. They knew better; and he was saved.

These considerations recur to the mind with great force as one reads of the frightful oppressions practiced on United States citizens in Mexico. Not a mail arrives from thence but we learn of some American being imprisoned or robbed or assassinated under circumstances of barbarity which have that miserable country under their control. Now it is a prosperous merchant who is forced to pay half his property in order to save his neck; now a peaceable citizen of the United States is forced into the ranks of the Mexican army; now a poor fellow who is seized in mid-ocean protect or other and kept in a Mexican dungeon for months. These things occur weekly, almost daily, in Mexico, and no practical notice is taken of them by this Government and by that. We have only the melancholy visions of how much more or Maine and Texas, should be expected to perform that office.

We have thought it well, as we said above, that these obviously erroneous views should see the light in order that Mr. Everett, and the other partisans of the Mount Vernon speculation, should enjoy an opportunity of refuting them, and overwhelming their authors. For our part, we should gladly see Mount Vernon out of the hands of its present owner and in possession of the public. A couple of hundred thousand dollars would be a very small tribute to the memory of Washington; though, it is true, the memory of Hamilton, which concerns us more closely, remains yet unhonored.

THE LOUNGER.

THE PRESENT SEASON.

At a time when we must all give presents, what shall we give? What thousands of perplexed people wishing to be generous are walking up and down all the chief streets in all the chief cities of this continent, wondering what on earth they shall do. It is not very difficult to "do" for the children. A well fashioned jewelry case, gifts for them, and Christmas and New Year's week is a time slipped from Fairy land.

But what shall Brown give Jones and Robinson? Above all, what shall Jones give Mrs. Brown? Rings are a nice present, but Mrs. Brown is pretty very bald and unmitigated in deliberately turning a few dollars into jewelry and giving it to a friend. It is too much like giving a man a check for cash. Somehow it smells of bribery. If Mr. Jones sends Mrs. Brown a diamond necklace, for Brown's sake can she ever feel quite free to say and do precisely as the wishes and thinks about Mr. Jones?

Besides, a gift ought to be a personal present—and even individual about it. When Lucy works Harry a purse or a pair of slippers, there is something of her own; but when Harry retorts with a Cashmere shawl or an opal pin, he dodges the whole thing. Anybody with the means can at a thousand dollars to spare can buy a Cashmere shawl.

And yet, real affection changes the dead lustre of precious stones into flashes of life and love, so that, perhaps, upon consideration of all the facts and circumstances, a man may be permitted to present a woman with jewelry. The Lounger, however, please look upon that opal pin as a pretty hint of the gleaming, flickering beauty of the modesty which holds your fair fingers: and upon that diamond as the pure, steady light of his love; upon the Cashmere shawl as a token of his sheltering and adorning sympathy, and upon those flowers as speech of which the fragrance is eloquence.

A good deal may be done in that way. Perhaps in the point of all this Mount Vernon talk you can receive the pretty offerings of the pretty men without committing themselves. Let them at least summon courage and try.

MOUNT VERNON.

The Mount Vernon fever is unabated. It rages more violently on every side. Tremendous festivals—fairs—concerts—theatrical matinées—orations—stay-at-home-balls—private theatricals—conversation—the whole popular machinery in motion, the broadest ladies in the land waving the flag frank, and it will go hard but vast sums of money will be cast at the cohorts feet of Mr. John A. Washington—whose celebrity will be carried to his country's annals.

Of course all sensible and shrewd men will agree with Mr. Everett that Mr. Washington is not to be blamed for doing what every body else in the country does—that is, making the most of his case. Why should we all turn round upon one man—and in a spot one—and shout "Humbug!" Now, you Sir, are expected to be particularly patriotic, and give to your country the home of its greatest citizen."

"Diddle-de-dee!" retorts Mr. John A. Washington. "You, Sir, merchant in Park Place or Broadway, are expected to be especially Christian, and give your goods to those who really need them."

Probably the Christian merchant will not think a preliminary to his giving the goods, approved editorial puffs at eight dollars a column will be out. It is the Christianity, so the Patriotism.

A great country, reaching with enterprise and riches, insisting always that it is every man's duty to get thirty-six inches in the yard, is not a very impressive object when it comes to praising in a man for a domain which it professes to consider priceless. The truth is, it is easy enough to arrange the matter. Let Mr. Washington sell to John A. Washington, out of its profound reverence for his ancestor, a half million of dollars. Then let Mr. J. A. Washington, from pure patriotism, present Mount Vernon to his dear country.

This has been set forth in the first Mount Vernon Paper." But the distinct question that remains for every American citizen to ponder is this: If it be shabby in Mr. Washington to ask three hundred thousand dollars for Mount Vernon, what is it in twenty millions of people if they do not stoop to desperately to raise the money for such an object?

A LECTURE-BUREAU.

Nor a chest of drawers in which to stow lectures, but an office to regulate lecture engagements and transact the multitudinous correspondence of the Lyceum.

It must come to that at last. It has even been proposed; and might work somewhat in this way:

The lecturers who are most universally sought might say to all their correspondents: "We have given Mr. Richard Roe authority to arrange our engagements for this season." They have previously furnished Mr. Roe, we will suppose, with a memorandum stating what lectures they have—how far from home they will go—how often in the week they will lecture—how much they expect to be paid—what times they must be able to return —and whatever other items may be necessary. Upon that basis Mr. Roe corresponds with all the Lyceums in the land, and makes a list which he submits to the lecturer, who then finds his enormous and perplexing correspondence entirely annihilated, for he can have a printed form to return to every Lyceum that writes to him, referring it to Mr. Roe.

This can be done, evidently, only by consent and co-operation of the leading lecturers. It is a very mechanical arrangement, and yet it need not disturb the agreeable personal relations which lecturers now enjoy in a sufficiently satisfactory degree. The object of the previous correspondence is merely to secure the lecturer: and a lecturer can do whether that is done directly with him or with his agent.

Under what conditions such an agency will be arranged it is not easy to say: but the Lyceum which has a lecturer in the field every season, or intends so rapidly, that something of the kind is becoming inevitable.

Let any member of a lecture committee, who reads this paragraph, only fancy what a luxury it would be to be saved having some dozen or a dozen letters addressed to the Reverend ——, well, anybody you choose.

AN ENGLISH LORD UPON AMERICA.

Some years since an amiable English gentleman, known as Lord Mahon, visited this part of the United States. He was a mild, bland young man, and left a favorable impression upon the country in which he mingled. Returning to his native land he was conspicuous upon benevolent occasions—filled a seat in the Liberal Ministry—read well-meaning essays upon Pepe's poetry to Mesdames Tussaud—became master of Carlyle by the death of his father—was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland—travelled in the East, and published his "Diary"—several days' sojourn among the Royal Literary and Philosophical Society read a printed paper which gives a favorable American report of it some extemporaneous remarks upon the present aspect of this country.

In a few months he states that his admiration of our public proceedings is not increased by what has happened since his visit. Still he is not despondent in anticipations of our future are not very sanguine.

A mild gentleman, like the Earl of Carlisle, unexceptionable in every aspect of manners and morals, gives a somewhat similar account. He has a mere fact of his amiable goodness. And yet there are probably very few sagacious observers in this country who do not think that the two men are no promising for us at this moment. For the phenomenon of a people who are conscious of no moral development, and probably our moral education was never more actively progressing than it is now. It is not easy with strangers to have a chance that they can not understand the relative force of symptoms.

What, for instance, would the Earl of Carlisle have said if he had been followed by an American who had studied the Hall Lecture? Would philosophical Society that the Crimean and Indian wars had paralyzed the prestige of arms and developed the blunders of her military system—that the most careful statistics showed the condition of the laboring classes in the British Isles so deplorable—that Mr. Bright's position and the importance attached to it, were symptoms of the paralysis of the popular sentiment for essential reforms?

The Earl of Carlisle would justly have replied that recent events were not relevant. But might the statement not have helped him to see how difficult it is to acquire justly dignity of state relations since he unquestionably would have replied to the American that the facts he mentioned were more relevant than those which he himself stated? Is it so?

That is precisely the answer made to his Lordship by the mind of every reflecting man who reads his Lordship's misgivings about America.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"NEW ORLEANS, December, 1858.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—Read the following from the Picayune! Provincials with us sometimes this winter. You see what a terrible bridge a bridge of boats makes! It is forming them what the metropolitan pronunciation of bridge is. We have in here every thing but Yankees and bounty to Frenchmen.

PROVINCIAL."

"The name Frenchmen is probably made up of French, and Yankee, and means (grammatically, mon: little boss. The emphasis falls upon the child's pride. Yes—Colonial. "Le Petit Caporal" will find this confirmed in Coleridge's translation of Schiller's drama The Piccolomini, in which the whole tone of the work likewise requires the emphasis upon him.

—RALPH ROWLAND, Newark, N. J., wishes to be supplied with the first twenty-one numbers of HARPER'S WEEKLY, if they can be procured readily. Back numbers can be supplied from the beginning at five cents each. Thanks for his good wishes.

"December, 1858.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—Will you, through the columns of your Weekly, explain why a cup of water remains in a tilted tea-table in a vertical position, instead of falling forward?

AN INQUIRER.

—Did an INQUIRER ever hear of the famous problem proposed to the Academy in Paris, and long debated by the members—"Why a living fish put into a vessel of water fall to the brim would not make it overflow?" It is probably for the same reason that the water in the cup does not flower. If AN INQUIRER has never heard the answer, the Lounger will be very happy to tell it.

—JAMES FRESHMAN, of Boston, having noticed the question of James Oldschool about Female Hogs, is of opinion that Mr. O. has never taken the "metropolitan cars, in the afternoon between the hours of four and seven, and witnessed the rush made toward the "little dears" to obtain a seat after they are occupied."

"The following dialogue happened in one of these cars a few days since, and may be consilatory to the wounded feelings of Mr. O.:

"'Now, I do declare, Clara, there is not a single seat unoccupied!'

"'Never mind, Mary, go in; some gentleman will undoubtedly give up his to us.'

"Thereupon the train enter, each with tawdry yards more or less embellishing their way to the rear of the car, anxiously looking to find some gentleman with whom they were to be acquainted, who would be ready rise and at least offer his seat. Failing in this, they commence exercising in a sufficiently audible voice to enable all as the car to hear.

"'Now, Clara, I wish he had we should have to stand all the way out from town? I am so dreadful tired. I have been up and down Washington Street at least a dozen times this afternoon, and am completely worn out.'

"'Yes, Mary, how I should just on mine, or at least edge some plan that ladies can be seated.'

"The conversation is kept up in the same strain, who apparently has been on his feet since early morn, Mrs. Meadows, who will accept you are so kind as come to it;' whereupon Miss Clara bounces down into the seat, and with a proud leer irons in its utmost dimensions, not even condescending to thank the unlucky wight whom heart was too tender to permit a lady to stand while he has the standing all the afternoon for pleasure.

"Another kind old gent on the other side takes similar compassion on the two.

"NOS.' says MR. JAMES FRESHMAN, 'if Mr. O. has been so fortunate as not to live in a city where practically the rule is, Ladies first and yourself afterward, a week or two's sojourn in this neighborhood will soon convince him to as many of his so-styled "Female Hogs" as the inclination may prompt, and in much more vexatious kind than he met at Springfield.'

The Lounger certainly can not be accused of intolerability to ladies. He may himself have the not exhorted ladies who are traveling to remember that, although politeness requires every man to be a gentleman, it is just as incumbent upon a lady to be a lady. He does not agree with JAMES FRESHMAN, that if he "practiced" for any year or two in a community where the rule is not "Ladies first and yourself afterward," he would be subjected to very unfortunate for any gentleman to be thrown into the society of women who were not ladies. And does any lady ever take a gentleman's seat without thanking him for it?

—DARBY, PA., replying to the Lounger's note to him in regard to printing as original what some one else had written, says:

"I have had but little connection with editors, but I very much fear that yours editorial brethren are such in which that one was sents to you; and hence I trust you will believe that I had no idea of dishonesty in doing as I did."

The Lounger was very far from charging deliberate dishonesty upon his correspondent. He stated that he could not print what was sent to him as original, and that DARBY, upon reflection, would doubtless agree with him.

—W. G. (who gives his name), writing from Greenville, Mississippi, says, that upon desiring with a large firm,

"I was introduced to one of the clerks in the house to have 'a drink,' and I soon found it was a standing custom to have a green to do its drinking, and then, while making his purchases, to keep the town treat. Custom merely make this observation, thinking it may be interesting to many of your readers. I can vouch for the correctness."

Such attentions are not altogether unknown in New York, although it is not always the same clerk who offers every kind of civility. The secret history of the dry-goods trade in New York would be a curious revelation.

The Lounger regrets that his constant engagements on the eastern side of the Mississippi prevent the accepting of the following invitation which he received some time since:

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, Friday, Dec. 24, 1858.

The week which ends this day (to-morrow being Christmas) has been a dull one in commercial and financial circles. People generally seem disinclined to enter into new engagements, merchants, because they want to see how the spring trade will open, men of money, because they prefer to await the event of the new year. Money is unchanged in value: loans are made on call at 6, and the best endorsed paper is done at the same rate. It has been true 90 days to run: longer paper, some grade at 6.7. Exchange is 9 to 9½ per cent for sight, 9½ to 10 for bankers' sterling, and 9.12½ @ 9.15 for francs.

Stocks have been dull throughout the week, and the Western Railroad shares—chiefly Illinois Central, Galena, and Rock Island—are lower. Until the earnings increase, a decline in the value of these shares must be expected.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Friday, Dec. 24, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets were unusually quiet the week for the leading items of the catalogue. Receipts, however, were light, and receivers manifested a disposition to favor sellers. Quotations were substantially unchanged —Cotton, Coffee, Molasses, Sugars, and Rice, were the only exceptions to the rule. The receipts of Flour and Provisions were extensive, and Hog Products favor sellers —Fish, Hay, Hemp, Naval Stores, and Wool were moderately dealt in.... Tobacco and Wool were rather more active.... Prices of the latter are in the advance.... The Dry Goods trade has been devoid of salient features, and will likely continue so for a few days. We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, Friday, Dec. 24, 1858.

The week which ends this day (to-morrow being Christmas) has been a dull one in commercial and financial circles. People generally seem disinclined to enter into new engagements, merchants, because they want to see how the spring trade will open, men of money, because they prefer to await the event of the new year. Money is unchanged in value: loans are made on call at 6, and the best endorsed paper is done at the same rate. It has been true 90 days to run: longer paper, some grade at 6.7. Exchange is 9 to 9½ per cent for sight, 9½ to 10 for bankers' sterling, and 9.12½ @ 9.15 for francs.

Stocks have been dull throughout the week, and the Western Railroad shares—chiefly Illinois Central, Galena, and Rock Island—are lower. Until the earnings increase, a decline in the value of these shares must be expected.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Friday, Dec. 24, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets were unusually quiet the week for the leading items of the catalogue. Receipts, however, were light, and receivers manifested a disposition to favor sellers. Quotations were substantially unchanged —Cotton, Coffee, Molasses, Sugars, and Rice, were the only exceptions to the rule. The receipts of Flour and Provisions were extensive, and Hog Products favor sellers —Fish, Hay, Hemp, Naval Stores, and Wool were moderately dealt in.... Tobacco and Wool were rather more active.... Prices of the latter are in the advance.... The Dry Goods trade has been devoid of salient features, and will likely continue so for a few days. We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

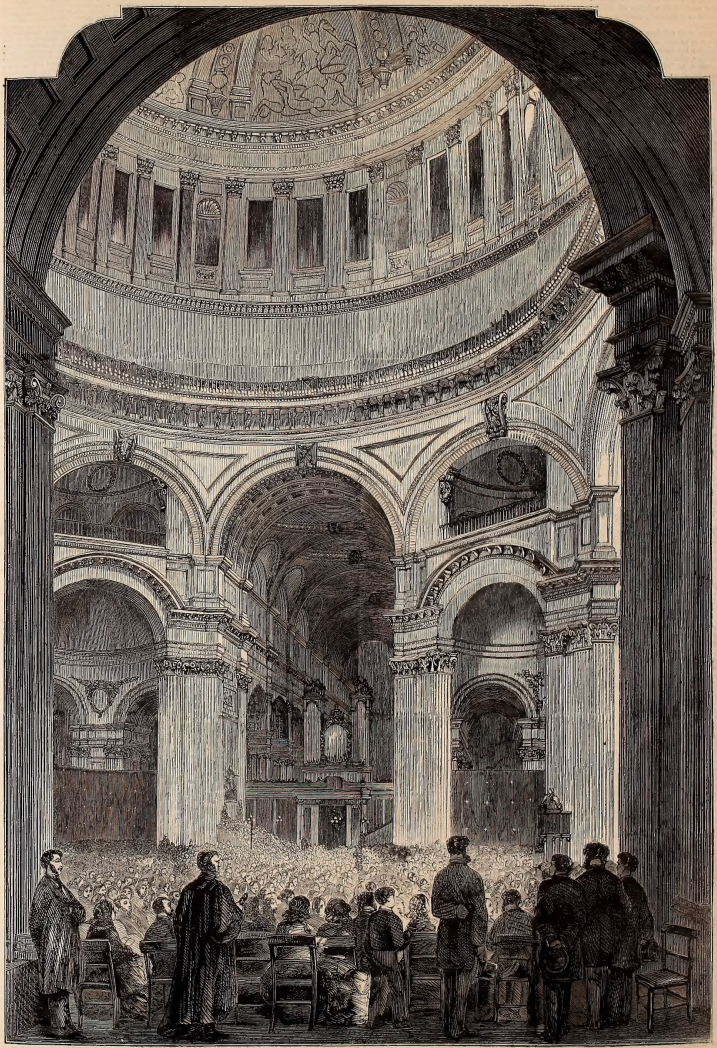
DIVINE SERVICE BEING HELD IN THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC AT NEW YORK ON SUNDAY EVENINGS.



DIVINE SERVICE BEING PERFORMED IN ST. PAUL'S, LONDON, ENGLAND, FOR THE FIRST TIME.

PREACHING IN THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, AND IN ST. PAUL'S, LONDON.

We give this week two illustrations—one the most remarkable religious assembly perhaps ever convened in America; the other, a similar scene in England.

The great religious movement of the year 1858 is not to be overlooked by the man of the world. Religion has been and will be the subject of civilization, and at this moment is the mightiest instrument in lifting the lands of barbarism with knowledge and social happiness.

This moral awakening that has prevailed out west and under cities during the past year, has attracted the attention of thoughtful men in all parts of the world.

A few weeks ago it was proposed by some benevolent gentlemen in this city to open the Academy of Music for religious worship. The notice was given on the corner of Irving Place and Fourteenth Street, near Union Square, in the hearing of a solution of New York. It is the most spacious and magnificent building in the United States, seating more than four thousand people, and in the evolutions is not excelled by the most splendid operahouses in the Old World.

To take a lease of such a building was a bold conception. Would the people come to hear preaching in a theatre? Would they come in sufficient numbers to fill the house? How would the funds be raised to defray the enormous expenses of such an undertaking? But, more than all, would the pastors of the city, in addition to their own services, give their parishioners to sustain these meetings every Sunday night? It was a great experiment. The house was hired for eight nights. It was opened on the evening of November 21, 1858, in the midst of a tremendous storm of rain, hail, and snow. In spite of the weather an audience of three or four thousand people were in the Academy before the hour for service began. The Rev. James W. Alexander, D.D., of the Old School Presbyterian Church, preached the sermon. It was powerful and persuasive, and made a deep impression. The next Sabbath evening it stormed again, and as large an audience assembled, when the Rev. William Adams, D.D., of the New School Presbyterian Church, preached a graphic and startling sermon, which was heard with the deepest interest. Again, on the third Sabbath, the weather was unfavorable, but not so bad as before, and the vast building was thronged in every seat, passage, aisle, and corridor; and thousands made unsuccessful efforts to get in. The Bethune, of the Reformed Dutch Church, preached a sermon of great eloquence and power. On the 12th of December the Rev. Dr. Durbin, of the Methodist Church, delivered a stirring and powerful discourse to an immense audience. On the 19th, Bev. Dr. Hague, of the Baptist Church, occupied the temporary pulpit. The same crowding assemblies filled the building each successive Sunday, and will continue to do so.

Among the events we noticed a great many of the class for whom the idea was specially designed. One gentleman rear us, of reasonably intelligent appearance, who evidently was suffering experience in church-going to know that they sang hymns, for he asked an explanation of the printed hymns in the most wise style; and was intensely astonished at the performance when the singing came sing, with one voice, a grand old psalm. The congregational music, led by a precentor on the platform, is one of the features of the meetings of the grand feature.

In this immense crowd, filling the sweeping circles of the great hall, the mind of one who stands on the stage, and looks up to the tiers on tiers of heads, can not fail to turn rapidly from one class from the thousands who hang on the lips of the speaker who dispenses the word of life, to the more remote ages when, in such theatres, crowds gathered even so to look on the pains and passions of martyrs in the arena—but when, instead of a spell from the ground to the insane mobs of fair women and blood-thirsty men that gazed on their sufferings.

The success of the experiment has been abundant. It can not fail to be vast good. It may be why should it not be?—the first step in a great moral and religious movement in which all the Presbyterian and Methodists and Baptists and Congregationalists can then unite in preaching the truth, what is to be held hereafter a matter of union among Christians of all denominations in the great work in which all are engaged? We have seen things from these Academy of Music meetings; and we know no subject of illustration for our columns more worthy of preservation, than the scene of the great movements of the age.

It is not, perhaps, to be wondered at that a religious demonstration of this vast character should meet with more or less opposition from men of the world; and hence the circulation of those statements that the collections taken up are more than the expenses, and that the meetings are money-making. This is wholly erroneous. The collection has in no instance paid the evening's expenses, and it has frequently been less than one half of the cost. The large deficiency is made up from the private purses of the gentlemen of these Christian philanthropists; and it is the intention of those gentlemen to keep the doors open for preaching every Sunday evening this winter.

The peculiarity of the corresponding religious service at St. Paul's, in London, is, however, that that edifice has for two centuries been the greatest church in England, divine service had for ages been performed there until the occasion which we now illustrate. Service has from time to time—with some regularity, we believe, lately—been performed in the choir: it has been described as "a little faint tinkling going on at the extremity of a remote corner of the building, or coming from a subterranean vault." Of course no one ever attended. People went to St. Paul's when Nelson and Wellington were buried; and strangers went to see it as one of the great wonders of London. During the Great Exhibition, vespers were occasionally rung there. But as a "house of God" St. Paul's has never been physically used during many ages of past mouth. A few weeks ago some prominent members of the Church of England proposed, as a novelty, to turn to good account the grand cathedrals of the British metropolis, and St. Paul's was selected as the site of the first experiment. It was perfectly successful. In the language of a reporter who was present,

"Not half the strong round the western entrance of the church-yard could be admitted. By six o'clock the upper part of Ludgate Hill was blocked up in a mass of disappointed expectants; for the cathedral was even then full to the utmost extent the energy of the police could by any would accommodate. According to a very ministerial regulation, the doors were not opened till the seats were appropriated, but this closing of the doors gave much offence to the eager crowd excluded crowd. The congregation was by no means a fashionable one. It consisted mainly of the lower middle classes and the working men. Few women were present, comparatively speaking.

"The choir, greatly augmented for the occasion, numbered 500 voices, divided into four bands and sixty, and the service was choral throughout. So immense is the space, that even this great body of sound was not more than sufficient to fill it. The service opened in the Old Hundredth Psalm, which was sung after the third Collect, and it was sung grandest and most impressively of the musical portion of the service.

"The sermon was preached by the Bishop of London, on the 11th verse of the 1st chapter of the 1st Epistle to the Corinthians—'Writing for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.' His discourse lasted nearly an hour, and was delivered with much earnestness. The whole of the service concluded with the 100th Psalm, in which the whole congregation again joined."

THE OLD YEAR IS DYING.

BY CHARLES STEWART.

I.

Dear friends, a year is going down
The dusky hills of death;
His white shroud trails along the ground—
Frore white and faint his breath.

II.

I wade the snowy hill, and wait
To watch the sunset, while
It lights his cold and pallid face
With one calm, dying smile.

III.

Old year! of Time thou art the gem
Eternity hath won;
Fye while thou hast been the diadem
Of duty nobly done.

IV.

How much of Truth hast thou redeemed
From Error's dark domain!
How hath the earth with blessings teemed
To teach and entertain!

V.

This year God called my sister dear,
And clasped her pure, white hand;
Until I sleep in the year
She joined the angel band!

VI.

Along the galleries of the wood
The gusts of winter flow;
And takes that tell of solitude
Float e'er the realms of snow.

VII.

The kindling stars look from the skies
Upon our weary lot,
Like kind and tear-bright angel eyes
Of friends we have forgot.

VIII.

Pale fingers weave thy winding-sheet,
Old year! too soon thy knell
The moments fetch with flying feet—
The clock strikes one!—Farewell!

LITERARY.

THE HON. JOSEPH HOWE is better known in Canada and Nova Scotia than in the States, but he has also been long known in England as especially by those who took an interest in the progress of modern civil liberty. Twenty or thirty years ago. The volumes of his SPEECHES AND PUBLIC LETTERS, published by Jewett & Co., Boston, will be received as one of the most valuable contributions to historical literature, especially relating to British colonial policy, which has appeared during the past quarter of a century. Mr. Howe was the son of a printer, and himself a practical printer in his father's office, at Halifax, when very young. He succeeded to the proprietorship of a newspaper, and soon became prominently engaged in politics. But it was not till Halifax got to be very much as New York is now—intolerable on account of the rascality of its officials—that Mr. Howe came before the public as an orator. He was then a powerful popular speaker, with a vein of high crimes and misdemeanors, was indicted and brought to the bar, defended himself in a brilliant speech, and was triumphantly acquitted—and carried home on the shoulders of a shouting populace. On another occasion, this time in Nova Scotia, he can not avoid with the that he could try his eloquence—his success in this article is not recorded. This was the commencement of a career that has been eminently distinguished, and of which the prominent successes are preserved in these pages. As a record of parliamentary eloquence, and of keen political foresight in general, we presume no book can be found more interesting and instructive. It is especially to be commended to Canadian circulation, where the reputation of the distinguished author is as wide as the country.

THE SOCIABLE, or One Thousand and One Home Amusements, is the title of a capital book published by Dick & Fitzgerald, which gives to the young people many hints for pleasant evenings—new games for the parlor, and instructions how to play them, with acting proverbs, charades, puzzles, and all sorts of time-killing employments for winter evenings and summer resorts. We know some small folks that will make much of this book.

VOICES FROM THE SILENT LAND, is a collection of selected poems and prose extracts, relating chiefly to the future life. It will find many welcomes among the afflicted, who abound in all homes and hearts. (Boston: Ticknor & Fields.)

Jewett & Co. also publish two small volumes. The first is a very brief history of the LIVES AND CREEDS OF THE EARLY CHRISTIANS, carefully written by one who understands his subject, giving a sketch of the early persecutions, and of the way achieved salvation in the first years of the Christian era. The other is introductory to Dr. Huntington. The second is THE PARISH FLOWER; a Memoir of Edith Grant Perkins, of Groton, Mass., by her father, Rev. Dr. Perkins, the first Missionary to the Nestorians. This is a fine edition of a very interesting and popular biography, which is, in fact, a touching account of Missionary life.

We have a handsome little book from Ticknor & Fields, unimpeachable in beauty of paper and typography, for CHRISTMAS EVENING, which is a story. Nor do the contents belie the external promise. It is a quiet, gentle, and graceful story, that reaches the heart, and leaves a pleasant memory.

Sheldon & Blakeman publish BLIND BARTIMEUS, by Rev. W. C. Conant, D.D., one of the most eloquent clergymen in America. The book contains a series of lessons to be learned from the story of the blind man healed by CHRIST. The manner the author delivered in the form of sermons, but they make more the form of lectures of instruction and interest.

The same house (Sheldon, Blakeman, & Co.) publish another book by another Virginia clergyman, THE LIVING EPISTLE, by Rev. Cornelius Tyree, is a series of sermons on the great questions of spiritual life, and the duty of Christians to seek advancement in character, as well as to show the world what they have got. The style of these discourses is clear, forcible, and attractive, and the book should be found in every Sunday-school library.

From Tickner & Fields we have THOUGHTS ON THE CONDUCT OF DEVOTIONAL BOOK about to which must be taken hold of many sorts. The author is supposed to be one Thorndale, an Englishman, who has had the misfortune of coming to the States, writes from day to day in a journal, or rather in a blank book, all kinds of philosophical speculations, whims, and fancies, mingled with personal reminiscences that are really exquisite pictures among them, and at length the Editor's Essence, a hopeful philosopher, or a philosopher of Hope, comes along and dilutes the remaining pages with the dilutions of Faith of a Universalist. The book is a strange medley; yet for a thoughtful man is not unentertaining. It is not a book to be taken a little. But to read it deliberately, or to pronounce an opinion (that is an opinion) on it within three months after getting the book is unreasonable.

We have received from M. W. Dodd Dr. Spring's two sermons, one the last preached in the Old Brick Church, the other the first preached in the new church. They contain valuable historical matter, and are interesting documents. By-the-way, the Messrs. Dodd have also published a volume by Dr. Spring, in common with many other clergymen, appears to think, but does stand on Mount Moriah.

DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN.

POLITICAL.

On Monday, 20th, in the Senate, after the presentation of several petitions, Mr. Douglas introduced a bill to cede to from the 23d inst. to the 4th of January, for the holidays. A bill was introduced by Mr. Mason, of Virginia, which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Territories, to organize the Territory of Dacotah. Mr. Crittenden gave notice that he would call up the French Spoliation Bills on the 4th of January. Mr. Fessenden introduced Bill then came up on the order of the day, and occupied the remainder of the session. A resolution was offered by Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts, leaving the appointment of Clerks of Committees to be appointed by the President. Mr. Pugh's amendment relative to the Clerk of the Senate was then taken up, and after a debate of some length, in which it was stated that it should be built exclusively of American iron, obtained a postponement. A bill was finally passed by 27 to 24. Mr. Rice, of Minnesota, then spoke at length in favor of the bill, and Mr. Pugh, in opposition, and at length.—In the House, the Committee on Ways and Means, on motion of Mr. Phillips, of Pennsylvania, instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the relief of the sufferers by the conflagration in accordance of the war of 1812 was considered and passed by a vote of 107 to 71. A resolution introduced Mr. Phillips, of Pennsylvania, gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill to repeal the Fugitive Slave Law. Mr. Stanton, of Ohio, introduced a bill to prevent the sale, to furnish a statement of the value of the imports and exports during the United States with Great Britain and France for the years 1853, 1854, 1855, 1856, and 1857. The House adjourned to Thursday, January 6th, for the holidays.

On Tuesday, 21st, in the Senate, December 21, the Bill for the Improvement of the St. Clair Flats was passed by 32 to 15. The Bill for the Improvement of Rivers was then debated by Senators Seward, Ward, and Wilson. Resolutions were offered by Mr. Wilson, instructing the Military Commission Building and the Government at Washington; by Mr. Fessenden, calling for the Bill for the relief of Mrs. Harrison, and by Mr. Bayard, providing for the naturalization of foreign subjects in Oregon. The new Senate Chamber was occupied at 11 by the Senate for the session on 4th January. A Bill was passed allowing $3500 to Madam Tyrone, in this article will be found. This was the commencement of a career that has been eminently distinguished, and of which the prominent successes are preserved in these pages. As a record of parliamentary eloquence, and of keen political foresight in general, we presume no book can be found more interesting and instructive. It is especially to be commended to Canadian circulation, where the reputation of the distinguished author is as wide as the country.

On Wednesday, 22d, in the Senate, petitions praying for the passage of the Homestead Bill were presented by Senators Seward and Cameron. Senator Seward introduced a Bill for the relief of the widow of Commodore Isaac Hull, of the United States Navy. Senator Clay submitted a resolution calling for the correspondence which led to a ratification of Mr. Dallas's treaty with Great Britain and Mexico. Senator Hunter submitted a resolution inquiring what changes in the laws are required to render the Post-Office self-sustaining. Senator Mallory moved, that the Senate proceed to the election of a Senator certain officers of the Navy to accept medals from the British Government. Mr. Bigler introduced a Bill for appropriating $400,000 arrear of land in all schools in the District of Columbia. Mr. Bigler introduced a Bill for the relief of the widow of Lieut. Hunter. Mr. Bigler introduced a Bill to amend the Constitution so that it may be 29 to 30 States. Mr. Bigler introduced a Bill to amend the Act of Colonel Turnbull, by 26 to 25, after remarks by Senators Davis and Bayard, the Bill was passed. The Bill relative to the tariff was introduced by Mr. Cumins, and referred. Mr. Bigler introduced a Bill to amend the Constitution, to increase protective remuneration. Various resolutions were introduced relating to slave and to the Bill for defraying the slave cottage; and a large number of bills were introduced relating to the Territories. Mr. Bigler introduced a Bill to provide for the Territories to elect all their officers. Mr. Bigler introduced a Bill to amend the Land Act. Another by Mr. Johnson, of Tennessee, to grant land to actual settlers. Mr. Bigler introduced a Bill to amend the Act of 1854 ance in the painful scene. While the Sheriff was still engaged in adjusting the rope, Myers again addressed the crowd as follows:

"You can hang me when every thing is clear. I wish you all a merry Christmas through the wilderness, by-by."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

The tone and manner and language of the hardened criminal caused a shudder of horror among the spectators.

He never as again and an orange to the ground before, and pleased, he said, with a flick them up, you G—d—d rascals." And with the most stoical indifference continued to whistle the following eye upon lines below him.

THE LAST SCENE.

"At the conclusion of the prayer the prisoner exhibited the only emotion which he has shown since sentence was read, the solemn preparations thus far, and that was but slight. He said:

"I had no correct idea of when I was to be hung. I have no claim to religion, but I am willing to die, and am seeks hugger to reflect. I had to lawyer, or any body else. My lawyer did his best. He was a true friend and can do anything for myself. If not, I suppose I must go."

Just at the conclusion of the prayer the rope was passed the bar from the head of Myers, and placed the white cap over his face, when he said, in a clear voice:

"Myers, do you die in the faith of Jesus Christ?"

"He replied, 'I know nothing about it.'

"After uttering a minute, as half past twelve o'clock the Sheriff drew the signal, and Myers fell, instantly departing the drop gave way, and the body fell neatly five feet.

"Myers was about thirty-five years of age, five feet four or five inches high, of light complexion, with red cheek and thirty-five pounds. From some cause his hair seemed to have grown prematurely gray, which gave him the appearance of being much older than he really was."

AN UNNATURAL MOTHER.

The Boston Traveller gives outline the will of Augustus Thorndyke, who left an estate of about half a million dollars, and directed that the income thereof should be divided equally between his wife and daughter during the life of her husband, and at the time twenty-seven, and ever after he had arrived his twenty-first year. The income accruing her from his bedside on the occasion of his last sickness. This will—of which the above is but a brief setting of the decision—has the deliberate design establish in every case, and has been carried out in the case of this child from any participation in his accumulated wealth. It is absolutely impossible to conceive of a more malignity with which, throughout the document, he provides for the corpus of the property bequeathed to her.

The mother is forbidden to give aid to the child of her husband's bounty, and is left to the mercy of others. In the event of fraternal affection, and the mother's death, she will are subject to the same prohibition. Old Harvard has a donation of twenty thousand dollars to the Professorship of Music, but with like provisions if a copper should go to the pocket of the child of the testator's bosom. A pittance of four hundred dollars per annum, to save for her, is alone agreed to be bestowed upon her. His wife is liberally provided for, but only on condition that she remain a widow. At her death it is left to the Old South Church, but with liberty to sell it and purchase in any other church, if she may deem it best. The whole property is apparent not manifest in other portions of the will.

The wife of the deceased is the mother of the only child. She is, however, upon her return from Europe, and upon her arrival the amount of her income will be decided.

HOW A STORE-KEEPER WAS CHEATED.

A "lady" was detected a few days since in Cincinnati, on Main, in purloining a piece of calico from a store. When charged with the theft she burst into tears and declared it all in pretense. She was committed for trial in $50 and gave her $10 cheap, but on counting the cash at night had $20 bill switched off for a counterfeit. "Pluck me, the plebians" of that store-keeper.

THE EMPEROR.

EX-President Pierce presumes to pass the winter at Vienna and the island of Capri, in the Bay of Naples, in Rome. Mrs. Pierce is still an invalid.

Dr. Thomas R. Hunt, M.D., has made the following protest against being taxed without being represented:

"To FREDERICK U. TRACY, Treasurer, and the Assessors appointed for the Assessment of Taxes in the Ward of the City of Citizens generally, and the Legislature in particular:

"Every year since I have been a resident of this city, as protested against the injustice of governing women without her consent, of taxing property for the use of taxation without representation, and I again repeat my protest.

"The position of women in our republic will yet be protested before our courts, and this will be among the first action made in them.

When our fathers protested against the enforcement of the Stamp Act, they were answered by saying that in fact they were virtually represented. What was their humble reply? Women protest against the same kind of injustice, and received a like answer. History will record her intimate ally, for the same principle of human action are identical, and the victory of the one is prophetic of the other.

All which is respectfully submitted.

"No. 31 EAST 22D STREET, NEW YORK, DEC. 8, 1858. R. HUNT.

It is reported that Mr. Mowbray Morris, general manager of the London Times, has recently twice fought duels in Calais, in Mr. Capron, who was formerly the editor of the Times newspaper in the East.

The St. Paul Pioneer of the 7th ultimo says: "The former Dakota Governor, Alexander Ramsey, and his family, who went hunting in the Red River Valley, were killed by Indians, it seems, on the 1st of November, and their eye-teeth which have been cut by the natives. The last we heard of them they were on the plains and these Indians each for Red River ports, which were worth about $5, and were ploughing into a wild career of spreading the broken-down Red River horses."

Senator Douglas was very kindly received at Havana. His recent landing there from the Black Warrior, the Spanish steamer which ran down the bed of Colonel Crittenden, created him and his family no shore in the State Barge. They landed in a boat of their own, as usual.

The Count de Gondrecourt, formerly stated in the Evening Post that M. ENGLAND.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

At latest accounts we hear that a general meeting of the shareholders of the Atlantic Telegraph was called for the 15th December, to consider the condition of affairs. A public meeting was also announced to be held in Liverpool to give a generally on the new capital necessary to prosecute the enterprise. The Directors recommend that the result of a meeting of shareholders be submitted to the Atlantic Telegraph, and promises to lay it before the Commissioners of the Treasury. The question in regard to the Atlantic cable will be decided in a few days, and it is thought that the Government will guarantee a new capital. If so a contract for a new cable will immediately be made.

LORD CARLISLE ON AMERICAN INSTITUTIONS.

The other evening the Right Hon. the Earl of Carlisle read his printed lecture on the "Travels of Lord Carlisle" before the members of the Hull Literary and Philosophical Society. In acknowledging the vote of thanks which was accorded him at the close, his lordship said that he had had an opportunity of seeing the working of the United States since the period of my visit has not, he was sorry to say, undergone the change which many of their public proceedings, or to more favorable and satisfactory conclusions than those which he had arrived at on his journey. I can not but feel that many of the failures and drawbacks at which I ventured to hint have come out, as time wears on, with greater frequency and with deeper shade. The bickering animosity of classes; the jealousy and hatred of the different sections of the nations; the spirit of political self-seeking and corruption; the intemperance and violence of party conventions and fusions; the high-handed ruffianism of the outlying districts; the want of independence and purity in the administration of the more polished, refined, and upright portions of the community, are all symptoms which have since developed themselves in the more public deliberations of the Congress, and of dignity and the conduct of the Executive Government. He believed the internal dissensions which gather round every face on the pretenses questioning, increasing, and menacing proportions. In such a state of things he could not but look with apprehension for my own countrymen exchange the form of government, the institutions, and the laws which have been the means for those of the great American republic.

FRANCE.

At the late election of a local cretor of the University of Montpellier, the number of votes was 1,000 in addition. He received a very small vote indeed; and the Government expect, that some one else will be elected from Mr. Charles Dickens, in which he reproduced strongly, and with great effect, the scene in which Sir Leicester Dedlock announces the birth of a son and heir. The part of Sir Leicester was played by Mr. Charles Kean, and that of Lady Dedlock by Mrs. Kean. My father, who brought up a large family, was left with only a small income. Consequently, as soon as my mother died at Genlis (Côte-d'Or), an excellent man, who had been appointed to the living of Pouilly, one of the greatest sorrow that God has given me. I was born in Dijon on the 2d August, 1794, in the house occupied by my mother. We were poor, very poor. We were carried to the font the same day, and I was given to the godmother's care.

Madame Dupuy lived at the corner of Dijon. God has not made any being more devoted than she was. She loved me as though I were her own child. Mr. Dupuy was also not coarse; she has refused twenty offers of marriage to live with him, because she gave her mother enough. I entered the Polytechnic School at the age of sixteen, and left it at the end of twenty months. The fire which has given us most pleasure was that of Corporal Cain in Polytechnic School at the age of sixteen. The palace of 1813, and was made prisoner at its conclusion. Prince Paul's visit. NEW-YEAR'S DAY IN NEW AMSTERDAM IN THE OLD DUTCH TIMES.

NEW-YEAR'S DAY IN NEW YORK, 1859.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER XI.

Wolfe exerts from George Morley the fulfillment of one of the promises which mean nothing or every thing.

The next day George Morley visited Wolfe's room earlier than usual. Wolfe had sent for him. Sophy was seated by her grandfather—his hand in hers. She had been exerting herself to the utmost to talk cheerfully—to shake from her aspect every cloud of sorrow. But still THAT CHANGE was there—more marked than even on the previous day. That last hour of intense struggle, a single night wholly without sleep, will tell on the face of forty years. Not till we, human beings, have gone through such struggles as life permits not to the slight responsibilities or the cares—not till those struggles have grown to us familiar—will Thought seem to take, as it were, strength, not exhaust it from us, when unreckoning exercise nourish the brain, sustain the form by its own untiring, fleshless, spiritual immortality; not till many a winter has stripped the leaves; not till deep, and far out of sight, spread the roots that support the stem—will the heat of the east wind leave no sign on the rind.

George, as we indeed, so noticed the day before the kind of withering blight that had passed over the old countenance. But he saw now—when she met his eye more steadfastly, and had resumed something of the open genial infantine grace of manner which constituted its peculiar charm, and which it was difficult to associate with deeper griefs than those of childhood.

"You must scold my grandfather," she said. "He chooses to say that he is not well enough yet to leave; and I am sure that he is, and will recover more quickly if he leave home."

"Pooh!" said Wolfe; "you young things suppose we old folks can be as brisk as yourselves; but if I am to be scolded, I shall let George unwind by your presence, and go out, my dear, while the sun lasts; I feel in the joints of that blackbird that the day will be overcast by noon."

As soon as they were alone, George said, abruptly, "Your Sophy is looking very ill, and, if you are well enough, believe, it would be better for her to move from this gloomy house. My mother itself is a great restorative," added George, with emphasis.

"You see, then, that she looks ill—very ill," said Wolfe, quietly. "I said that you or that to your manner which tells me you guess the cause."

"I do guess it, from the glimpse which caught of Lionel's fare after he had been chased a short time in the Park. Do you think he could house two days ago. I guess it also from a letter Harley wrote me. Do you?"

"You guess right—very right," said Wolfe, still with the same serious, tranquil manner. "I observe that the letter from your friend Harley has been opened. George hurried his eye over the letter, and returned it silently. Wolfe proceeded.

"I was frightened yesterday by the strange composure she showed. In her love she would be read what he suffered. We talked last night. I spoke of myself—of my old servants—in order to give her strength to support hers; and the girl has a heroic nature. Mr. George—and she is resolved to endure or to die. She will not be cut conquer."

George began the usual strain of a consoler in such trials. Wolfe stopped him. "All that you can say, Mr. George, I know beforehand; and she will need no exhortation to meet and try to fortitude. I stole from my room when it was almost dawn, and I might under the door of her chamber. I just looked in—softly—supercivil. She had not gone to bed. She was by the open window—sitting dying out of the last moonlight on the floor, her face bowed in her hands. She has prayed. In her love for Lionel there is a sure that she is praying now. She will devote herself to no—but to God. Comfort you will hear her laugh, Mr. George: but she will not conquer in this world; long before the new year is out she will be sleeping down under ground with her bright smile; but we shall not see her, Mr. George. No man ever loved with such mad foolish terror; I know sorrow as physicians know disease; it has its mortal symptoms. Hush! hear me out. I am not hopeless—I am not."

"In me?"

"Yes. Do you remember that you said, if I could succeed in opening to your intellect its fair career, you would be the best friend to the man; and I said, and I think, I would not change the party in the contract; believed my Sophy instead of me, and I say so still. Yes, help me in sought for her welfare and happiness and you said, 'With heart and soul.' That was the bargain, Mr. George. Now, I tell you all that you then despaired of; you have the dignity of your sacred calling—you have the eloquence of the preacher. I can not cope with Mr. Darnell—you can. He has a heart—it can be softened: he has a mind—it can be formed: he has a conscience—it can be roused: he has a creed—it can be tested: he has the virtues you can appeal to, and the vices you can shame by the Christian minister, have the right to prove to be a vice. I can not argue with him; I can not reprove the man to whom I owe so much. All ranks of men and of mind should be equal to you, the pastor, the divine. You ministers of the Gospel address yourselves unabashed to the poor, the humble, the uninstructed. Did Heaven give you power and command over those alone? Go, Preacher! go! Speak with the same authority to the great, to the haughty, to the wise!"

The old man's look and gesture were sublime.

The Preacher felt a thrill vibrate from his ear to his heart; but his reason was less affected than his heart. He shook his head mournfully. The task thus assigned to him was beyond the limits which custom prescribes to the priest of the English Church—fortunate to a man not even of his own flock, upon the closest affairs of that man's own private health and home! Our secrecy allows no such privilege; and our society is right.

Wolfe, watching his countenance, saw at once what was passing in his mind, and resumed, as if answering George's own thought.

"Ay, if you were a Romish unemployed priest! But you are something more; you are the priest naturally ordained by the ties of blood—by the good. You have the mind to reason—the tongue to persuade—the majestic commission to console and to rebuke. Nor can you here the priest alone; you are here the friend, the confidant, of all for whom you would intercede. Come, Mr. George Morley, I am a poor ignorant bencher when presuming to exhort one of Christ's ministers; but in this case own words—I address you as man and gentleman—you declared that thought and sympathy would not be wanting in the hour which your promise." I say it now—Keep faith to the child you swore to me to befriend."

"I will go—and at once," said George, rising.

"But not sanguine. I see not a chance of success. Still, you must try—you will try with caution, abilities, reputed."

"Where need be, Christianity," said Wolfe, "if the earliest preachers and raised such questions? There is a soldier's courage—is there not a priest's?"

George made no answer, but, with abstracted eye, gathered his hat, and then, pausing, irresolutely, stood the room, and sought Guy Darnell.

BOOK XII.—CHAPTER I.

The man of the World—Its more serious indifference to the things and doctrines of the World than might be supposed.—And the visitation of Providence which, when it strove to be jocund, to be facetious with effect, to be darkly mysterious in its menaces, to be terrible even to the other man's hearth, he handles them when hottest in the prayer of the Preacher.

In the letter which George told Wolfe he had received at his rectory, he had taken an excuse for the delicate and arduous mission he undertook, which he did not confide to the old man. Set in blood-spirted expectation of the will unseen instituted. In his letter Alban related, with a degree of delicacy that he trusted would have farewell conversation with Lionel, who had just departed to join his new regiment. The poor young man had been struck down with the darkest expectations of the result of Sophy's prolonged residence under the roof of Darnell, and expressed his reason that when Darnell had been thus established to see and judge of her for himself, as would be impossible except in person, that Innocence, like Truth, would be mighty and prevail. Now, Darnell was known to be the friend to clear William Lovely's name and blood from the taint of felony;—Alban was commissioned to communicate to Darnell the fact, and intimate that would remove all chance of future disgrace from that quarter. Once let Darnell be aware of facts, obstacles vanished—the future became clear. And thus, when, after telling him of his failure, Alban wrote to Lionel, Darnell said, "I trust that, in bringing to William Lovely's fair intelligence the news that relieves his disappointment, when I make it thoroughly clear to him how impossible it is that his Sophy can be the wife of any man but a gentleman, whose virtues create an interest in her welfare" Darnell continued as by a blow. Scarcely could he murmur—

"You have seen her—and your resolve remains as before."

"Can you doubt it?" answered Darnell, as if in reproach. "Nay, I have suffered more in pain on my account, as before it gave me pain on yours. But if not moved by your pain, can I be moved by mine? It was then that I felt my power."

The Colonel, in depicting Lionel's state of mind after the young soldier had written his farewell to Wolfe, and previous to quitting London, had touched on the words, "Love, which is not my," wrote he, "that Lionel will guiltily seek death to escape. But I have known Lionel some more to there who seek then to those who shun it; but he will go upon a service exposed to the extremes of danger, disease, and disease—without that rallying power of hope—which, in the words of Lovel, 'makes the coward the true stamina of Youth. And I have always set a black mark upon those who go into war joyless and heedless. Spend a young Soldier to the camp with his spirits broken, his heart sore as a boil, and he will be the first to catch pestilence which then reeks more than the cannon ever can itself. There is a man for me.' Any doctor will tell you that, even in peace, the gay and light-hearted walk safe through the infectious atmosphere, while the sullen man sickens on a morsel. Confound Guy Darnell's self-laudatory, they have spoiled Queen Victoria as good a young soldier as ever mounted a horse or rode. Six months ago, and how blithely Lionel Haughton would have gone to his regiment—full courel—no cypress! And now, I feel as if I had shaken hands with a victim sacrificed by superstition to the tombs of the Pyramids. I by not blame Darnell: I dare say in the same position I might do the same. But no; on second thoughts I should not! If Darnell does not choose to marry and have sons of his own, he has no right to load a poor boy with benefits, and say, 'There is but one way to prove your gratitude; remember my ancestors, and be miserable for the rest of your days!' Darnell, forsooth, intends to leave to Lionel the transmission of the old Darnell name; and the old Darnell name must not be tarnished by the marriage on which Lionel has unluckily set his heart! I respect the old name; but it is not like the House of Yorkshire Bentick Institutions. And if some democratical cholera, which does not care a rush for old names, carries off Lionel, what becomes of the old name then? Lionel is not Darrell's son; Lionel need not, perforce, take the old name. Let the young man live as Lionel Haughton, and the old name die with Guy Darnell!

"As to the poor girl's birth and parentage, I believe we shall never know them. I quite agree with Darnell that it will be useless to try. I suppose. But I have said over and over again, a marriage between Lionel and Sophy is impossible. Darnell would destroy in the latter case, of course, if Lionel were the head of the House of Vipont, the idea of such a union would be inadmissible. But Lionel, even now, is the son of a ruined spendthrift's younger brother. Darnell has had his bait to give the handsome young couple five or six thousand a year, and I dare say will not withdraw it. I know that the world will trouble itself very little about their pedigrees. And really I cannot take upon myself to choose whether he prefer a girl whom he loves with his whole heart, five or six thousand pounds, and the chance of honors in a glorious profession to which he will thus look with all spirit—even his long misery, with the right, after Darnell's death—that I hope will not be these thirty years—to the whole of Darnell estate, and the baronetcy which, if I were the last of the Haughtons, and had any family pride—ay, thank Heaven, I have both—would be a painful exchange to me; and dearly-bought by the addition of some additional thousands a year when I had grown used to a little disposed to spend them as Guy Darnell would. Why, I am not sure that he is one I could associate even more than young Haughton. My morning rides of late have been much in the direction of Darnell Park, and I have met my cousin Lady Montfort. I went first to lecture her of conduct to young people who were not of each other. But my anger melted into admiration and sympathy when I found with what delicacy and tenderness Darnell treated her, and been all the while scheming for Darrell's happiness: and the gratification she drew from contemplated the sorrow which a friendship so grateful, and a belief so natural, had innocently occasioned. My sympathies were then all for dead. Dr. F—— who attended poor dear Wolly, is also attending her; and he tells me the opinion is that his skill was in vain—that her case baffled him; and he had very serious apprehensions. I have seen some confusion in Darnell's friend. And to think that here are lives permanent misery—and all risked, by the ruinous obstinacy of the best-hearted man I ever met! Now, though I have already intimated my wish to correspond with a confidant for the oldest and dearest of my friends, yet I have never, in the letters I have written, mentioned either, or the talk we have had together, spoken out as plainly as I do in writing to you. And then, on my window, without a cue of the eye and dark brow, I have half a mind to add—'seize him as a sacrament and save him from his letter.' Yes, I give you full leave; show it to him if you think it would avail. If not, throw it into the fire, and leave to me the time when no poor morals can not serve.

In the evening Alban had added these words

"But, of course, before showing the inclosed, you will prepare Darnell's mind to weigh its contents. Say simply it was in the form of such simple injunction that the subtle man of the world detected the sarcasm and the sting not a trace was apparent in the body of his letter.

Though Alban's communication had been received that day, Darnell had not judged it discreet to avail himself of the permission to show it to Sophy. It seemed to him that the whole of his host would take much more offense at its transmission through the hands of a third person than if he had come out in expostulations and suggestions. And George had determined to keep back the letter, and consider, in the yard it himself to Darnell just as it was, with but a brief line to say, "that, on reflection, Alban suggested, since he had school-fellow, the reasonings and apprehensions which he had to communicate, should first be communicated to without the intention at which the writer arrived at the close." But now that the preacher had undertaken the duty of an advocate, Darnell became his brief.

He hastened through the library, through the study, up the narrow stair that finally conducted to the same lofty cell in which Darnell had consigned Lionel Haughton, and exclaimed in haste to Sophy. With a nervous hand George knocked at the door.

Unaccustomed to any intrusion on the part of guest or household in that solitary retreat, somewhat startled, and, in anger, Darnell's voice answered the knock.

"Who's there?"

"George Morley."

Darnell opened the door.

for its warning chastisements that very error which the man has so blent with his virtues that he holds it a virtue itself?—which, more slowly, pertinaciously, it will gather this beautiful nature still to itself—insist on a sacrifice it would not from no other? To complete the true nature of poor William Lossly, Heaven ordained the sacrifice of worldly repute; to complete the true nature of Guy Darrell, God ordains him the sacrifice of reality!

Darrell started—half rose; his eye flashed—his cheek paled: but he remained silent.

"I have appointed you," said the supplicator," resumed George, drawing a deep breath, as of relief, "because I have more confidence in myself upon his fellow. I entreat you to believe that I have no personal motive in my application to suspect, and love, and honor you sufficiently to be for a while to forfeit, not your friendship, that I may claim the privilege, without which friendship is but a name, to watch over it with more obvious than intrusion on confidence withheld, so no favor, I repeat, more propitious than the confidence which I ask, is worth vouchsafes to him who invites it with no claim but the bygone of his mind."

Said Darrell, softened, but with stateliness—

"All human lives are so separated from each other, may touch at one point in friendly approach, but, even where they touch, each rounds itself from off the other. With this link I am not presented to ask at what point in my circle you would touch?"

George Morley. "Thank you gratefully; I accept your illustration. The point is touched; I need no other." He then proceeded, still concentrating all his thoughts, and then said, with musing accents—"Darrell, I regret you live with musing accents—"Darrell, I regret you live with no children in which the blood of the individual man; the life as it stands before us is but a sterile epitome—but a few years and all the emotions which stir the People of the Heart, in such a year occurred a visible something—a grim—a serious—a solemn—a momentous—which People of the Heart crowned or deposed a king. This is all we know; and the most elaborate biography ever written must still be a meagre abridgment of all that really individualized and formed a man. All can but seize upon some single detail or fact in your existence which lies beyond my sight. For from we must ever remain insolence: but I ask you this—Reflecting on your past life as a whole, have not your chief sorrows had a connection with—your faults? Have they not been strangely directed towards the frustration of some one single object—the attainment of your truest happiness, as if in defiance of fate, resolutely clung to even now?"

"It is true," muttered Darrell. "You do not offend me; go on!"

"And have not these Sorrows, in frustrating your object, likewise assumed, too, a certain uniformity in the weapons they use, in the quarter they harass or invade, in even a kind of strategic policy that guided them where they could most pain, or humble, or inject a fear that they were colonels in storm? Degrade you they could not; such was not their mission. Heaven left you intact in your nature—intense—a loftiness of spirit, unabased by assaults leveled not against yourself, but your pride—your personal dignity, this singularly sensitive, though bitterly galled, stood proof. What might lower lesser men, lowered you not. Heaven left you that dignity, for it belongs alike to your intellect and your virtues—and your virtues are a source of your magnitude. Why? Because not contents with adorning your virtues, it was covering the fault against which you were chiefly to be warned. You frown—forgive me."

"You do not trespass unless it be as a flatterer." If I frowned, it was unconsciously—the sign of thought, not anger. Pause!—my mind has left you for a moment—it has been gazing into the past."

The past!—Was it not true! That home to whose porch came in time the Black Horses, in time just to save from the last, worst dishonor, but not save from years racked by such pangs that can harrow man's dignity in each daily assault on the fort of man's pride; these, treacherous daughter—her terrible marriage—the man whose disgrace she had linked to her blood, and whose fall still was and must be the fall of her race. True, what a war upon Pride! And even in that second and fatal love what Pride in all of his griefs the most influential and enduring, had his pride been less bitterly wounded, and that pride less entirely in his heart, would that last grief have been so relentless, his attempts at its conquest so vain? And then, even then, when was it said, "I can bless"—holy Love! What was it said, "but not pardon"—stern Parmi! And so on to those later revelations of sterile life. Was he not miserable in Lionel's and Sophy's misery? Pride—closed round with Pride—closed round and invested with Sorrow —and the lost Hopes that had fled to the fortress, shut in defense of its outworks. With bond shading his face, Darrell remained some minutes silent. At last he raised his head, and his eye was steadfast, his lip firm.

"George Morley," said he, "I acknowledge much justice in the censure you have conveyed, with so artful a delicacy, that if it fail to reform it can not displease, and leaves much to be seriously resolved in solitary self-commune. But though I may own that pride is not made for man, and that in the blindness of human judgment I may often have confounded pride with duty, and suffered for the error, I must add that prevailing object of my life, which with so starting a truth you say it has pleased Heaven to frustrate, I can not hold an error in itself. You have learned enough from your oracle, seen enough of me yourself, to know that that object has been. You are scholar enough to consent to me that it is no ignoble homage which either nations or persons render to the ancestral Dead—that homage is an instinct in all but savage and sordid natures. But, whatever be necessity of his own, rightly and justly, if himself to be worthily remembered by the recital of his heroes, and bards, and patriots of his fatherland? Even those whose ancestors were but pirate-chiefs that have adorned the state, on the sole condition that he shall revere their tombs, and exact their memory as a duty to the land, where, ever they who speak trumpet-tongued to great assemblages, whether in senate-chamber, convocation to heroic deed or sacrifice, they appeal in the Name of Ancestors, and call upon the living to be worthy of the Dead. This is not to be laudable—nay, to necessary a sentiment in the man, even the most selfish that ever existed in the man. Like all high sentiments, it may compel harsh and rugged duties; it may need the stern suppression of other and softer claims and many a pleasing wish. But we must regard it in its most exalted aspect, as the sole object of, if my eloquent and subtle friend, all you have hitherto said be designed but to wind into this idea for the purpose of which you have decided against the advocate in my own heart which has the strongest designs in the world in that fair girl's ingenuous and touching grace, let us break up the court: the judge has no choice but to bow with the advocate before the final judgment."

George Morley. "I have not hitherto presumed to apply to particular cases the general argument you so indulgently allow me to urge in favor of your duties to the race of which the human heart, when closely examined, there is the same language and design in the whole universe: that in Pault and in Sorrow are the axioms, and problems, and postulates of a science. Yet, if I may, I will venture, as I will pursue the same course of reasoning. I shall not have the slightest scruple in applying my stance—to say, 'This you should do, this you should not do.' All I would ask is, leave to confer a favor by the acceptance of your own large and candid experience."

Said Darrell, with a cold, relaxed on, but with a tinge of his grave irony, "You have the true genius of the pulpit, and I concede to you its privilege. Proceed!" But he looked upon it with the more susceptible of conviction, because freed from the necessity to reply."

George Morley. "You vindicate the object which has been the main ambition of your life. You say that the ancestral Dead have legible objects are not for you. The question is, are there no objects which the living should have attained higher value, and led to larger results in the soil which Providence assigned to you; you who have inherited in the midst of the ancestral Dead—the ancestral Dead—the ancestral Dead—him dreamily and luxuriously happy. What a lucky fellow to have the dear little woman in that broad hat for a wife, and how madly in love with her he must be! But after that brief and shadowy honeymoon, when he brought her home, and resumed meals at his daily work at the office as if nothing had happened, he might have been married many years for all the heed-like attendance or tenderness he bestowed on her. Annie had never been accustomed to attention and consideration, and as the miss there, had been married life, and was quite as happy and contented as she expected to be. She had her home to manage, her errands to make, and into those mysterious secrets called "ways," her wisely talk to make up, and ponder for hours where that mistake of twopence farthing could be; she had her needle-work to do, her collars to embroider, her pocket-handkerchief to hem at his shirt bottom and woolen socks to supervise!; so that she got through her day in quiet and tranquillity; never idle and never hurried—a smooth life running on its even course, in which there was nothing to fret, to surprise, to agitate, or excite.

Percy Clarke impressed but one thing on his wife—the need of strict economy. In token whereof he made her a very meagre allowance for the house. The amount was not that it should be sufficient, in the wonderful way in which clever housekeepers can save every penny, and avoid spending the public comforts of the family. She studied all the best economies, and devised private and peculiar savings for her own, and then was puzzled to make up appearance of luxury and domestic refinement out of the scraps remaining.

"I hope you are not getting into debt, Annie?" Percy would sometimes say, if she had ordered a dinner more showy than ordinary, though she always contrived to have one special delicacy at the least on the table.

"No, Percy, you may see my books," Annie would answer, with a look of confidence. "We are where allowance-day, perhaps adding—"I have made it do exactly this week, and have just fourpence over."

"Very well. I do not want details; only do not exceed. That is all." And Annie did not.

Old Mrs. Clarke, the mother, lived in a small house at the upper end of Islington. She was an invalid; and not entirely free from the infirmities. She was as hard as her son, and not so overtempered—as a good deal of her temper had gone by selfish; for Percy's faults were but negative at the worst. Mrs. Clarke was accustomed to say, that "he had never given to that day's grief." She thought her too young, and did not believe in her housekeeping; for Mrs. Clarke was of the old school, and believed in nothing that did not include constant supervision and active using among the servants by the mistress. She was not to be cheated, too, who looked up every thing, and would have thought it dishonorable to her son if Annie gave her servant the key of the tea-caddy, or suffered her in the store-closet unwatched. She it was who continually represented on Percy her conviction of waste and untruth in his house; pointing to Annie's little figure, sailing about the young wife had obtained by the most cunning devices of hidden economy, and astounding every guest and needless expenditure. But as Percy knew that he allowed a very moderate sum, he was not incited to very vigorous opposition to his mother's views. Nevertheless her perpetual recurrence to the subject did not have to make his money-dealings with his wife more liberal.

One day Percy came home half an hour later than usual. He was so methodical in every thing else, that he was paler than Annie had ever before seen him, as if interrupted in some habit more than his customary silence; replying only by monosyllables to all that Annie said, or not replying at all, if her words were not put in the form of a direct question. In the evening, while they sat together in the drawing-room, suddenly he started up from his pamphlet on the Corn Laws, and said:

"Annie, my mother has lost her fortune. It is not necessary to enter into the business details of the matter: besides, you could not understand them, if I did. All I have to tell you now is, that it comes tomorrow to live with us. Let the best bedroom be given up to her; and I trust I need not impress on you the necessity of treating her affectionate attention."

Annie's heart sank. She felt that all her quiet happiness in her home was at an end. But she had too high notion of wifely duty to utter a word of protest. She merely drooped her eyes to her work, and said, "Very well, Percy;" in her usual calm, unimpassioned voice. "I am sorry for what was said; and no one knew that, while she sat beneath that prosperous little roof, she was silently falling within the shadow of her early, stormy life unwith held in her trembling hand.

Mrs. Clarke was a difficult person to deal with in a house. Her times and tempers were contrary to those of every one else, and she was not of yielding. Annie's quiet particularity irritated her beyond measure.

"God bless the girl!" she used to say, blazing up in her fierce, passionate way, "has she no blood in her veins at all that she can never be angry or speak above her breath?"

But, harsh critic and undisciplined customer as she was, she did not intend to be cruel. She was only mean and sour-tempered. The day after she came she spoke to her son about his wife—fully asked how much he allowed a week, what average he made for each, and what sum he appropriated for that future day which, in some people's imaginations, is always raising furiously. Percy, over whom his mother exerted a great but unacknowledged influence, detailed his arrangements and position without reserve; adding up, for her edification, how much each person in his household was supposed to cost.

"So much at that? Well! I must say you are a generous husband, boy! I am sure your wife has no right to complain! When I was with your dear father I had not half that sum."

"Is it much, mother? I thought it moderate. I do not think we could manage on less."

"If not actually so less, then it ought to include me as well," said the old lady, tartly.

Percy was silent, giving only a little inquiring hem as he sat puckering his lips contemplatively.

"I hope you were not thinking of any addition on my account. It is bad enough to be unwelcome and forced to come to you for a home at all; old people are best by themselves; but it would be intolerable if I were any extra burden to you."

"I was thinking of allowing six or seven shillings a week to you, mother," Percy answered.

"Nonsense, child! your wife must learn economy. I will not hear of it. Not a penny. I tell you—and surely I ought to know; I, who have kept house three forty years and more—you allow your servants too much. It will be useful to her to learn how to make the best of every thing."

"But she is not very extravagant, mother, I assure—"

"Quite extravagant—quite! At all events, take my advice, and make the trial. If she can not make it do the will tell you, and then you can alter your arrangements. Take my advice, Percy; you are soon to be a father, and all that, and you ought to be doubly careful, considering what expenses you are before."

"Very well, mother, I will. I can but make the trial, as you say, and I thank you for the counsel, and tells me I will enlarge the allowance."

"Do, Percy; you are very well, as between you and me; but don't tell Ann."

"I am a lawyer, mother," said Percy, with a grim smile, "and know how to keep secrets."

So the law was passed in this domestic Star-Chamber, that Annie was to have the advantage of improvement in the art and science of house-keeping: a law which never would have been passed at all but for Percy's love of his young companion, and her careful concealment of painful deficiencies, which, however, she was not revoltingly so; and, to do him justice, he would not have imposed a task that he knew was to lead to vexation and trial. He was not sorry to lay even a heavy strain upon her, and for deprivations, which he knew she would have done more, willingly. So that poor Annie's very care it was which now caused her discomfiture; her very courage—her self-reliance—her strong agreement.

At the end of the first week the young wife was behind in her accounts. There was brandy for the old lady, and not a little of it; and there were her own delicacies for her less robust health, and delicacies for her breakfast; special tea-making; bedwarming—all the thousand little, but overbearing, nobs shown fretful figures—increased by a full share and a half. But Annie was not discouraged: she observed the retrenchment of these multitudinous figures as a simple fact with which her husband had no more to do personally than with

When pay-day came she told Percy, quietly, that she was so much short that week. "I can not help it; and, in short, I am sorry to say, am overdrawn in addition maiden a great difference. Our own expenses have not been more than usual, and I think I find your mother's cost exactly equals my deficiency."

"You must provide for that out of the allowance," said Percy, with harshness.

"But I have provided for it already."

"Yes. I am not able to afford you more; and, by some means or other, you must make what you have do."

"Very well, Percy; I will try," said Annie, quietly.

"Trying will be of no good if it is not done, Annie," Percy spoke positively, as if on the brink of displeasure.

"I will do my very best," she repeated. "But for the present you know, Percy, I am in your hands; your arrangement, not so made no provision—" She turned such a pretty, pleading face to him that he said,

"I will pay you for this once—only for this once, mind; and you must be more careful in your finances"—emphasizing the solidarity: "Remember—this once only. You know I never speak without a meaning. What was it you wanted that you wanted in addition?"

So much, it was made, naming a large sum; very large comparatively with the whole. "I have to pay a bill next week, Percy, for—"

"Here, then, is the money," said Percy, slowly counting it out, coin by coin. "Now do not let me hear that sum mentioned again. It is what you have to do, and you must do it."

Annie looked up with a smile that day. In what could she retrench? Of course Percy was right; husbands always are right in the eyes of girls when not actually cruel. He was right, and must be obeyed, of course; but how? She would learn of him, and ask counsel of him in her taste for pastry; give up all beer and wine—of which she had but little as it was—and put herself in Lenten fare generally. Then, as to the fuel, the grand retrenchments did not go beyond a few personal economies. Annie had been assured there must be done. At last it came to her like a bright inspiration—she would dispense with the extra service she had been accustomed to. She was washing was done at home; and the young wife and old servant, with the help of a charwoman, who worked herself to the verge of hysterics and faintness for day, till at last a perfect good faith that such a life was the normal existence of a good housekeeper, and that she was only doing her ordained duty. Of what should she grieve? Not but the servants. If old Mrs. Clarke knew it she kept it to herself, and thought all very as it should be. Percy did not see, and never asked, what his wife did in the house or out of it. He was the most loose-handed husband possible with the rearriage-reins with regard to every thing except money; and his wife, had she been so minded, might have enjoyed any amount of questionable independence. This noninterference was what Annie had always dared in him, and what she rejoiced unfeigned now in the pride of her secret household heroism; and for the next two weeks she was profoundly happy to find that she had succeeded in her obedience, and that her expenses were within the mark—gratified, in fact, that she could pay luxuries for her peevish mother-in-law, and secure her husband's comfort and approbation by the toil and labor of her own hands: for that was the English of the thing, said the superiorly educated servant.

This could not go on for long. At the proper time Annie's release from household toil came in the form of a baby-boy, which, however, was by no angel come to lie on her heart. This was Annie's baptismal name, for it was a boy, and was a real emotion before; never felt a real love. Her father she had feared and shrunk from; her mother she respected and obeyed; but her child—what a golden word of hope and love that was!—what a treasure to be cherished for the whole future, and warm soft lips of that little wonder! She would have borne contentedly even through years of pain and sorrow for the gracious time; and she felt she could now face any grief with that precious clinging at her breast as reward for by its love and cheer her by its progress and well-being. Pretty Annie was a mother, but saw she was not to be so beautiful that the old nurse shook her head and said she did not like the glory of her young lady's looks; and that she mistrusted such a half a dozen fatal experiences, which made the nurse-girl prophesy that the child would not satisfied; so went sighing and shaking her head up stairs.

Mrs. Clarke was impatient of Annie's illness. She missed her in the household; she found that the servant-maid was better so much at home than fal as Ann, as she used to call her spitefully, eschewing the Annie as to coaxing and refined; and she could not bear that any one should be should need more care than herself. She had been so long accustomed to be the chief consideration; so long accustomed, too, to the moral coddling of invalidship, that she did not yield the right without a pang and struggle to any one. Mrs. Clarke's infirmities and sundry diseases were of her social stock in trade. She was very sensitive to regard and attention, as some people's riches, or as a pretty woman's beauties. She was forever calling upon them the wholesomeness of her discretion and the infinite evil of giving way. So that when Annie had been about a week in the room of nurse, despairingly, and was stirring about the house at a time when other ladies would have been comfortably in bed, a wildly-lighted room-gowns and lying on bedroom sofas.

"Annie, my dear, my dear! Why, a fortnight after that new life had come among them, Annie appeared at the dinner-table just the same as everyday paler and more languid, but otherwise like her—his sole remark was—thinking heads with her small kissing face. It scarcely passed unnoticed by fortnight, Annie, since you were here; but my mother says it is so." Yet his manner had an indescribable shade of tenderness given to Annie, and Annie forgave the coldness of his spoken welcome.

But Percy was not soft either in speech or in manner; and, after to-day, he gradually relapsed into his old coldness and indifference. Annie resumed her household duties, and in another week all things were in their old, quiet routine. The old nurse even leaving, called away earlier than was expected, owing to an error in dates somehow, Annie had been left alone—except for her sole charge with no one to whom she could speak but with confidence; therefore with no distance or relief. She had no nursemaid, and her two servants were not clever about babies. She was surprised to find how that one little creature absorbed her time, until how scant was the leisure left for the busy world that lay in the household before his birth. Yet the inexorable law had to be fulfilled, however unable she was to fulfil it.

When time came round to the house-bound young back into her hands again, and the mean sum once more doled out, she had received a lesson enough to be doubly careful now with this heavy expense before her, and to remember that she saved for her child while she cared for her husband. She had completed the circle of Annie's obligations. Passionless as love was now, it was still love, and love in its steady duty, and she had not a wish to evade the observance of her task.

Still she had not quite so much time as formerly, and she was not yet strong enough for active household work. In consequence of this, week by week, she fell gradually behind until she was in all several pounds; all to be saved out of an allowance that did not surpass the old economical measure! It was hopeless to think of it. What could she do? It was impossible to ask an increase of the spiritual comforts, she feared he would say that she no longer regarded him, and thought only of her baby. Annie's sight in the world's opinion her duty to her husband the first thing in her life? Something like it was hovering somewhere in her dream. By virtue of that fallacy—the privilege of old age—the nurse was prospered, and petted, and preserved, whenever failed or wanted, and a worn-out useless life is nursed up to creon away a few days by tears for the child, though the young mother and the needed should perish in its stead. Mrs. Clarke was prospered, and petted, and the give up further in herself? She had not, as it were, lost the ordinary physical help to a young mother, and if she reduced herself to sickness and helplessness than at present, she must be content with plain food and water. What should she do? While in her own room, kneeling by her baby's pretty little cot, and longing for him to awake, she suddenly remembered that she had a handsome old-fashioned pearl necklace of her dear mother's. She never wore it; it was of no use to her. She would sell it; and then to saved from further anxiety and unhappiness. It might be a pain, but it was only a pain of sentiment at the worst; while, to vex her husband, and perhaps lose his confidence, would be a crime. That very day she paid up all her back bills, and started fair again with a balance in hand.

But this must not happen again. She must work as she did before; for she was strong now, and must bear her part with the rest. And she did work as before, improvising all sorts of portable cradles for her darling so that he should be watched over the whole time she was engaged, and as she had nothing else to do than care for him and guard him. She worked till her limbs ached, and her head was dull, and her heart depressed. She worked till she was faint and giddy, and overwrought. And no one saw it. Percy thought her neat and glossy for dinner; and Percy did not particularize her extremely enough to know she pale was; nor how thin; nor how her lips quivered when she spoke, and her eyebrows lifted themselves up as if to lift a heavy load from her brow. He saw her just as she used to be, with her placid smile, and her pretty dress, and her dainty costume, always marvelously clean and choice, though simple. He saw nothing beyond all this; and as the house went on as exactly as it did before, he was never weary of congratulating himself in secret that he had taken his mother's advice and had put Annie on her mettle, to rightly understand the economies of practical housekeeping.

Mrs. Clarke had a slight attack of indigestion; and what a miserable house that slight attack created! Percy was impatient and insulting; the old lady capricious and dissatisfied; and poor Annie's nerves were all shaken by the sudden fuss and weeping from weariness and fatigue. But she had her old immunity from observation; though poor Ann had the kitchen mother's advice and not put Annie on her mettle, to rightly understand the economies of practical housekeeping.

But she had her old immunity from observation; though poor Ann had the kitchen mother's advice and not put Annie on her mettle, to rightly understand the economies of practical housekeeping.

At last, one day, she failed. She had been for some hours ironing, when, very quietly, she gave a deep sigh, and fell fainting to the ground. The red-armed maid ran screaming away, and Percy hurried down stairs. He found her to all appearance dead on the kitchen-floor, and, taking her in his arms, bore her tenderly and gently to her room; for he loved her as much as he could have loved any wife, and terror frightened him into nature and demonstration. A doctor was sent for; Mrs. Clarke unsparingly repudiating all idea of danger, or the necessity of making a fuss because of such a common thing as a fainting fit; but when the doctor came he looked grave, ordering his patient to be kept in bed, and to be most zealously tended; ordering her, in fact, the attendance of a person dangerously ill, and for whom the only chance lay in loving watchfulness and care. But he found her so extraordinarily refined, and with such distinct evidences of organic mischief, that he himself had but little hope of the result. He inquired minutely into her life; and the whole history was revealed. She was dying, literally from fatigue and exhaustion, he told her husband frankly, but severely.

Percy never left her bedside. Night and day he nursed her, as she would have nursed her sick child. But this love had come too late. Not all his tears could give back the life which his blindness and hardness had helped to destroy. Neither could it now call out the love in that young heart, which had lain like a sleeping child that would have smiled back love for love to the one who had awakened it. All too late! too late! Happiness, love, and life all gone, and the hand that might have stayed them now stretched out imploringly in vain.

When Percy left that death-room he looked a shrunken, gray, withered old man; as if years, not hours, had passed over him since his young wife died. From that day no one ever saw him smile, and no one ever saw him lift his eyes frankly to theirs. He kept them fixed on the ground, or turned away like a man who has committed a crime; and so dragged on a life which had no need to ask of another the mystery and iniquity of torture. Even his mother cried a little when the baby died a month after its mother.

REVIVAL OF RIBBONISM IN IRELAND.

WE give herewith, from an English paper, a picture of a group of Irish Ribbonmen. Well understood as the name is in Great Britain, it may be necessary here to explain, that Ribbon or Riband Societies are mere associations of the Irish peasantry, formed for the purpose of avenging the real or fancied wrongs of any member of the body, and protecting malefactors against the vengeance of the law. In the old times of famine and starvation in Ireland, when to an ignorant and suffering people the term landlord might seem equivalent to oppressor, and resistance to a rent-collector almost justifiable, the Ribbon Societies were active as well in what was called "punishing" landlords as in concealing murderers. At an earlier period, during the fierce religious strifes of the north of Ireland, the ribbon societies were organized bodies of Catholics, acting in opposition to the organized Protestants, who bore the name of Orangemen. It is even said that the ribbon societies were in existence during the rebellion of '98; though at that time their character was probably more political than agrarian or religious.

Without entering into an argument on the lawfulness and propriety of secret societies, it may be said that, since the Encumbered Estates Act went into effect, and emigration depleted the over-populated districts of Ireland, the causes which once stimulated organized opposition to the laws have ceased to operate, and whatever justification may once have existed for the establishment of Ribbon Societies, and whatever policy might once have been made for agrarian outrages, neither the one nor the other are defensible now. Yet we have every reason to believe that Ribbon Societies continue to flourish in many parts of Ireland. Every mail contains some account of their proceedings.

IRISH RIBBONMEN.

Some weeks since Mr. Richard Ely, a gentleman residing in Queen's County, was passing out of his grounds in the evening, when he was shot dead by an assassin. It has been ascertained that the man who killed him was named Delony; that he had threatened to shoot him some time before; and that he is still living among the peasants of the vicinity, hattened and comforted as though he were a martyr. A porter who found Delony's hat shortly after the murder, and handed it over to the magistrates, has been obliged to leave the country by the Ribbonmen. Several magistrates who have been active in trying to discover the murderer have been warned that their lives are marked. And the peasantry distinctly declare that other landlords will share Mr. Ely's fate if they attempt to collect rent over a certain sum.

This is Ribbonism in Ireland, in the year 1858, and in the midst of such plenty and prosperity as that unfortunate country never enjoyed before. It is but just to say that many of the best of the Irish priests have denounced Ribbonism. Dean Kieran, Roman Catholic dignitary in Kerry, has lately administered a heavy blow to Ribbonism from the pulpit. He said the system was at once an outrage on religion and a foul blot on civilization. It converted men into murderers, perjurers—into enemies alike of God and man. He hoped his voice would reach the victims of a terrible and wicked delusion. Unless the combination was at once broken up he would expose the names of all guilty parties that might come to his knowledge, and call on their employers to dismiss them from their service. Though he would be sorry, indeed, to injure the wives and children of even Ribbonmen, or of those who forget their duties to their families, he gave these deluded men warning that persistence in their wicked course of life would leave him no course whatever for failing to publish their names, and publicly denounce the abettors of a secret and infernal tyranny which sets at defiance the ordinances of religion and the laws of the country.

THE "GREAT EASTERN" STEAMSHIP.

So long a period has elapsed since the Great Eastern was a common topic of newspaper report and ordinary conversation, that many of our readers have perhaps forgotten all about her. She exists, nevertheless, and is in a state of forwardness, as the accompanying engraving, taken from a photograph made for the London News, will show.

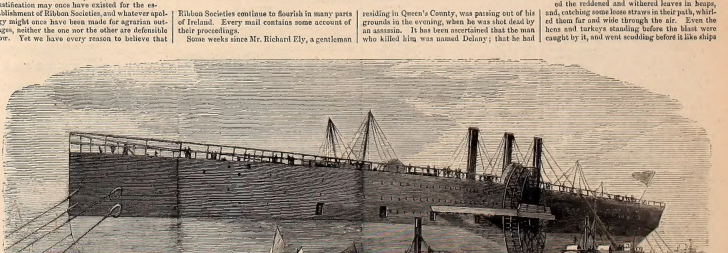
It may not be generally known that the expense of building and launching this mammoth vessel far exceeded the estimates, and in fact exhausted the capital of the company whose property she was. After vainly trying to raise money to complete her after the launch, the owners formed a new company, which bought her as she stood for a sum of $800,000. She had cost about $2,500,000. It is estimated that another half million or so will finish her, and prepare her for sea.

She is to make her trial trip to Portland, as originally advertised, and after that she will be "laid on" for Trincomalee, and freighted with goods for India, unless a better freight should induce her to sail for Australia. At any rate, there is now a fair prospect of her being able to go to sea early next spring; and if no accident occurs, she may be looked for in Portland before the beginning of next summer.

Her speed in the ocean is now estimated at sixteen knots an hour at least, or nearly 400 miles a day. At this rate she would cross the Atlantic in at least eight days, and in fine weather, when she could use her sails, in six or seven. The commercial world will wait for her trial trip with no ordinary impatience.



THE "GREAT EASTERN" LYING AT HER MOORINGS, DECEMBER, 1858.

IN THE AUTUMN.

THE winds of autumn howled mournfully around Farmer Blakely's dwelling. They tossed the reddened and withered leaves in heaps, and, catching some loose straws in their path, whirled them far and wide through the air. Even the hens and turkeys standing before the blast were caught by it, and went scudding before it like ships in a storm. It made me comfortable, because I contrasted its radiance and generally boisterous conduct with the snug comfort and fair prospect that the surroundings of the farm gave token of for the coming winter. Cords of wood were piled in the yard assuming against the future evenings' fire; and in the clear yellow tott of the hickory log the sharp axe was stuck where John had left it when he stopped cutting. The granary-door had got unfastened somehow, and was slamming to and fro, over and anon glistening my eyes with the rich harvest within. The sty was empty now, and empty now where lately the grunting porkers had stood, with food on rail, impatient of the coming meal. The pompous old turkey-cock strutted to and fro, bridling his wings upon the ground, and surveying the surrounding farm-buildings with a most patriarchal air.

I laughed inwardly to myself. I pictured him prone upon his back, with a rich brown coat on, bursting with his fatness. I saw his comrades, the pigs, gathering round from the other end of the table, as if they had some superior merit. I saw the little brown quails pecking about between them, and then I thought, "Ah ha! my feathered bully, just wait until Thanksgiving, and then let us see your patriotism!"

"Wa'al," said a voice close at my elbow, which was no other than my Uncle's, Farmer Blakely, "Wa'al, how do you stun' it now down in York? Not so well but what ye like to come and see how an old fellow earns a living, don't ye?" And when I returned a hearty affirmative to his warm greeting, he took me by the arm, and in a kind manner, pointing out where he intended doing this and that thing next summer; and that he intended, by time, he should have the old place look just as good as new.

The fact of it was, the old man had got bewitched with the new house Squire Fergus had built, and wanted one like it; and was trying, by the aid of paint, putty, and glass, to remodel the outside of his old-fashioned mansion into a new-fangled summer villa, much to the regret of myself and the rest of the family.

What were the "fixings" to my furniture," architraves, and other crooked abominations to me? What the filigreed ornaments to the dear old weather-beaten house, which to me had real consecration? What not the mass that overlaid its foundation stone better decorated to me than the most elaborate of carvings?

It was not my native home; it was my adopted one. But even when my eyes returned to it again from wandering, almost as though I had never always known it—as though I had not found that rest for which I had sighed, through sometimes weary years, been making for—as though the ship had entered her port, struck her sail, and made anchorage after the storm and stress: So I did not like the change, and told him so.

"Ho, ho! my boy, you are behind the time; the old house looks very well, as you say; but we must keep pace with the age—keep pace with the age—or else we shall be outstripped in the race!" Thus my father.

I went to the house. Etta was there. Etta was my wife, as you know. She went to live in the city. City air, even for the healthy country-bred woman, was not healthy; but it was well for her there: I could not see every day before my eyes the fading cheek, the sunken eyeball, the sharp, diminishing form; therefore I sent her again to the pure air, the freedom of her own native hill, and more than all, to feel—as true lovers of Nature feel—the unspeakable expansion of soul and elasticity of spirit to which alone she could rise.

It was not well.

I entered the low-ceiled kitchen, receiving a pleasant nod from Charity, the "help;" I passed into the little front parlor, where the old-fashioned paper curtains hung in the window, and to say by so many sweet memories, and there, upon the lounge, half reclining, half sitting up, was my wife. A look of pleasure flushed her cheek and gave it the semblance of health. She reached her hand, and I came and sat beside her. How long I had passed my leisure, cherishing the few hours of her society that I have recorded to me, I do not know. I furbanded the treasure of her presence before it should pass away forever. There was no need of enumeration in these hours—no need of hardly speech to break the stillness of our heart communion. The day and night were alike to us, except when sleeping at her side I have sometimes pondered in my own mind whether it could be a fresh and closer existence, or but the passing on from threshold, the lifting of the foot for the next step, ere we entered the land of heaven. Such is life could not last long; the very intensity of the spiritual power it possessed freed from the physical, until the body because weaker and weaker—until it hung, as in a balance, between life and death; as, like the Hebrideans, I entered on the air in a moment-time, it rose toward heaven, it came down to earth, and seemed waiting for the invisible hand only to gladden our sight once again.

Ah, how the flying months went on! how the dear winter lowered over the land, and how at last that we might make ready for his coming! It soon set in. The hushed stillness of the air, the locking of the forest trees, and the biting blast that, sweeping down the mountain side, hurled itself in unavailing fury against our cottage, did not alone give that yet wanted and went out from us. Human hearts lighted up within us. They relate our lives looked henceforward; for the thing over us, was the tempest that was to sweep away, and the sunshine that was to follow, and shuddered at its coming.

The last leaf had fluttered from the trees; the naked branches lashed the air, and where they grew near the house swept the sides with a harsh, grating sound; they flew over the frosty ground in heaps, and lay piled along the brook course, long since dried up, in many a furrow; and while the pulse of Nature seemed itself stopped, awaiting the great change, so, too, the life we cherished more than our own went out from among us, and grieved that endless throng that for ages have gone before her. What a life, and what a death! They were alike; both pure, both upright and holy. As the little sinless babe we clasp sleeping to our bosom smiles at us in its dreams, so her passing away was as gentle and soft as it.

I smiled. I was happy then.

I heard some one say: "Lucid, yes, she is dead."

I did but laugh.

Dead? she, my wife, dead? As if she could ever die—as if now she did not live ten-fold more strongly, more truly than ever in the clay.

I did not weep. I felt in child-like calm to stay here, in this palm; the rustling of her garments is near to me. I feel her breath stirring as my head as she bends, as of old, over me. Dead! who shall say it?

Said my father, as he took my hand with a look of deep anguish in his eye, "Dear boy, I sympathize with you; we all do; and though a most great affliction, you have our heartfelt pity, and I am sure love as much as ever."

He did not feel, as I did, the Divine presence; he did not see it, as I saw it, illumining the room, the face of Lucid before and softens my wrath. I can contest now. I never visit that old house but my wrath is to remain with me, and when the sun at evening lights up the west with his flame of gold. I know it is the door of her work and that sun went out on its pure light to guide me the more surely to her.

☞ SECOND SERIES NOVELS.—The most popular writer of our day has long been sought out in England as a very handsome edition of his writings, in beautiful 12mo form, clear type, and fine paper. The publishers have in similar issue of this edition as the recommendation. "This best edition of my works is, of right, inscribed to my dear friend, the author, foreigner of Oliver Goldsmith, in genuine remembrance of the many patient hours he has devoted to the correction of the proof-sheet of the original editions; and in affectionate acknowledgment of his warm sympathy, and faithful friendship during my whole literary life." Boston his well known literary taste has invested in this handsome volume a great many delightful papers that have never been collected in any edition of his works. Each volume will contain a complete tale—some more than twenty new things, in all, will be given in the series. Each of the engravings in this edition are carefully executed, and are very characteristic. If Dickens himself were to choose them, we could think no better. Meanwhile Tickner & Fields are the American agents of this charming edition, and will supply it to the trade on terms that they have the exclusive sale this side the water.—Boston Transcript.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HOME JOURNAL FOR 1859.

NEW SERIES—NEW ATTRACTIONS—NEW WRITERS.

MORRIS AND WILLIS, EDITORS.

A NEW SERIES of this widely-circulated FAMILY NEWSPAPER, will be commenced on the first day of January next—printed on fine paper and clear type.

With the January Number will begin the publication of a SERIES OF ORIGINAL Original Works of Fact and Fiction, written expressly for the Home Journal, by the best

Authors of America.

The first of these is from the pen of a gifted writer, and is a tale of love and home, entitled,

TWO WAYS TO WEDLOCK!

BY A LADY OF NEW YORK.

The scene is laid in this city during the memorable winter of the great fire. The incidents are natural and familiar, and the characters skilfully drawn and grouped; the plot is clearly defined and well-managed—the style easy, graceful, and flowing, and the denouement conveys a most useful lesson. It is a work of sterling merit.

This story will be followed by a "Tale of the South," and one of startling interest, by an eminent Southern author, called

THE AVENGER!

This production is entirely American in construction, plot, incident, dialogue, scene, tone, conclusion. It could not have been true of any other country, and possesses attractions of a peculiar nature for those "to the manor born." It is a specialty—a bonne bouche of remarkable value.

The third of this attractive series of American stories is

THE YOUNG WIFE'S DIARY!

BY A DAUGHTER OF THE WEST.

It contains the whole history of woman's trials, and will be read with the deepest feeling by all classes of the community.

These charming stories will be succeeded by others of a similar description, several of which are already in preparation.

All the former peculiar features of the paper, which have given it a world-wide reputation, will be continued, while the several new ones will give an infinite variety to its ever diversified pages. Among them are a number of fresh, spicy, amusing, which smack and relish of the wit, humor, raciness, brilliancy, and spirit of the times.

As heretofore, no labor nor expense will be spared to maintain the high reputation of the Home Journal, which in every where, both at home and abroad, acknowledged to be the most refined and elegant repertory of Literature and the Arts on this side of the sea, and the Best and Cheapest Family Newspaper

IN THE WORLD.

As no more copies of the new SERIES will be printed than are ordered, those who desire to begin with the commencement of the volume will be able to do so by forwarding their subscriptions without delay.

TERMS.—For one copy, $2; for three copies, $5—or one copy for three years, $5; for a club of seven copies, $10; for a club of fifteen copies, $20; and at that rate for a larger club—always in advance.

WHEELER & WILSON'S

SEWING MACHINES.

PRICES GREATLY REDUCED.

Office No. 505 Broadway, New York.

SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.

GOOD NEWS.—A reduction in the prices of Sewing Machines is announced in our advertising columns. Their utility is established beyond question, and at the present prices they will be found, as they ought to be, in every household. Seven varieties are manufactured, adapted to various purposes. So far as public opinion has been formed and uttered, the preference is emphatically accorded to the Wheeler & Wilson machine for family use, and for manufactures in the same range of purpose and material. During the present autumn the trials have been numerous, and all the patents of any pretension have been brought fairly into competition. In every case, the Wheeler & Wilson machine has won the highest premium. We may instance the State Fairs of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Virginia, Michigan, Indiana, Mississippi, Missouri, and Kentucky, the Fairs in Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, Baltimore, Richmond, and San Francisco. At the Fair of the St. Louis Mechanics Association, the Examining Committee was composed of twenty-five Ladies of the highest social standing, who without a dissenting voice, awarded to the Wheeler & Wilson Machine the highest and only premium, a Silver Pitcher, valued at $75. If these facts do not establish a reputation, we know not what can.—Christian Advocate and Journal.

STATUE OF SENATOR DOUGLAS, BY LEONARD W. VOLK, OF CHICAGO.

THE STATUE OF SENATOR DOUGLAS.

We engrave herewith the statue of Senator Douglas, which is being sculptured by Leonard W. Volk for the city of Chicago.

It will be remembered by all our subscribers that we gave a portrait of the Senator, with a pretty full biographical sketch, in No. 52 of the Weekly, about a year ago. Since then circumstances have increased Mr. Douglas's prominence. His gallant fight in Illinois, and the triumph in which it ended, the quasi-proscription which he seems to be enduring at the hands of the Administration, and the prospect that, at no distant day, he may fill the most conspicuous public position in the country, combine to render his "counterfeit presentment" peculiarly interesting to the public of the United States.

Mr. L. W. Volk, the author of the statue, is a young man of twenty-eight years of age, a native of New York State, and at present a resident of Chicago, Illinois. He studied his profession for two years at Rome, and is expected by his friends to take high rank among the noble corps which boasts of a Crawford, a Powers, a Palmer, and a Hosmer.

JOHN BRIGHT, ESQ.

THE portrait which accompanies these lines is that of one of the greatest and best Englishmen of the present day—JOHN BRIGHT. At the present time he is engaged in a fierce contest with many of the British aristocracy on the disputed question whether democracy in the United States is a failure or not; and his portrait, in connection with his late speeches, can not but be interesting to the people of this country.

Mr. Bright is a cotton-spinner by trade, the head of the firm of John Bright & Brothers, of Rochdale. His first appearance in public was about a quarter of a century ago, as a partisan of the abolition of the corn-laws, and the admission of foreign wheat into Great Britain free of duty. The question was clearly an issue between the aristocracy and the democracy of England: the former, being the principal land-owners of the country, desired to have protective duties levied on foreign breadstuffs, in order to be able to charge more for their land; the latter demanded cheap bread as all hazards. Mr. Bright was soon known as one of the champions of cheap bread; his extraordinary eloquence, his honesty, and his energy secured for him a leading place among the chiefs of the movement; he was chosen, in 1836, a member of the council of the Anti-Corn-Law League; in 1846, when the views of the league prevailed, and free-trade was established, Mr. Bright was unanimously considered as sharing with Mr. Cobden only the honors of the victory.

Three years previously, in 1843, he had purchased a seat in Parliament for Durham, and was chosen; at each session, to move the free-trade resolutions. In 1847 Manchester added him as her representative. He sat for that eminently democratic city for ten years, and, though always in a minority, won the repute of being the most eloquent man in Parliament. When the Russian war broke out he took decided ground against it. He was one of a deputation of Quakers who actually waited upon the Emperor Nicholas during the war, to protest against the action of the British Government. Whether Mr. Bright was right or wrong in this course (in this country the opinions of the masses were rather with than against him), there is no doubting that English people did not coincide with him. He became intensely unpopular, and lost his election for Manchester at the general election of 1857. He has, however, since been returned for Birmingham, which city he continues to represent in Parliament.

Mr. Bright was born in Lancashire in 1811, and is, therefore, only forty-seven years of age at the present time.

It was in the course of his agitation for Parliamentary reform and the introduction of the ballot into Great Britain that he made the speeches to which we refer above. In the last of them he says:

"I am not insensible to some things that appear to me to be errors in principle, some that are errors in practice, in the Constitution and the customs of the United States. But I protest against our being shut up to take nothing from America but cotton, and rice, and tobacco. And, in fact, we do take a good many other things. I am told that my friend, Mr. Platt, a member of a very eminent firm, has a wonderful machine from America with which to make bricks. We know that the agriculture of this country has been greatly advantaged by the importation of reaping machines from America. (Hear, hear.) We know that those persons who are going about an apprehension of a revolution have particular reason to be delighted with America, because they have received from that country the invention of the revolver. At this moment, in the Government small-arms establishment at Enfield, they have patent machinery from America for making gun stocks. They can turn out a gun stock; I am told, in twenty-two minutes fit for the barrel. What a dreadful thing to think of! (Laughter.) And I am sure that Mr. Miles, if his protectionist principles have not long ago deserted him, will be horrified to hear that they have actually brought Americans over to show the English how to work them. But there is much more behind. The Times, The Morning Star, The Daily Telegraph, and this leading newspaper in this district, The Manchester Daily Examiner, with, I believe, two or three of the widely-circulated London weekly papers, are all printed on machines which were either made in America, or, being made in this country, were made on the American patent. And further than this—don't you remember that the West-Enders, including even ladies, have been subscribing ten guineas apiece to invite a clever dancer from Ohio to show them how to dance a hornpipe? Any thing but politics. You may delight yourself with their charming polka—with Bryant, and Whittier, and Longfellow; you may interest and instruct yourself by their great historians—Bancroft, and Prescott, and Motley. But if you ask how free popular institutions are working among your own countrymen on the American continent, you are denounced as unpatriotic, and, at any rate, treasonable to the House of Lords. I will read a passage which was particularly galling to those gentlemen, from the report of my speech in Birmingham. It is but three lines. I said:

"Generally, in all the sovereign and independent States of America, there is a franchise as wide as that which I have proposed to-night. There is an exact and equal basis of members to the electors; and there is, throughout many of the States, the protection of the ballot; yet in America we find law, order, and property secure, and a population in the enjoyment of physical comforts and abundance such as are not known to the great body of the people in this country, and which have never been known in any country in any age of the world before."

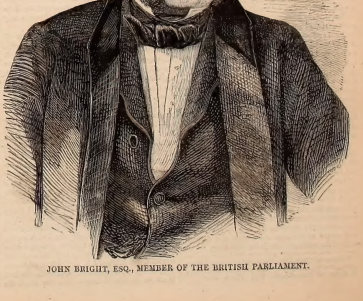
Now Lord John Russell, a short time ago, was at Liverpool, at a meeting of the Social Science Association, and he made a speech, many parts of which I think were most admirable and instructive. He referred to America in two particulars, and showed how, in the States of New York and Louisiana, the laws had been codified and simplified. He said that, with a few days' study, a man might make himself perfectly acquainted with the laws with regard to land and landed property. He did not see (and Lord John Russell is not afraid to look abroad on a matter of this kind) why an old country—I do not quote his own words—should be compelled to continue a system which was not necessary, and which it was found so advantageous to get on without in a new country. But he said this:

"It is education which enables the United States of America to proceed in their wonderful career, united by the most popular institutions, without serious disturbance of law and order."

I quote another nobleman—a most estimable man, too—a man who has done in his time great justice to the people and the institutions of the United States—the Earl of Carlisle. "Eight years ago, when the state of America was fresh in his mind, he delivered a lecture from which I have taken two extracts. Speaking of their elections, he says:

"Elections may seem the universal solution, the topic for universal discussion, the universal object with but few exceptions—carried on without any approach to tumult, rudeness, or disorder; these which I happened to see were the most sedate, undisquieted processes I can imagine. In the free states, at least, the people at large have no cabals, and I believe, on the whole, a useful part in all the concerns of internal government and practical daily life."

And then, speaking of the condition of the people, he said—and you will know how far it corroborates how far it exceeds even what I said—he says:



JOHN BRIGHT, ESQ., MEMBER OF THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT.

"The feature which is the most obvious, and probably the most inevitable, in the nearly entire absence, certainly of the appearance, in a great degree of the reality, of poverty. In no part of the world, I imagine, is there so much general comfort among the great bulk of the people; and a gushing sinkhouse struck me as the permanent character of the land.

"And then, with his own generous sympathy, he went on to say:

"It is not easy to describe how far this considerate gives to brighten the face of nature, and give room for the undisturbed enjoyment.'

"I can not, of course, help the fact that Lord Cathcart for a moment has fallen from his rather a foolish panic ideas I undertook to address my constituents at Birmingham. I can assure him, I do not wish to introduce American institutions here. But I want to argue this point—that the people of England are now in a condition which I would be just to them, and safe for all classes in the country, that they should be entirely intrusted with the possession of the elective franchise."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 8, 1859.

A PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE YEAR 1858.

THE Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY just concluded furnishes a complete Illustrated History of the Leading Events of the Year 1858. It contains nearly Nine Hundred Illustrations, of which over Seventy are Portraits of noted Men and Women, American and Foreign. Among the principal subjects extensively illustrated in this volume may be mentioned the Laying of the Atlantic Cable; the Progress of the Utah Expedition; Salt Lake City, and Mormon Life; the United States Paraguay Expedition; the Chinese War, together with the doings of Americans in China and Japan; the most remarkable Scenes and Localities in the great Indian Rebellion; Japanese Customs; Outrages on American Shipping; the Fraser River Gold Fields; American Prison Life; Scenes in the Arctic Seas; the beginning of the troubles; Earthquake Scenes in Italy; new American built Ships, &c. &c.; together with artistic Illustrations of numerous characteristic traits of American Life, such as Fashionable Life at the Summer Resorts—Newport, Saratoga, &c., &c.; Watering Excursions; Regattas; Picnics; Thanksgiving, Christmas, and New Year's Scenes; Loafing, Corn-Husking, and other Sketches of American Industrial Life, &c., &c. Besides which are given a great number of Engravings illustrating every other important occurrence of the Day. The articles accompanying these illustrations are prepared with care, and form full and reliable accounts of the subjects illustrated. The WEEKLY contains, besides the best Tales and Poetry of the Day, a Serial by a first-class Author, interesting Essays on Topics of general Interest, an interesting Chess Chronicle, &c. The two pages of Foreign and Domestic News and Gossip furnish a rich Summary of the Year. The same form a complete Anecdotal History of the Year.

To the Volume is added a Complete Index, both of matter and Illustrations.

The Volume now bound up forms, therefore, a complete and most interesting Pictorial History of the Year just passed, easily referred to, interesting in its various details, and invaluable to all. 4to. Muslin gilt, $3.50.

MEXICO.*

THIS is a simple and interesting account of the fate and fortunes of the Mexican Republic as it is called, during the years 1856 and 1857, from the inauguration of Alvarez to the fall of Comonfort. The book is well written; and we only regret that it is not translated, so as to be within the reach of the reading public generally, as it gives a better picture of the actual state of Mexico than any thing that has been recently published.

The volume presents a lively portrait of the most wretched condition to which a once highly civilized and prosperous country can be reduced. A lawless and violent soldiery, an intriguing clergy, an ignorant and heterogeneous population, a parliament of demagogues, and an empty treasury—and, amidst all these elements of strife and ruin, the people themselves are of honest men, who are doing what little they can to arrest the disasters impending over their country. The picture is a painful one, the more so because drawn without any effort whatever at artistic effect or exaggeration. The chief facts, indeed, of the narrative are indisputably true.

But of all the results at which the mind of the reader will arrive in perusing these pages, that which stands out in the boldest relief is the immense political influence of the Catholic clergy in Mexico—an influence, too, as pernicious as it is vast. This fact, not sufficiently taken into view by those of our people who have not seen Mexico with their own eyes, is made curiously apparent in Mr. Portilla's narrative.

Comonfort's government began, continued, and ended at war with the clergy, and the details of the strife are well worth following. Under the Presidency of Alvarez, in 1855, a law had been passed, called (after the Minister who presented it) the law Juarez, prohibiting all ecclesiastical jurisdiction in civil matters. This gave rise to an insurrection against Comonfort's government which took place at Puebla in February and March, 1856. The revolt, sustained by the contributions of the clergy, was soon put down; the principal of the Bishop's sequestrated, and the Bishop himself banished; but the Priests made the best of his way to Mexico, and there contrived to give Comonfort more trouble than ever he could have done in Mexico.

In June, 1856, Lerdo, then Minister of Finance, introduced the law known as the Ley Lerdo, framed to liberate the immense properties in the hands of the clergy. It would be very valuable to have the details of this law, a note now in the hands of the Church in Mexico. Humboldt, in 1805, gives the rental of eight of the Mexican sees as amounting to $650,000, or an average of nearly $70,000 per annum. The last half century has no doubt added greatly to their private if not their actual wealth. This law, of course, brought out the clergy in full force, and the usual cry was raised that the Holy Religion, Religion, etc. The Archbishop of Mexico denounced it vehemently, and the Bishops of the opposition by every means in their embarrass, if not to paralyze, the Government in regard to one of its most important measures.

But the clergy did not confine themselves to polemics. In September, 1856, a regular insurrection was organized in the capital in the interest of the clergy. The bells were pulled throughout by the clergy, and the Government was compelled to surround and close the convents, to arrest the friars, and to suppress the institution itself.

The promulgation of the Constitution of 1857 brought the clergy to their most decisive activity. That Constitution which, whatever its defects, certainly contained many important propositions, enhanced greatly the power of the clergy. It, in Sec. I., Art. 3. Liberty of Instruction; Art. 4. Denial of legal validity to monastic vows; Art. 5. Prohibition of the Order of Jesuits; Art. 27. Restriction of religious corporations as to holding real estate.

The announcement of these great principles of civil and religious freedom aroused the Church to the most extreme degree of fanaticism. Bishops and archbishops protested against it, and then high to low, from the judges of the Supreme Court to the humblest official, absolutely refused to swear by the ministers of religion to all who swore to this Constitution. It would be difficult to find in the Middle Ages a more striking example of the interference of the Church in the affairs of State.

Things went still further, and on Thursday, in the Holy Week of 1857, the Archbishop of Mexico, apparently desirous to offer a gratification to the Holy Sepulchre, excommunicated the Governor of the city from the Cathedral. For this gross offense the Archbishop was confined to the Palace for a short time.

In April, 1857, the law of parish payments to the Church (Obvenciones Parroquiales) forbidden, and the payment of the clergy thrown upon the Government on the part of the Church. This law, passed in the interest of the lower classes, to protect them from the exactions of the rapacious shepherds, prohibited the clergy from levying any fees except on baptism, marriage, and burials of that class of the population which was in the habit of using thereby the class of day-laborers. This touched the Church deeply. In some places the law was not alleged to be enforced, and in others it was torn down; in others hostile manifestoes were put up; and in every way the population was invited to oppose the Government.

Finally, the Holy Father himself at Rome, in an allocution delivered in the College of Cardinals, gave the coup de grace to Comonfort's government by declaring that the Mexican Church solemnly persecuted by the Government in Mexico, and that the proposed Constitution was only the instrument of persecution.

And in January, 1858, the government of Comonfort was overthrown. Whether he was equal to the occasion, the situation is doubtful. We have not sought to inquire whether he was to be mild in his policy, nor do we step to ask particular explanation of the circumstances which the Constitution of 1857 can be in any way excused.

What this volume of Mr. Portilla signally proves—what we have wished to call attention to—is the wholly immediate nature of the Mexican disease. Of this nation a great characteristic of the Church is one of the most alarming features, and to that we have in these paragraphs desired to draw attention. The Church, worse, if possible, remain behind. A heterogeneous population, a debased clergy, the great wealth belonging to an inferior race, utterly destitute of instruction, is clothed with the right of suffrage, and thus intrusted with an equal share of political power—a lawless rabble of soldiery on an utterly disorganized administration—a Congress of demagogues, all joined with a rich, fanatical, and intriguing Church, present a state of things that the Goddess of Discord could not improve. It is absurd in the highest degree to expect any internal cure of these evils. There is no sic medicatrix natura that can reach the case. The remedy for Mexico must come from without.

When a government shall be presented to that unhappy country strong enough and wise enough to make itself at once loved and feared; rich enough to control intriguing priests, and to support itself till the internal resources can be developed; powerful enough to uphold the real interests of the country, and to strike terror into the hearts of the robbers and highwaymen who call themselves soldiers and generals; wise enough to give Europe and our own republic without pandering to the mere madness of demagogues—when such a government shall grasp the reins of Mexican affairs, then, and not till then, will that rich and beautiful country arise from her degradation.

Europe shall this new life come? Shall America stretch out her helping hand, or shall that work be done by England or by France? A decision must be made, and that speedily.

THE QUARANTINE QUESTION.

RESIDENTS in the neighboring States may not be aware of the importance which attaches to the Quarantine question in this city, which has just been settled by Governor King. But, in fact, it was a matter of evening moment to the commerce of the metropolis of the United States.

For fifty years the Quarantine hospitals have been situate on an island within six miles of the city of New York. When they were first established there was no other quarantine station established. Of late years the growth of the city has compelled settlement on all the adjacent shores, and the island on which the hospitals were placed has been chosen as a residence by thousands of city merchants and others. Recently, fierce controversies have been exhibited, and within the past six or eight years the communication between the island and the city has been rapid, owing to the necessity for the purposes of contagion or infection, the hospitals could not have been more noxious to the city had they been planted on the Battery or in front of the City Hall.

Had the acts of the legislature been honestly carried out, had the Quarantine physicians been fairly administered, it may be doubted whether any positive injury would have been inflicted on the city by constant intercourse with the hospitals. But, in fact, the laws have been so flagrantly disobeyed, and the Quarantine regulations so shamefully set at naught, that the fears of the controlling authorities had been to diminish confidence their conduct could not have differed widely from that which has actually pursued. The office of Health Officer of the port of New York has been one of remunerative offices which are remunerated by fees—to conceive the most lucrative public bestowed as the reward of political services rather than necessary requirements or professional merit. As a natural consequence, the fortunate politician who wins it regards it as a means of making money, and as that only. He will suffer his employés to go direct from the death-bed of yellow fever patients to the most fashionable parlors. He will—for what consideration we are left to conjecture—suffer yellow fever vessels to anchor in the upper bay instead of the lower bay which sanction excessive charges for lighterage, and so forth. He will, in short, do every thing which will bring money, and nothing that is merely calculated to serve the public interest. And in so doing, he will not only neutralize the beneficent effects of the Quarantine, but will actually aid the dissemination of disease. Considering the circumstances of his appointment, this course he could hardly act otherwise. We can not expect to find pure water in a mud hole, or honest men in sinks of political corruption.

From the day, therefore, that uninterrupted communication between the city and the Quarantine hospitals was established, and that the commence of the port rendered the post of Health Officer the key to a very lucrative golf, the existence of these hospitals became a fatal injury to the trade of New York. Not a summer passed but the yellow fever was introduced into the city. Properly treated, in a proper locality, they would never spread contagion. Immured in the present Quarantine hospitals, under the control of a party political Health-officer, they have uniformly proved seeds of pestilence. Every year the yellow fever has spread from the hospitals and the anchorage to the city and its populous suburbs, and has actually commenced within the city. Every year has been a panic, which not only drives useful citizens away from their homes and their business, but has created a mercantile panic from which New York to make their fall purchases. An experienced merchant has estimated the damage done to the trade of New York by the regularly recurring yellow fever panic at twenty millions of dollars a year.

Such being the case, the hospitals would have been removed long ago but for the opposition of the shipping-merchants. It is hardly worth while to bandy epithets; all classes of men, in this world, are selfish enough; but the annals of history may be vainly ransacked for a parallel to the selfishness of men who, in order to have their vessels anchored a few miles nearer their offices, were willing to jeopard the lives of their fellow-citizens and the business of the port. Such was the course pursued by the shipping-merchants of New York. But for their efforts, but for the money they spent to achieve their aim, the Quarantine hospitals would have been removed three or four years ago, and the last three yellow fever panics would have been avoided. One of these, in 1856, was a joke, and the other good men who died of the disease a couple of years ago would have been alive among us; the commerce of the city, according to the merchants estimate, would have been forty millions of dollars greater.

It has been left for Governor John A. King to redeem the errors which he committed when a municipal officer from falling into the very error into effect the Act for their removal. They are to be moved to an island to be made on Orchard Shoal, a mere sandy bank, and that about three miles southwest of the Narrows. The money has already been appropriated; the work of construction on the island will probably be commenced forthwith. Let us hope that this will be the last of this troublesome question.

THE DUELLO.

THERE is a law in this State which declares that not only he who fights a duel, but he who gives or accepts a challenge, or is the accessory to the sending or accepting of a challenge, is guilty of a crime penally punishable by fine and imprisonment. Under this law two gentlemen—a wit, the brother of the present Secretary of State, Dr. Tucker, and a Member of Congress from the State of New York, Mr. Daniel E. Sickles—have rendered themselves liable to arrest and commitment, if not to condign sentence. As yet they have not been arrested. Neither of the gentlemen have been arrested. The only papers, usually such faithful reporters of the events of the day, have not yet received their examination before a Justice; nor has any one been apprized of the period at which their examination will come on. In fact, they have not been molested in any manner. Though they have fought half a dozen epistolary duels, and have held their bodies for at least one hot-headed blood encounter, the sluggish officials of this county have not yet awakened to their duty. Nor will they, unless so urged by the press or by Law Both gentlemen, so far as the public are aware, are enjoying the holidays in peace.

Under the late session of the Legislature to this fact. For, if the officials have done their duty, then it should be retain the bounding duel on the statute book; and if the officials have not done their duty—which, in one of the challenges in this case was actually sent through the papers, would be a fact blush, to have been the case—it surely devolves on the Legislature to institute some sort of inquiry into the circumstances.

To the mean while it may be remarked that the duel is every day losing its power to discredit. It has not been raised in public estimation by the use to which it has been put by certain leading politicians. For instance, Senator Douglas, of Illinois, is a prominent candidate for the Presidency. He is a leading Democrat, and could probably obtain a larger and larger democratic vote than any other member of his party. His course on the Kansas question, however, has made him the cause and support of thousands of persons who are opposed to the democracy. It is a common saying that he is the only Democrat who could carry the county in 1860. He has just achieved a remarkable victory over the Republicans and the Administration in the city of Illinois. Under the circumstances, his existence is very inconvenient to aspiring democratic politicians. They do not like to kill the man whose chances are now infinitely slender might compete, with some prospect of success, for the democratic nomination of 1860.

This being his position, the public can not but regard the hostile approaches which Senator Slidell is reported to have made to him as a very unfavorable light. Senator Slidell is a well known Democrat, to whom personal encounters and duels are matters of course. He is doubtless highly skilled in the use of dueling weapons. Senator Douglas is not likely to know any thing about pistols. If Senator Slidell persuades his colleague to "go out" with him, the chances are that the latter will be killed. And we are bound to say that the present aspect of affairs encourages unchristianlike persons in the belief that Senator Douglas is not by any means determined to force a duel on Mr. Douglas—with what intent, every one can conjecture for himself.

For our part we will say no more than this: we should like to see the State legislature do their duty in the Tucker-Sickles affair, and we should like to see some successful duelist from Washington severely hanged. If any noisy orator can deprive the country of the services of such a man as Senator Douglas, by provoking him into an encounter in which he can gain nothing and may lose his life, this is not a civilized country.

THE LOUNGER.

THACKERAY AND YATES.

THIS difficulty is in a fair way of being privately and quietly settled, as every friend of the parties concerned must wish. The London Times is very severely upon "the strut of living satirists," for laying into a rags with no small a writer for so small an offence; and musclizes upon the fact that a man who had so remorselessly delineated the manners and personality of Sir Lucrot Bulwer Lytton should make so utterly from the least exposure.

The cases, however, are not parallel. There is surely a difference between a literary sketch steeped in evident satiric extravagance, as were all Thackeray's epistles of Mr. Yates, and a deliberate, personal description, derived from a club acquaintance.

Besides, Bulwer was the most striking illustration in literature of the spirit which Thackeray was every where attacking; and he had a certain moral right to make as much fun as he chose. And yet, that Thackeray knew all the while that Bulwer belongs to him, will the render eager to declare that Mr. Yates has served his right, coincider the following passages from the preface to the American reprint of his rhimer and earlier writings:

"The caricature was never written at the period, and never was since the public's boy carried them away, and brought back and laid at the door of the author, who, as I said, forgot or disown his own children.

"Why were some of the little knots brought out of their obscurity? I—am to a little, and to make but flowers in reviewing some of these unknown juvenile creatures which the public good-nature has long established. There are two performances especially among the critical and literary articles which I have seen Mr. Yellow-Plush, which I am very sorry to see reprinted; and I will speak with shame and grief for one for a pamphlet which I have be himself has forgiven, and which I trust I have forgotten.

"I had never seen that ancient writer but once in public when this name was given to me, and to the recklessness of the young man who could fancy such personality was harmless jocularity, and never calculate that it might give pain. The best experiences of my life have been gained since that time of youth and gayety and careless laughter. I wished to them, perhaps, because I would not have any kind and friendly American reader judge of me by what was written in a former year.

After this will my body urge his sarcasm upon Bulwer in palliation of Mr. Yates's satire upon him?

And how vividly the little foregoing extract illustrates the cold, hard, grinning, sneering, caustic direction of human nature which is the favorite view of Thackeray!

And yet, despite the kind apology and explanation, Atticus is he!

MR. OTATOR DICKENS.

DICKENS has just made another of the speeches in which he excels as in writing, and reading, and acting. The speech was not a very good speech. It is undeniable that he is popularly accounted the first author of England, and it is a fair question whether he is not the best reader of books. But Gladstone is the most solid parliamentary orator, and Mr. Disraeli is the most witty. Both have a many gush of humorous sympathy in all the public speeches of Dickens which in a hundred times more agreeable than the shallow-brained and flippant oratory of the sharp, diamond-lipped sarcasms which Disraeli delivers. In public speaking Dickens seems to touch the same chord in the popular heart that Mr. Becher does.

On the present occasion he was chairman of a meeting in Manchester to distribute prizes to successful pupils in the evening schools established entirely of mechanics and laboring men. He begins in this rollicking, good-humored way:

"It has of late been written and spoken in England that the salmon season produces an immense amount of public speaking. I notice that the salmon begin to leave off to go to fall from the trees then pearls of great price begin to fall from the lips of the wise men of the East and North, West and South; and so it appears to be the case by the bushel for the picking up. (Laughter.) Now, whether the cause be that the fish are all exhausted or otherwise on this crop, as it is by some supposed to have had upon the corn harvest in the early visitings of the hare. But I do know that I have never observed the columns of the newspapers to be under the hearth for the pressure of matters, each vying with the other in the two qualities of length and of nothing to be said in the matter in hand—(Laughter)—and of being always addressed to any audience but the right one, and always the audience to which it was delivered. (Hear, hear.)

Proceeding to speak of the title of the Association, he says:

"I have been for some years pretty familiar with the terms 'Mechanics' Institution,' 'Mechanics' Institute,' but they have unfortunately too often become associated in my mind with a high flown and inflated notion of some important member or other, which generally made something done for it, and which, in the end, left generally infinite a new house much too large for it, and with no very solvent pad for, and which takes the name of the mechanics mere pegs to hang their hats on, usually upon a mechanic and a desk in that place together. (Laughter.)

He then gives a lucid and lively account of the working of the institution and of the examination;

"I have looked over a few of the examination papers. They comprise history, geography, grammar, arithmetic, book-keeping, decimal exchange, mensuration, mechanics, social economy, the French language—in fact, they comprise all the hyper-branches of the tree of knowledge. I felt most devoutly grateful, as to many of them, that the tree had not been planted in my garden. (Laughter.) For I am perfectly clear that if they had been, I should have had no other time to bestow upon anything else but weeding. (Laughter.) And yet it is always to be observed, and solemnly remembered, that these examinations were undergone by people whose lives have been passed in a continual fight for bread, and whose whole existence has been a constant wrestle with those twin fathers of the daring heart—low birth and iron fortune. (Applause.)"

He goes on with a capital account of instances of already resolution in many, and after laughing at the exploded theory that knowledge is a dangerous thing for the laboring class, and pleading for the elevating influence of works of imagination, he concludes:

"The Divine Teacher was as gentle and considerate as He was powerful and wise. You all know how He would still the raging of the sea, and could bath a little child. As the utmost results of the wisdom of man can only be at best to help to raise the hearts of meditation to which He destroys, saturated by the tenderness and the pureness of men, would have excited it long ago, and by the same token would have left no room for unbending the understanding and the imagination; and which, following in His steps, we trust in His name may help our race on to its better and best days. (Applause.) Gentlemen, I have detained you too long. I am sure I am limited poor indeed when it informs the head alone. Let us have the heart and the head in this hour. It is a power over life and death, and the body and the soul, and the immortal destinies. (Prolonged applause, during which Mr. Dickens resumed his seat.)"

MORE GOSSIP ABOUT AUTHORS.

PEOPLE naturally like to know about their favorites; and the English Spectator, which was fond of laughing at the foreign taste for gossip, kept John Bull constantly supplied with the domestic article. And now the desire for personal knowledge is one of the most natural and human consequences of intellectual activity. The Frenchman anchors not as mental entities merely, but as living men and women. How charming to know something, if we may, about Shakespeare's life! There is really so little detail of it, that a reader of sensitive mind is constantly annoyed that the person ought not to correct, and in bolder moments piquingly deny that Shakespeare was the author of Shakespeare's plays.

Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall—Samuel Carter Hall—are not unknown as literary literary literary. Mr. Hall founded and still edits the Art Journal, and Mrs. Hall has written Irish stories and various sketches of considerable merit. Mr. and Mrs. Hall have had his lately delivered two lectures in London, in the literary performances of which especially Mrs. Opie, Thomas Moore, Miss London, James Hogg, and Thomas Hood. He read the last letter Mary ever written to Shelley's landlady, and Hood, which excited profound feeling in the audience.

Mr. and Mrs. Hall personally know all these people; and there is more talk of other famous ones in reserve.

Wordsworth, too, is coming to his typographical apotheosis. Professor Wilson "will never do" as now being done in "an exceedingly beautiful edition, as splendid as thick, prepared paper, fine typography, printing in colors, and binding, and photographic pencils of Noel Humphreys and Birket Foster can make it." Lord Jeffrey upon his velvet-covered tables of palaces, or at the feet of your mistress.

If great poets are not immediately recognized nowadays, they do not have to wait long for their immortality.

NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "TOM BROWN'S SCHOOL DAYS."

MR. THOMAS HUGHES, who wrote the charming and popular book called "Tom Brown's School Days," just published in London another work, called "The Scouring of the White Horse," which is the name of a level on the downs of Berkshire, and Gloucestershire, where the rude figure of a huge white horse is cut on the hill-side, and is occasionally scoured to preserve it properly.

A London clerk goes down to the Vale of the White Horse to recuperate his health, and there he hears old country legends, and old English sports, and plenty of pure country talent. It is a thoroughly and locally English book of the kind to rejoice the heart of Lord John Manners and that class of Young England which thinks that old national sports are essential to British greatness.

Therefore I say that wrestling, inasmuch as it is a severe trial of manly courage and endurance, may be, and ought to be, one of many right and proper ways of opening England's purse to the hill-fold, and I say to any man who has strength for it, and can keep his temper, and accept with a good heart the thoughts if he wins, and no angry or revengeful thoughts if he loses, I say try all sports.

There are some songs in the book skillfully written in the provincial patois, two of which we quote.

This is the song of a carter:

CUPID'S GARDEN.

"As I was a-goin' down Lunnon Road
Not nowest nor hall an hour,
'T was dry I was, and dry I be now,
Zittin under Gi-ble's tower,
A-gallerin of wery pennorth o' mild
The lilly and the rose.
There be the fairest flowers
As in the garden grow.

"I vondly stopped to one o' them,
Them nowest of the lot,
Do you engaged to arn young man,
Comes to-it-to, I prays.'
I be not engaged to narra young man,
I minds my business,
And all the lan-est wear.'

"Zays I, 'My stars and gar-ters!
This here's a pretty go,
Yer a vine young mayd as never was
To zat zich talk I know.'
But the Cuffer young may-den looked sty at me,
And turned all colors—red
Zays she, 'Let mee and I go our own ways,
And we'll let she go alone.'"

THE SONG OF THE SUMMERLEISURE SWIP GLADIVER.

"Chaw a' Zummerzeadze men
Coom here to hire a hin' o' vem.
Co'll tip a hind! I be zad around
Co nop nun so modzer's zun.

"Chaw a gramper roll and laugh,
Will hoveal dose all the country side,
And nanny a lusty lubberzides
To hoak my yead her vokes tried.

"Who's ver a hoat a vriendly gaap,
An never should to anger move?
Rich spowrts were only meanted ver thuzy
An thice their nonzarts broke for love."

AN IRISH VIEW OF LOLA MONTES.

THIS lady is about to lecture in Ireland upon America. It must be agreeable to her to commence her Irish career in the manner stated by the Irish Vindicator, of Galway; and it is delightful to us that the judgment of the Irish and not Thackeray should at last be rendered us by Lola Montes.

"The Countess was received with every attention and respect by the Irish gentlemen of the county, and was feasted on the arrival of the vessel. She wore a flounced dress with short sleeves, and over it a robe de chambre trimmed with a beaver fur. Her honest way of speaking, her unaffected manners, and a few hours' stay, and she were a richly jeweled Maltese cross. In appearance she is a prepossessing lady, unpretending and agreeable. What had the pleasure of being introduced to her by Captain Meade, and we can assure our readers that her bearing is quite the reverse of that high-flying, haute-volaptuous character of which some of our lady-like contributors have been accustomed to represent her as the type. This she is a 'strong-minded woman,' as the American phrase goes, describes such persons; there is no nonsense of doubt; she would tell you so herself. But that the quiet and cheering expression of her features, and the graceful and lady-like style of her conversation, have convinced us that the gush of quiet humor and fun, would at once entitle the admiration of every one in her way. If, however, about this time next year's Lola Montes be in the act of delivering lectures in Dublin, Cork, Limerick, Clonmel, Belfast, and Galway, about 'America—its People and its Social Institutions,' and she added a few of her own experiences in that country, but not as they have been misrepresented by Mr. Dickens, Mr. Mayne Reid, Mr. Thackeray, and others who have already 'done them.'"

THE LAST BUBBLE OF BRUNNEL.

SIR FRANCIS HEAD once wrote a capital book upon life at a small German mineral spring. He wrote another upon the "Bubbles of Canada" letters," full of pictures and statistics of railway life in England; and he has now written a book, and something about Ireland, and something else about Canada.

In all these books he appears as a testy, truculent, but extremely entertaining and shrewd John Bull. His last book is merely a reprint of the London Times, in which he figures as an extremely absurd John Bull. It seems that the Lord Sir Francis met about with the Emperor Napoleon, but that Louis Napoleon "can not be an altogether safe man to deal with." Because he bought all that eats and sleeps in France, while he knows that all that thinks and feels is relentlessly against him.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—NOBODY writes the Lounger a letter of complaint, to which he would reply if he could know the detailed circumstances. If any person will instruct the name of the article to the Lounger, he will inquire and answer. Certainly there can not justly be complaint of any bookseller, as to his courteous, upon the ground of too great length, in a communication. The Lounger's own experience informs him that a good paper want sometimes be returned because it is too long. Will NOBODY be kind enough to write decidedly; and can any body more clearly see the accessory prejudice against an anonymous letter upon such a topic than NOBODY himself?

—QUILOTES, Montgomery, Alabama, will find

"My only books
Were woman's looks,
And Folly's all they've taught me"

in the songs of Thomas Moore.

Will any friend of the Lounger tell who is the author of the line—

"To die is best to land upon some silent shore?"

—TRAP, of Pittsburgh, complains of the epithet "almighty" used in a communication to the Lounger some time since. But it is not necessarily blasphemous. "The almighty dollar" is only a strong, and a forcible, expression, and is often applied in broad buidness to a Lounger it is not properly conversable. The disposition to find impropriety in a harmless use of the most vigorous if any dangerous, because it tends to confound the shadow with the substance. When Longfellow sings

"Put Catawba wine
Has a taste more divine" does TRAP think him blasphemous? And yet divine is only as correct a word as almighty.

—J. H., of Sandy, approves of the Lounger's late reply to D. G., who wished to relinquish keeping books and take to writing books. J. H. says:

"I was born of poor parents—had but a few months of common school education—worked hard on a farm until twenty years old am now thirty-three. I have now a respectable business—am married in my own college—have written essays for various papers, and poems that have been considered good enough to be inserted in the leading papers of New England. I have corresponded with the best papers, and learned seven years, visiting all the principal cities in the Union."

He says the secret is "patient perseverance" which the Lounger heartily commends to his friend and correspondent, D. G.

—L., Fayetteville, Lincoln County, Tennessee, wishes to ask if it is grammatical to say a list of publications with "——(publisher's name) will send either of the following works," etc. "I merely ask for information. Now down here in Tennessee, we hear of things being 'mighty big' and 'mighty little,' 'mighty long' and 'mighty short.' We also hear of our neighbors 'making a good many molasses;' and we hear some of our public speakers say, 'He acts like he is crazy;' and we are not at all startled, nor do we find much shocking, when we hear our learned Judge talk of 'the Court of Rushes;' because we have not all the advantages that you enjoy; but some of us occasionally look into a grammar, and when we see a work as valuable as the one I allude to, it is very natural to ask the Editor and wiseacre."

L. will find that the publisher is quite correct in his use of the word. Either signifies "one or another of two persons," as well as "each of two." In the same way it may refer to any one of several persons; as in the line from Pope's Essay on Man, "Either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is on a journey, or perhaps he sleepeth."

—C. P. Coupe, Louisiana, proposes a problem:

"What difference is made in eating eggs when required to bolt two lines of brass between two points two hundred yards west. The line to be built on a dead level thereabouts, and the other through a hill, the two latitudes of which make a perfect right angle, with the vertex midway between the two points? Also, which leaves the peats to be preponderator in the horizon, and for fern leaves, and the sun to be under the pillage who perpendicular to the horizon, and two inches wide, and the space between them one inch, measuring horizontally."

—"MANY ANXIOUS INQUIRERS," in Coldwater, Michigan, ask for the name of the poet or writer of the tribution to the World, of which paper they speak very generously. It is a case in which nothing can be done. If we do not know, we can learn every thing that might be asked about every thing in his paper, he would find no time to write it. "MANY ANXIOUS INQUIRERS" must overlook what did not please them, on the ground that generally they are pleased.

—The Lounger's venerated friend, the Easy Chair of "Harper's Magazine," has sent him the following letter, which the E. C. says it received from Upper Duck Island:

"It is not at that year Magazine should teach fashion and on such simple questions as the year of the year when the egg of trees been finally; yet in your last number the great writer of the Editor's Easy Chair, speaking the doctrine that maple sugar is gotten from the sap of the sugar-tree. He tells us that George was an ish say to his house from Mount Vernon, and that when the leaves were beginning to be dyed with the resperfrers began to fall. Now, Mr. Editor, these remarks, page 19, 'At this time of the year the leaves are live by the sugar-tree and the resperfrers from the pine.' Mr. Thackeray could no more get sugar from the resperfrers than he could get liquid from a tree's rosin. Now a piece of ignorance like this is shameful in a man writing himself up for a Scientific American as Mr. Thackeray does. Yours respectfully,

"J. G. J."

The Lounger has a friend who will not eat an oyster or biscuit for lunch, because, he says, "it is disgraceful to eat the whole history of the Egyptian in operation for a darned cracker." In like manner, it seems to the Lounger hardly worth while to cavil at such a letter as this, which is so slight a slip. What is "falsehood," Mr. "J. G. J.?" It is what is willful deception in any person or thing. Well, do you suppose Mr. Thackeray intended to deceive us Americans about the time of getting maple sugar? or the English, about the Egyptian? Mr. Thackeray, or any lucky else, cares two straws when maple-sugar is made? Besides, you call it "falsehood" in the first line, and "a piece of ignorance" in the last. But if it be the one it can not be the other. The truth is, it is a careless statement, easily enough corrected, and not involving the least evidence of any person or thing.

To the assertion that Thackeray "eats himself up" as a teacher of manners, it is answered, on the other hand, that few authors do it so little. The whole tone of his writings is the reverse. "You are a snob, sir," Thackeray says to a reader; "if we don't be talking loftily about falsehoods and ignorance," he says to his wife, let us all turn to and attend to our own teams!"

—S. A. F., of Carrollton, Green County, Illinois, writes us a pleasant, complimentary letter, in which she says, "Will you write for Harper's Magazine Hood, dear Miss. S. A. F. also wishes to know the names of all the editors and writers in the Monthly and Weekly. Upon the last number of the Magazine she will find some of them—and the rest wear masks for a good purpose.

—Carrie, in the most delicate Italian hand, requests the Lounger to write upon "Autumn Fruit," published a few numbers since in the Lounger. Miss Carrie, Miss Carrie, you are beginning a note of literary fault-finding, do you spell the day of the week in this way—Tuesday?

Yes sir!

—MICHIGANDER apostrophizes the Evening Star:

"Thou orb of glory! from thy far-off home Thou comest!"

The rest are "sunk to the bottom."

—The poet who writes to Minnie Gray

"Beneath the willow's bending shade," shall have the secret of his verses closely kept.

—OZARK, St. Louis, is thanked, and his contribution "respectfully declined."

—GERMAINE sings the woes of Dissolution:

"When banished by dissolution—
Fair Freedom, and her reign—
The hated Queen, of scorpion mien,
Shall treat our necks again."

The subject does not seem to inspire.

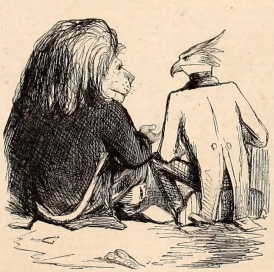
PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE FAMOUS CENTRAL AMERICAN BONE, LIKEWISE OF THE LION, AND THE EAGLE, AND THE COCK, AND THE FILIBUSTER WHO QUARRELED ABOUT THE BONE.

The Lion and the Eagle, after many angry disputes about the Bone, enter into a sacred and solemn (Clayton-Bulwer) compact with each other, never on any account to touch the Bone; and thereto plight they their troth.

But the bargain is no sooner concluded than the roguish Lion, on his way home, slyly endeavors to drag the Bone along with him.

Whereat the justly indignant Eagle pounces fiercely on the Bone; both parties prepare for serious hostilities, and the Daily Bladder strikes terror into the Lion by publishing a fresh statement of our naval forces.

On receipt of that copy of the Daily Bladder the Lion humbly apologizes, and refers, in accordance with the laws of ethnology and natural history, to "a common tongue, a common faith, and a common origin."



The Eagle, greatly mollified, says no more about naval forces, and sits down calmly with the Lion to devise some means of disposing of the pestilent bone.

Meanwhile a full-bellied Cock steps up, and, finding the Bone succulent and tempting, claws it, and crows amazingly about the meals he will presently make off the Bone.

A reckless Filibuster, too, talking of manifest destiny, and smelling of gunpowder, clutches the Bone; but him the Lion and the Eagle chase off with insult and obloquy.

To avoid further mischief—in the interest of civilization, and humanely desirous of averting a fatal conflict between the Filibuster and the Cock, the Lion quietly seizes the Bone and walks off with it.

Dismay and disgust of the Eagle and the Cock, who, after all their talk and trouble, find the Bone securely in the clutch of the Lion.

GENERAL JACKSON'S DUEL WITH DICKINSON.

THOSE born and reared in the immediate vicinity of spots renowned for remarkable events, for the residence of the great, or on account of the wonderful works of Art or Nature which may be there located, seldom duly appreciate, and sometimes even fail to apprehend, the claims which such persons or places may lay on the well-merited homage of mankind.

With such sentiments was I impressed on the occasion of a visit which I happened lately to make in an adjoining county of another State, upon the seduction that I first saw the light, and had lived almost to middle age, within a short day's ride of the dueling ground rendered historical by the single combat between the military hero and statesman sage, General Jackson, and the fondly influenced but truly unscrupulous marksman, Dickinson; and that, too, without being ever before induced by curiosity or my boundless admiration for the immortal patriot to enter upon so short a pilgrimage.

Just fifty years ago two young men, one a plowboy of fifteen, had just reached the scene of their daily labor on a cool, calm, bright morning in April. They were the sons of an emigrant who had lately removed west of the Alleghanies, and settled in what is now Logan County, Kentucky; just where the middle fork of Red River crosses the line between that State and Tennessee. Scarcely had the lad taken hold of his rude implement to begin his daily task—for the sun had barely lifted itself above the tangled horizon—when his ear was startled by the sharp cracks of two pistols down the river, and in such rapid succession that one just could distinguish the two from a single report.

Little did the youth imagine the import of the ominous reverberation as it came flying along the dense atmosphere which overhung the calm surface of the mill-pond, sinking in succession with an extra report each promontory of the bluff which, on one side or other of the stream, intervened between himself and the source of the sound. Much less did he imagine that one of the charges whose explosion broke the stillness of the morn and fell so sharply on his ear, at the same time sped a ball, with deadly velocity, into the bosom and near the heart of his future commander, under whose banner he was to march to victories fruitful of renown to himself and his country, and bring near unto death a life which was first to deliver that country from the hands of its enemy, and then bequeath to it an indestructible system of political principles.

On the 29th of April, 1807, a party of ten or twelve horseman rode up about sunset, and asked lodgings at the house of David Miller, who resided one mile below, and west of the point, where the road from Russellville to Nashville crossed the State line between Kentucky and Tennessee. The overseer, Jacob Smith, to whom I am indebted for many important facts, replied in the affirmative, and with their chief, General Jackson, the party took up lodgings for the night. Scarcely, however, had their horses been taken, when a second party rode up and likewise requested lodgings.

The hospitable manager answered in reply that they never turned off travelers, but that the house was already full; whereupon Dickinson, for it it was, inquiring for the next house, and obtaining the services of a negro boy to show them the way, again resumed his journey. Descending the river about two miles, they reached the house of Billy Harrison, where they likewise obtained lodgings. Michael Keller now lives there—an old gentleman of Dutch descent. His dining-room is that in which Dickinson died, and in this I dined on the day of my visit. My informant, Jacob Smith, now a wealthy and respectable farmer in the immediate neighborhood, having long since risen from his then humble profession, and a man of undoubted veracity, stated that Jackson's place of entertainment, then his home, was noted far and wide for the good quality of its fare and accommodations; so that, proceeded with his hands to the seams of his daily employment. And new comes an hour of suspense, heightened by that involuntary feeling of esteem with which the yet undefaced hero is said to have inspired all who came within the circle of his companionship.

My informant's admiration for the old General seems almost to amount to enthusiasm. Probably, could he have known then how valuable a life was about being brought to the threshold of death, his interest might have expanded into deep solicitude; but this was a secret as yet inclosed in the Book of Fate. He relates: "Scarcely had we resumed our labor when the awful report, resounding deeply notwithstanding its removal of a mile from the public road, travelers were always willing to receive its bounty in return for that digression. He says the old hero—then, however, only about middle-aged—ate as hearty a supper as ever, enlivening it with his usual affability; and no completely undisguised was his easiness of manner that it was impossible to detect any alteration in his deportment. He says, from all he could learn, his repose was perfect the night preceding the exciting game—a game in which life was the stake. The party rose early next morning, mounted without breakfast, and as many as the code of honor allowed took the road to the preconcerted ground. It lay along the river, and was the same by which Dickinson departed. A specification in the terms of the duel was, that it should take place "on Red River, near Harrison's Mills." Being delayed by the custom of dueling, as were all except physicians and seconds, and much against the chivalrous which involuntarily drew him to the fatal spot, he through the heavy forest, and not followed by any repetition, warned us that the die was cast. So very rapid was the succession of reports that the negroes at work with me all thought it a single one; but from the prolonged duration of the sound, like that of a hanging fire from a single gun, I knew it to indicate a quick succession of two." So much for the ground have they to go upon who gratify party spleen by the base calumny that Jackson received his fire, and afterward deliberately walked up to a defenseless man, and, with an oath of exulting revenge, savagely blew out his brains. And way this faithful account, given by three truthful old gentlemen, William Dudley and Jacob Smith —the former being the last survivor—as the outset —forever stamp this malicious falsehood with the just condemnation it deserves. From a life-long acquaintance with the former, I know, also, that the vividness of his recollection may be as confidently relied on as his undoubted character for veracity; and the additional circumstance that his account is in the face of his political proclivities, having always gloried in the name of an old Clay Whig, is still further evidence to what extent he is proof against the warping influence of prejudice.

His language on the point is graphic. With all the energy of a zealous lawyer pleading an important cause, says he, talking as plainly with his head, hands, and features, as with his tongue, "I remember that as plain as if it took place yesterday" striking the palms of his hands together, clap—clap, as rapidly as possible, "that is the way, for all the world, that the two pistols sounded; and, me'n that, my son, I heard 'em just as plain as I can see you settin' thar in that chair;" then clapping his hands again, "and now they couldn't a gone off much closer together than that, could they?" said he. The calumny was current in the immediate neighborhood for some time afterward; but even the enemies of Jackson, who make any pretensions to respectability, have long since renounced it as a slander and a fiction of party malevolence.

Lets in the morning, the sound of horses' heels at some distance in the timber announced the return of the party; but whether following or carrying their leader, Mr. Smith says, could not at first be discerned. Only a short time elapsed, however, before the party came into view, when his tall stooping form was distinguished, bearing no trace of horse, and betraying in his countenance no more than his accustomed composure.

It was not known he was hurt until he rode up to the spring house and asked for his celebrated "quart of buttermilk." He inquired of Cely, the dairy-woman, if she had any buttermilk. She answered that it was just as much, for the butter had barely came; whereupon he told her just to push the butter back and pour him out some. She obeyed; and, it is said, he broke his fast by turning off a quart. Their conversation could not be heard at the distance; but he was seen, while there, to open his bosom and show her where the ball of his antagonist had cut half its thickness out across his breast. The party then, obtaining their attiracks from the house, set off for Springfield, where they took breakfast. This is commonly called, in the neighborhood, "his quart of buttermilk."

The house which held the combatants the night previous to the duel are two miles apart, and situated on the right bank of Red River, one of the most beautiful streams in the world. The river runs westwardly the whole distance, a most lovely and fertile river-bottom intervening between the two residences. Here was the scene of the combat, then a primeval forest of poplar, oak, and hickory, now one of the handsomest farms of the West. It belongs to, and forms a part of the large property of, Michael Keller, a hospitable old gentleman, of Dutch descent, who now lives in the house of Dickinson's entertainment. Through this, and close to the river, wound the road.

"Mounting my horse about mid-day," says Mr. Smith, "under the influence of a natural feeling of curiosity to see all I could about it, and following the road, I found their place of divergence after riding little over a mile.

"Here, turning to the right and proceeding a short distance, I came upon the spot.

"It lay in a part of the forest thinly grown with large poplar trees, having a pawpaw patch immediately in advance, and being distant one-third of a mile from the stream."

THE DUELING GROUND.

Let us imagine the gloomy civility with which the parties met face to face in the last road which one of them, at least, was ever to travel alive; the ironical courtesy of the salutation, for "honor" demands a punctilious etiquette in every tête-à-tête on such occasions; the ominous halt; the reconnoissance to determine the most fatal ground; and the consultation and final agreement upon the most eligible position. Then comes the fastening and disrobing from their buffers, and accoutrements, together; the mingling of surgeons and seconds to lay off the ground; the latter with an eye to the coming sun equal,y measuring the distance and driving the pegs; and, lastly, the significant task of loading the fatal pistols. Each charge of powder must be measured fairly and conspicuously to all; and then, by a show of hands, and loose and light, the balls are successively held up to view between thumb and forefinger, inserted in the muzzle, and pushed home with a well-bored ramrod.

Meanwhile the principals, standing aloof, are engaged in divesting themselves of unnecessary garments, or donning more convenient ones, and, as is sometimes the case, striving to obtain some slight advantage in the arrangement of dress. General Jackson is said to have worn a very large full overcoat on the occasion. Lots have been cast for choice of position and who shall give the word, the principals are placed, and proper instructions completed with the ominous courtesy of passing the fatal salver. This blows is a matter of lot, for the weapons can not be distinguished. Sixteen feet was the distance at which the duel was fought, which will be found represented by counting that it is only five paces and one foot. Now couple this with the fact that Dickinson, the day before, when his party stopped for dinner at Harrison's Landing, at the image of a man, fired four balls, instantaneously after the command each time, at a piece of sealoaf being covered by a silver dollar, and some idea can be formed of the larboury of death in the duel. It is said, also, on what appears good authority, that Dickinson was so confident of killing Jackson that he had begged to increase his bet to the amount of three thousand dollars that such would be the case.

All that now remained was for attendants to retire to a safe position and give the words of command. That was not to see fell; and that it was not, is what has been inferred that it was either to be made up, or the whole to be gone over with. But an instant revealed the real state of affairs, and Dickinson's friends run forward to assist him. A dark stain of blood appeared on his side, and an ominous indication was afforded in the fruitless endeavor to stanch it. A bending purpose back, shaking hard up, defied a moment's patient pause to recline him while undergoing the process of evacuation.

It was found that the ball had entered the side above the point of the hip-bone, and had ranged within, and, passing entirely through the body, was retarded by the opposite hip-bone, and lodged just within the skin. The small difficulty of its extraction but showed the great danger of the wound; and all hope was soon destroyed by the discovery of minute gall hemorrhages and purging.

Large quantities of blood streamed from the wound, yet continued affirming that it was only over a length of six feet; and so deep, that it was of very perceptible depth at the bone of the hip. Though he was by no soft us to yield easily to the pressure from the feet. He noticed the pegs at which their points were fixed with his heels firmly, and distinctly saw the prints of their right heels deep down in the mellow earth. He was much struck at seeing the shortness of the distance—the more remarkable, he said, when it was considered how great was the skill of the duellist. It was a thing, on discovering the nature of the wound, was to dispatch a surgeon to Dickinson's side, with the intelligence that he was "dangerously wounded." He was then conveyed back to his lodgings.

Here he was found in the room prostrated in the cot, and on two feather-beds, underlaid by two mattresses. He trembled in unremitting chills until he was tot for gone to exhibit his sufferings, and gave vent all the while to his agony in the most awful blasphemy. He was transported by his reckless profanity.

So profuse was the flow from his wound that it passed through all his bedding, and required to be cleaned up every few hours. Thus he progressed until into the evening. The surgeon left the middle of the floor, and a brilliant light illuminated the room, when a dark stain was seen on the floor. He asked, complaisingly, why they had blown out the candle and left him in the dark.

The surgeon told him he had, for he knew the befallible ones. His had gone completely blind. The last spark of light went out by the dawn of earth.

Again he commenced cursing, repeating, "God damn the ball that entered my body!" and within five minutes from the time of his blindness, he said he had died from that suffering body.

Dickinson was a man of great wealth, and was the husband of a blooming wife of twenty-five. He lived in Nashville, now, as then, the capital of Tennessee.

He arose several hours before dawn on the day he left home. His wife was ignorant of the duel, and being aroused by his restless pacing to and fro, asked what was the matter. He informed her that was to start that morning, on business, across Red River, in Kentucky; but that he would be sure to be back "by to-morrow night." She, supposing the duel, and taking her cheeks between his hands, he kissed her on the lips, and exclaimed tenderly, "Good-by, darling!" and immediately set off with his party. With what soul-breaking effect the dreadful tidings fell upon her heart we may endeavor, at least, to imagine. Suffice it to say that her carriage had accomplished the long day's ride while it was yet only in the evening of the day following his death, and she arrived in the neighborhood before the mare had spread more than a few miles on the road along which she came.

She first heard of his death about three miles from where he was; and her road led by the residence of both my informants. They are unanimous in declaring it the most overwhelming picture of grief they ever witnessed. She appeared to rave with mental agony, and every breath extorted a piercing shriek, until she reached the object of her deep distress. Her youth and beauty added much to the great sympathy all felt for her in her sad bereavement. When she reached his lifeless form she rushed upon it in a frenzy of grief, and gave vent to her feelings in kisses, embraces, and wild lamentation. His coffin soon arrived, and was placed beside him, and during the lonely visits of the night in holding an affectionate guardianship over his every breath as she sat off, next morning, to conduct back the mournful cortège. The wagon which brought the remains passed my informant's house. He was then a boy, and he says that the body of Dickinson back to Nashville.

The following is said to have been the origin of the duel, according to the best authority; and it is one which is not generally known:

Jackson and Dickinson had staked five hundred dollars at a horse-race, and always disliked one another. He took Dickinson's note for the amount, and was satisfied with its inforsement. Jackson had a friend in Nashville who feared he was a hated him. They were men destitute of honor, and generally cherished a most unscrupulous opinion to persecute injustice. Dickinson was a leader of that class of sporting men about Nashville who considered that there was justice as well as honor even in gambling, and that dishonesty was naturally crowded around Dickinson, and laid in wait for the first opportunity that might present itself to wreak his vengeance upon him. This was the first occasion, and they made use of it, in vindication of their principles. It is said that Dickinson—who it seems was, in some respects, of an amiable and credulous disposition—was induced to this unfortunate exposure. It is believed that Jackson had disparaged the character of his note, in order to get out of paying it on a challenge. Jackson denied the charge entirely, but it failed to conciliate Dickinson, or even to be believed by him against the representation of those who were thus using him to get their great enemy out of their way; and this was the result of their scheme. There is an important moral contained in this story, which may be acquired to the advantage of young men, and that is, that the truth of his case of wrongs is no honorable safeguard to a person's life. Had Dickinson been right, no doubt he would never have fought the duel with Jackson.

LITERARY.

THE LAND AND THE BOOK is the title of two handsome volumes lying on our table, from the press of Harper & Brothers.

The pilgrim who had brought home the shells, shell-boxes, and the crosses of olive-wood from Hebron, a few drops of Jordan water from the first of the baptisms, and countless stories of his pilgrimages for listening ears in the long evenings of a sea-passing life that stretched away between Joppa and Alexandria, was the old scholar and ballad Land of Promise—such a pilgrim, in old times, would be received by joy as that of a holy day to his friends the remains of the old glories of Palestine and making them, as well as he was able, the partakers of the holy land he had visited. And having, with much toil and dust and foot-weariness, even as Ruth gleaned in the corners of Boaz, knelt at the Sepulchre, and won the palm.

If old Laurence Koster, or Guttenberg—which-ever it was that first thought of the art of printing, or the art of printing, but this one privilege—to wit, of selling—fitted out every ship that left the port—that alone were enough to make the art a priceless blessing. For we are of those who, when we read a new book, forget both the author, the friend, or the stead of saying "Here is another old story told of Jesus, and another of Judea, another of the subject, a journey to the Holy Land," are, on the contrary, accustomed to say, "Here is the story of a journey, and another of Jesus, another of the Holy Land, and another of Judea." And, in this case, every new volume of the series is a welcome at our table; and we only wish a hundred men and women would go every year to the Holy Land and write.

But Dr. Thomson's book is of a new order. In the first place, it is the work of a man who, not by one who has visited the Holy Land and passed months, or one, two, or three years there; but by a man who has lived there for more than a life. A book on Syria by a Syrian! For if he was not born there, he has become his home. From his house—one at Jerusalem, now on the wall of Jerusalem—he has seen a great deal of the excursions on the world's surface; and all this time he has learned more and more to love and cherish the true truth about the Land and the Book.

Dr. Thomson has been for thirty years a resident of the Holy Land, at Beirut, Jerusalem, Sidon, and elsewhere. He does not, therefore, write from a mere visit of curiosity, or from the mere fact and steadfast observer, to whom Palestine has become a sort of a new and interesting field and valley that we consider almost as distant as the events which sanctified them, have grown to be to the ordinary visitor to Palestine a mere curiosity.

It is no book of travels; neither is it a book of personal adventure, though there are many such stories we have spoken of were designed to quicken the love of those who stand at home for the holy soil, this book goes further, and is designed to show how one who has lived in the Land thirty years has found illustrations invulnerable of the truth of the Sacred Record, and has learned from the Land infinite interpretations of the Book: in fact, to show that the Bible is the Book of Palestine, and that every hill and river, every tree and flower, the manners and customs of the inhabitants in modern times, as well as the remains of ancient times visible in tombs and ruins; the trees and the vines, the wells and the houses, every thing in Palestine, illustrate the Bible and help to understand it.

The learned author has lived while he has been in Palestine. He has never lost an hour to have accumulated this store of illustration, which makes the book a new book even to old men who have well studied it.

These volumes take rank at once as the authoritative books on the Holy Land. No reader can hesitate to yield assent to Dr. Thomson's topographical identifications. He is not one of those travelers, whoever they may be, will pastors any weight of authority or value either from the Sidon missionary. Yet Dr. Thomson makes no show of learning. He states the arguments on all sides, and, finally, his own opinion, but he never yields his assent of security.

On the subject of "Holy Places" at Jerusalem the author expresses no opinion. He states some of the arguments in a conversation, and leaves the reader to make his conclusions elsewhere. He has been, Bethesda, and another pool, besides the ruins of a magnificent church, with distinguished arches and grace. But these instances of controversy are rare in the volumes, which are marked throughout by the most unassuming humbleness of feeling. They are suited to old and young; for home, for libraries, for Sunday-schools. It is designed for the aged who are approaching the Holy Land, and to the young who hope to see the earthly Canaan first, and the other and better one later. We may say with frankness and enthusiasm that no reader of this book, whether young or old, can read a page of such a book; that there is nothing so delicious, so enchanting as time, to see or witness to be enjoyed by a Eastern traveler, since we have read them the Bible in a new book. Such stories as that of Ruth gleaning, Boaz speaking, become vivid, fascinating and intelligible.

We must close our notice of the books here. We have turned over the leaves of the volumes to seek some brief extracts by which to give our readers a taste of the book, but the numerous political allusions from manners and customs with which he is familiar, but we are compelled to the manifest necessity, if we copy a page, of going through a chapter. We resist the temptation by laying down the books.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE NEWLY IMPORTED AFRICANS.

A LETTER from the New York Herald correspondent at Key West gives the following particulars:

The arrival of the Africans in Key West, and the investigation of the African agency by the schooner Wanderer, have excited considerable interest in this section of country, dissipating all further doubts upon the subject. I have had seen the schooner and her cargo, and have had a talk with Captain Corbin, and interrogated the Africans, through the medium of their countrymen. They came here from Mozambique, Africa, speaking a dialect understood by many, and they repeat with excellent pronunciation every word of English. They are a fine, healthy looking set of men, of a passing around them, and appear desirous to understand the law of religion. They are of a finer physique and much superior to those described as captured on board the Erie.

The greatness of these strange beings in this place is the theme of conversation, and crowds of men, women, and children are thronging from all parts to get a sight of them. Their appearance excites no surprise, as they do not differ materially from the negroes of the slave-trade. The Africans are under the charge of Mr. Cozens, who has taken them to his residence, and has placed upon the steamer St. Nicholas. As I shall also take possession of the vessel, I shall have the opportunity of having with much toil and dust and foot-weariness, even as Ruth gleaned in the corners of Boaz, knelt at the Sepulchre, and won the palm.

If old Laurence Koster, or Guttenberg—which-ever it was that first thought of the art of printing, or the art of printing, but this one privilege—to wit, of selling—fitted out every ship that left the port—that alone were enough to make the art a priceless blessing. A PACIFIC OCEAN CABAL.

The United States surveying schooner Fenimore Cooper, Lieutenant Brooke, lately arrived at Honolulu from San Francisco. The deep-sea surveys of her officers have made known the facts that much inaccuracy exists in the charts of the Pacific Ocean, and that the islands of Japan and the several islands marked on the navigation charts are now not found at all. Lieutenant Brooke is of opinion that a Pacific telegraph cable is practicable, easily laid, and that communication by that means can be opened between California, China, and Japan. A native Japanese, who acted as interpreter to the expedition, and who is now in San Francisco, is reported, by the Honolulu journals, to most anxious to return home and seek his former position as a high officer of the Japan Government.

OPIUM EATING IN THE UNITED STATES.

The Boston Journal says that, although the public prohibition of custom-house duties, in that there was imported into the United States last year 200,000 pounds of opium. Of this amount it is estimated from reliable data, that 100,000 pounds were used by the opium eaters of the land. The habit of eating opium is known to be spreading rapidly throughout the United States, and many infirmary men and enormous quantities are used by the manufacturers of patent medicines, and by druggists who mix drinks in the saloons and groggeries that infest every city and village in the country.

A FIGHT WITH CANACHES.

The Fort Gibson Patriot says that Lieutenant Pressle left for from a gallant officer, a native of Chickasaw County, Mississippi, who had been engaged in the war in Florida, and referring to his recent desperate conflict with the Canaches, says:

I charged a party of Indians during the battle, which I had a hand-to-hand fight with one of the chiefs, and killed him. He was a large, powerful Indian, and was a brave. I knew the trial, and lodging near the breast, and passing through his body, and coming out at the back. I struck him in my stomach, ranging upward, cut the lower part of my left lung, and passed out at the back of my left shoulder. The arrows from me, the blood followed as if were of a fountain. I was taken off the field, and left for dead. I was seen from a drummer's husband. It was tedious to me, and I was left for dead of their original rights and privileges. The chairman made a lengthy examination of the condition of the Company's affairs. It had been underrun for a distance of seven miles from Detroit, and found perfect. The directors, for want of funds, were unable to carry on further operations. They had appealed to the Government for a guaranty of four and-a-half per cent, on $400,000 of new capital, with which to construct and lay a new cable, but no decision had been arrived at. Mr. Brydges spoke the prejudices hampering and contrary action as the only way to success, and moved the adoption of the directors' report, which was carried unanimously.

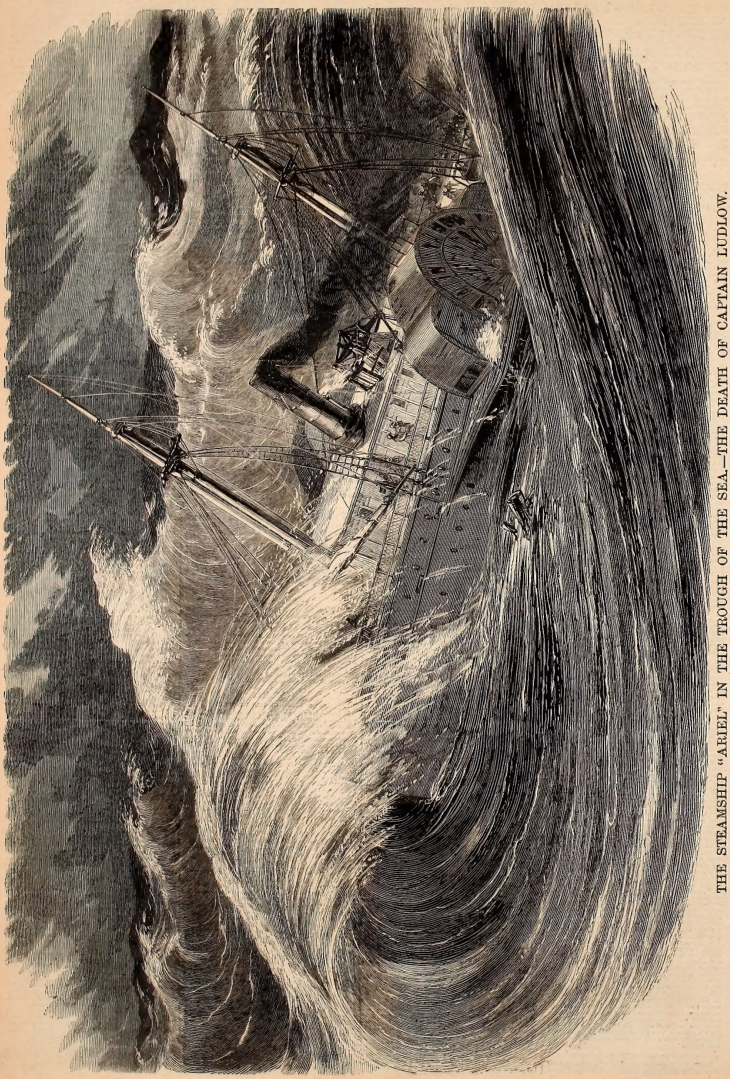
MR. WILLIAMS, late chairman of the Company, called attention to the establishment of another Company for the same purpose. He considered connection with America by means of a southern route, and leaving half of its capital subscribed, to be the best course to take while the conditions under which a fusion of the two companies might be effected could be ascertained and arranged. Such a matter could not be entertained by the meeting, and the chairman said that the directors would, on the day the Government, the proprietors might call a meeting, and agreed with the Government meeting in February was unanimously carried.

DICKENS ON SELF-MADE MEN.

Charles Dickens has contributed the prizes to the successful competitors at the recent Educational Establishment for Working Men at Birmingham. We extract his speech on the subject he said:

"I am to make a few of the most interesting cases of prize-holders and certificate-holders known to me since I left you. There is a woman here, a widow, a dressmaker, who work from eight o'clock in the morning to eight at night, and who has never been absent from her business a single day. There is a waggoner here, who has driven his team for eight miles a night this winter, and who has never been absent from his work a single day. There are two sister prize boys here, one fourteen years of age, and the other nine, and eighteen pence a week, and the father of one of whom is in the receipt of a pension of sixpence a day for life, but not before he had himself fulfilled the intentions in which his son has gone to work. There are two prize boys here taken the second-class prize in chemistry. There is a plasterer here, who, being out of employment, got back, after a long illness, to his work in the month of March of last year, and has never been absent from it since. There is a boy here, who took a first-class certificate last year at the Bank of Lord Brougham, and who has never been absent at an unseasonable hour. There is a young man here, who has been working eight miles a night from his home to his work, who has never been absent from it a single day, and who has never been ill



THE STEAMSHIP "ARIEL" IN THE TROUGH OF THE SEA.—THE DEATH OF CAPTAIN LUDLOW.

THE LATE CAPTAIN LUDLOW.

WE lay before the reader on this page an excellent portrait of the late Captain Ludlow, of the Ariel, and two engravings of the terrible scene in which he met his death.

The Ariel left Havre on 1st December, and Southampton on the 3d, for New York. All went well, without any event of consequence, till the 6th, when a heavy squall struck the ship, and almost simultaneously an infant child of one of the passengers died. The gale, however, subsided; and on the 8th fine weather prevailed. Early on the morning of the 9th a fresh gale arose from the W.S.W. The ship's head was kept to the wind, and a drag prepared in case an accident should happen to the engine. We copy the following account of the fatal scene from the Times:

"The prevalence of strong gales from opposite points of the compass within a short time occasioned an ugly cross-sea, which now greatly endangered the vessel. Captain Ludlow, with his first and second officers, stationed themselves forward of the pilot-house, to be ready to act in an emergency. An accident to the engine, which might happen any moment while the ship was laboring so heavily, would render it necessary to make use of the drag without a moment's delay, to keep her from falling off into the trough of the sea, where, in a disabled condition, she might have her decks swept, or founder.

"It was now blowing furiously, and the immense waves, as they leaped upward, broke like water-spouts around the ship; or combing, fell like immense breakers upon the ocean-beach. The forward part of the wheel-houses on each side were broken in, and the round-houses were both washed away.

"At 11 A.M. the ship settled deeply in the trough of the swell, and a tremendous sea broke upon the forward deck. Captain Ludlow, at the instant, was cautioned by the second mate, who was standing near him, to 'look out;' but he had scarcely spoken the words when all were submerged apparently ten feet under water. Both the first and second mates were badly injured, and for the instant it was thought that the steamer had foundered. The main-hatch was broken in by the sea, and many feet of water went below. Captain Ludlow was knocked down, and the heavy drag, composed of plank and timbers, struck him on the side. He was found lying upon his back, with his cap washed off, his eyes closed, and apparently insensible. In this condition he was conveyed to his room. He revived sufficiently to speak a few words, the last of which were, 'Tell the Commodore I died at the post of duty.' He then sank back and expired. The injury was apparently on the left side, two or three of the ribs being broken, and the fragments penetrating the heart."

Captain Ludlow was about fifty years of age, and was highly esteemed by his employers and by the public. He was an old New York pilot, and passed many years of his life in piloting vessels in and out of New York harbor. A few years ago he was invited to take the command of the steamer Kossuth, plying between New York and Savannah. He sailed this vessel and the Alabama until he was selected by Commodore Vanderbilt for the command of the Ariel. The Herald says:

"As a seaman he had few equals. Such was his reputation among merchants and others that when, on a previous voyage (made some time in the month of January last), the Ariel was overdue several weeks, they never for a moment doubted the safety of the ship, well knowing that if there was a man alive who could save the Ariel, Captain Ludlow was that person."

THE LATE CAPTAIN LUDLOW, OF THE "ARIEL."

THE DEATH OF CAPTAIN LUDLOW.

A DEAD MAN'S REVENGE.

HOW IT WORKED AND HOW IT ENDED.

CHAPTER I.—THE REVENGE.

"Open the window, wife, and let in some air. Phew! this place is enough to choke one."

It was a close, sickening atmosphere, truly. The chamber was dark and low, and on the old tester-bed, hung round with checked curtains, lay something covered with a ragged counterpane.

The speaker approached the bed, drew aside the soiled coverlet, and started back as he beheld a ghastly face, with eyes unclosed, and rigid jaws.

"Come here, Hannah,—come here. Uncle Zebe don't dead!" The man was in a low tone, then turned and looked at his wife. She was a neat and gentle-looking woman; he, a fine, broad-shouldered man.

"Oh, Richard!" The woman's face and voice expressed her horror at the sight before her. It was death in its most repulsive form. An old man, with pinched and withered features, with beard unshaven, and unsupported head, lay on a wretched bed, staring upward, as though, hovering over his couch, he still beheld the awful presence that had made him dumb.

It was Zebedee Peck, the miser, who lay there, stark and cold; and the man, in a moment's absence from, standing by the bedside, was Richard Mallet, his nephew, a working-man.

"God ha' mercy on him," said the man, after a silence, during which he and his wife stood gazing at him on the face of the dead. "He died in peace, poor soul! He hadn't much mercy for others."

Through the open window came a murmur of voices from the court below; then there was a noise of footsteps on the stairs.

"Here are the neighbors, Hannah. Come, look up, lass. There's lots to be done."

Richard Mallet threw the sheet over the face of the dead, and went to the door to meet the newcomers. There was a goodly troop, principally women. Mallet hastily was written on the miser's Peck's Court had been in a state of excitement for some hours.

For two days past the old miser's house had been shut up, and nobody had seen any thing of its owner. At first it was supposed to be owing to the matrons of the court, as to what ought to be done under the circumstances, and various measures were proposed. One lady advised trying the effect of a watchman's rattle, and a cry of "Fire!" under the window; another advocated a long ladder, and a descent through the garret; a third was for having a policeman by, and breaking open the front door with the strong arm of the law; while a fourth, a high-minded widow-woman, suggested sending at once for Richard Mallet, Old Peck's nephew and nearest relative. This bright idea carried the day; and a fleet messenger was at once dispatched for the stone-mason and his wife—in a case of life and death," as the messenger was strictly enjoined to say.

While, therefore, Richard Mallet proceeded to inform the neighbors that his uncle had been found dead in his bed, and nothing more, there was nonething like the commandment written on their anxious faces. The court had made up its mind to a terrible catastrophe—a suicide at the very least; and now that there was nothing but a corpse's unpleasant affair all. However, with that to look forward to, and the question of the miser's riches in debate, it had gained something, and so the court recovered its equanimity.

"He's gone then, at last!" "Well, we're all mortal, you see!" "His money's o' no use to him now!" were among the pious remarks uttered by the by-standers, as they crowded round the bed.

"Let's hope his money will go into better hands, marm," said the undertaker's widow-woman, addressing herself to Mrs. Mallet. "You mustn't fret, my dear; it's the ways of Providence, and all for the best, you know."

Seeing that Mrs. Mallet had never spoken to the deceased a dozen times all the seven years of her married life, it required no great amount of resignation on her part to feel so free. She was only pale and frightened.

"Go home, Hannah," whispered her husband. "I'll see to things, and get them properly away. Don't tell Jess."

Richard came home before long. The hearth was swept, the supper ready, the boys in bed, and little Jessie, the lame child, sewing on her stool by the fire. The woman looked up for an instant from behind the kitchen door, washed off the lime and mortar from his hands, and then, a clean-clothed, good-looking man—came and sat down to his supper.

"Come here, Jessie," said he, when the meal was finished.

The child hobbled to him on her crutch.

"You remember Uncle Zeb, don't you?—the old man we went to see once, eh?" Richard kissed the child's forehead.

"Yes, father."

"Well, he's dead, my girl; he's dead. Do you remember what he said to you that Sunday as we went to see him?"

"Yes. He asked me if I'd like to be a rich woman, and have a fine house, and go abroad; and I said no, because I couldn't help mother to sew, or get your tea ready then."

"What else did he say?"

"He said: 'When old Uncle Zeb's dead, my dear, you'll find he hadn't forgot you;' and then—then I began to cry, because he grinned at me so."

"Yes, it's true enough. That's what he said, Hannah," remarked Richard, turning to his wife, "I never said a word about it then, nor since, nor has Jess. It was better not. But he told me how as he had made his will, and hadn't forgot this child."

Mrs. Mallet almost dropped the cup of tea in her hand, in her amazement.

"You don't think it's true, do you, Richard?"

"Can't say, my dear. He was cunning as a fox, and deceitful as Old Nick. More likely he's left it in a joke. Anyhow the money's his to leave, and as he'll be buried to-morrow, we shall know afore long."

Richard Mallet seemed to take the matter very coolly. Not so, however, with his wife. The bare idea of her poor lame child inheriting any of the hoardings of Old Peck, the owner of nearly all the houses in the court, and the reputed possessor of a great deal of money, was, truly, a little too much for her. The wildest hopes were excited in her mind; she could think and talk of nothing else.

"Well, Richard," was her constant cry, "if it should come to that, we're happy enough all these years, and yet we've never seen the color o' his money; and, after all, we can do without it. If he should leave us any thing, it won't be that we've been seeking for it; nobody can say that. And how can we, when we've supported ourselves by counting him for his money's sake; and ever since he showed you the door, never came nigh, nor say you have cared to have him favor."

"You're right there, Hannah. Not a day if I should come to be sorry for it's come to pass to-night. Don't be too sure on it, though. Uncle Zeb was just the man to leave it all to the boys, and, for never forgave, he always said."

It was well, perhaps, Richard Mallet added these words; they were some little preparation to his wife for the events of the morrow.

When the funeral was over and the miser had been laid in a grave hallowed by no tears nor tender memories, the will was opened in the presence of Richard Mallet and his wife, and the other decent rooms of the miser's house. Through the hallopen shutters, some sunbeam streamed on the wig of the old lawyer reading the will, and made a track of dancing motes across the dusky air. Mrs. Mallet and her husband sat near. There was only one chair in the room, that occupied by the lawyer, and Richard Mallet's wife had at once stood by his wife's side.

The old lawyer read the preliminary clauses of the will, by which all his hearers listened attentively; the one with respect for the big words, the other with a natural curiosity to know the meaning. The executors appointed were two gentlemen living in a village in Kent, where the deceased was born. Through Zebedee Peck the estate was his will himself, it was all in proper form, his own writing, and had been deposited in a Kentish workhouse, risen, through the progressive stages of hop-picker and errand-boy, to be clerk in a lawyer's office, and, finally, bill-discounter and money-lender in London. Consequently. Old Peck knew what he was about when he made his last will and testament. He had prepared against surprise, however, for all the contingencies.

He said he was suddenly stopped, like his nose, and glanced down the parchment. There appeared to be a considerable list of the documents.

"All my real and personal estate, whatsoever and wheresoever"—repeated the lawyer with an uneasy sort of "hem"—"I give and bequeath to——Jessie Mallet" (the parents both turned pale), "the daughter of my nephew, Richard Mallet of Little Winkle Street, in this city, and this"—

The lawyer glanced over a few words further, and then came to a dead stop.

"This is quite irregular—quite out of the course. Surely I don't know; I think, my dear, it would be better your wife should step into the next room while I continue."

"No, sir, go on: she can hear it," said Richard.

The lawyer, with a strange look at them both, resumed. "And this is the revenge I have long promised myself. In leaving my money that, may I be wrong the next moment, to neither Richard Mallet of Little Winkle Street, in this city, and this"—

"Now, Richard, perhaps—better so, Mr. Mallet," said the lawyer. "But I must remind you that—that the property of the deceased is left to your child, and no longer!" It is in the hands of trustees. You can bet, therefore, remember what is not your property. Now, sir, I'll wait you together to-morrow at my office."

The client that came over Richard Mallet's face at these words of the lawyer was terrible to behold. He went home in silence, nor spoke one word to his wife all the way.

For the next time in his life he drove Jessie away from him when she brought her stool and knitting to sit at his feet by the fire. Her pale cheeks had never worn the boys went to bed without their father's kiss.

CHAPTER II.—HOW THE REVENGE WORKED.

RICHARD MALLET never closed his eyes that night. He got up at six next morning, had his usual breakfast, and—no thought appearing had happened, went and did half a day's work before going to the lawyer's office.

His wife watched and watched his manly figure as he strode down the street in the blue light of early morning, with his tools over his shoulder, and then, as he turned the corner, she went back to her fireside, and sat and cried as though her heart would break, till the neighbors came to ask the morning's milk.

It was a long day at home. Jessie wondered what made her mother so sad and absent, and why she sat and looked at her so strangely at times.

"Are you ill, mother?" she asked at last, almost as she caught one of these looks fixed upon her.

"Angry, Jessie? No, my child, not angry. Perhaps it would have been better you'd never been born, my poor girl. The Lord only knows!" and the mother kissed the child with a bitter laughter with tears in her eyes and a foreboding heart.

When Richard Mallet came home at last by the expression of his face that the matter was decided in some way.

"Hannah," said he, laying down his tools, and wiping his forehead with a handkerchief he took out of his hat, "I've done it. The old fool has got this fortune, and we can't take it from her. He tells me Jessie is worth twenty thousand pounds!"

"Twenty thousand pounds, Richard? Well! Twenty thou——! Oh dear, dear!"

The poor woman laughed and cried in the same breath. Twenty thousand pounds! It was impossible not to rejoice. Uncle Zeb's malediction was forgotten in the moment, in the dazzling visions those words raised before the mother's eyes.

"Oh! Jessie darling, twenty thousand pounds! And Jessie come to her father's chair, and looked up wistfully into his face. It was something new to her to feel any fear of him, and feel so, as she beheld the way in which he looked at her.

"Poor child, poor child, you're sorry," began Richard. "Now listen to what I am goin' to say: you're a cute little lass, and can understand me, I'm sure. Twenty thousand pounds is a fortune, and we find he's left all his money to you. You'll be a very rich woman some day, Jessie, and you'll have a big house of your own."

The pale face of the child flushed, and her eyes sparkled.

"You're very glad, Jess, sick yes?"

"Yes, father, I am glad. Shall we have a house of our own, then, and a garden?"

"Yes, you will. And you'll wear fine clothes, and have a pony to ride, and a man to wait upon your father and mother."

"But I shall never leave you, father, with a quick grasp at her father's hand.

"Not for always, proper; but you must go to school, and learn every thing who can make a lady better than father can."

Richard Mallet's face twitched as he thought of the old spelling-book over which he and his child had spent so many happy evenings. They were to be left behind, then, were they, as well as his own?

"Yes, we mustn't keep her like ourselves, Hannah. She must have good schooling, you know. She must to different from us."

Jessie looked wonderingly with her big brown eyes, and her heart beat fast. She was a clearheaded, reasoning little creature. The life which she had been compelled to lead in consequence of her infirmity—an infirmity more the result of a delicate frame than actual disease—had quickened her intellect, and rendered her wise and thoughtful beyond her years. So she shed no tears, though her heart was full, but took her chair out of her father's sight, and plied her needles fast in silence.

She spoke to Richard Mallet and his wife at their fireside till long after midnight, discussing the fortunes of their child. At one moment the poor mother thanked Providence for Jessie's good luck; at another she shuddered at the thought of the curse attached to the miser's wealth.

"Oh, Richard, if his words should come true. If our child should grow to be ashamed of you and me!"

"Hush, Hannah!" Richard checked his wife angrily. "It's only like a babby to talk it that way. How can a dead man's words do any harm?"

Though Richard assumed indifference to his uncle's malediction, he was not so really. The first thing on waking the old miser's terrible words occurred to him. He gave his child to his housemother and chisel in the stone-yard, fragments of the curse sounded in his ears. As he sat at dinner, under the shed, he heard the words simultaneously tracing in the dust, with the end of a broken tool, the words: "May it place a bar between them all their lives!"

Richard Mallet was a man of resolution and energy. He was not one to be cowed on doing a thing, he did it at once. So having come to the conclusion that his uncle must be regarded up as before her altered circumstances, he lost no time in lending his aid to carry out the necessary changes.

Ere six months Uncle Zeb's house was the inside of a handsome home in a boarding-school in Kent, near one of her tenants' and the stone-mason and his wife had returned to the life they were leading before the death of Zebedee Peck.

It was not the old life, though. Richard was as steady and industrious as ever, as good a workman, no doubt, but he had no fund of his own boys; but there was a change in him. It was not that the new position in which he now stood towards his master made him more civil to the world's perplexed him. He was not the man to disquiet himself on that score. He had been taught to labor, worked hard, took a joke good-humorously, brought home his earnings every Saturday, and never troubled himself about any thing in neighborhood or said or to his affairs.

It was not that he was not that this change was to be seen; at his own hearth, where, when he taught the boys their letters at night, he missed a gentle little voice that used to read all again, and go back to the big house, and I believed about the iron gates, hoping I'd see her again in the garden or at the windows, but I didn't. A servant came out once here looking very smart and tidy; and thinks I, I'll just ask him how Jessie is, and what she's a-doing of now; but when I went up to him, he stared at me in a uppish sort of way, and as I only asked him what o'clock it was, I'd half a mind to ring his left ear, just to offer all; but every time I looked at my dress and my bundle my heart failed me; so I turned away at last, and came back to my lodgings, instead of hearing the sound of my baim's voice. Perhaps I was a fool, and ought to have gone in and made free or shames as an honest man should; but the Lord knows I'd rather have come back as I have, than seen her look ashamed at me, or knowing, like to her cheek. I couldn't ha' borne that, Hannah!"

Richard Mallet's voice sank as he uttered these words, and his great head trembled as he bent his head over the table. The old nurse's face was pitiful and troubled and broken down.

For many days Richard Mallet repeated of the sacrifice he had made, and upbraided himself for ever having allowed his child to be removed from him.

"Why did they ever permit this unnatural separation to take place?" he perpetually asked themselves.

"Jessie would never be theirs any more now," said the poet another. "They had better forgot, their own bairn. By the time she had finished her schooling she'd be no company for such as them."

Richard was the first to regain right feeling on the subject.

"Hannah," said he, one day, "we've done our duty, and I'm no sure that it was the best we ever brought up as she should be, and you and me ought to be the last to stand in her way." I promised her trustees we'd be no hindrance to her, and I'm not goin' to break our word."

When Richard spoke thus, he looked more cheerful, outwardly, than he had done for many a day.

Whatever fears and anxieties he might have, they were knowledge to be confined to his own breast.

CHAPTER III.—HOW THE REVENGE ENDED.

Two to his promise, Richard Mallet never interfered, by word or deed, with the arrangements his child's guardians had made for her education.

A few years after the old nurse's death, a gentleman had risen to be first workman in his master's employ. With his increased means and wages, Richard Mallet was able to quit the neighborhood of Peck's Court, and rent a small house in the suburbs. He still kept his little garden, ironed, and cooked her husband's dinner; but her labors were aided by a little servant, and the boys were sent to a good school.

People said Richard Mallet was not the man he used to be. He kept himself aloof from his friends, haughty with his fellows, lost his old spirits and his pleasant smile, and only seemed natural when pushing his way as the world. But his wife and children could see no fault in him. In her heart of heart Richard Mallet's wife knew that her husband was set the same; but she would have died sooner than breathed an accusation against him.

And where was Jessie all this time?

In these few years Jessie Mallet, the whilom crippled child, has grown into a straight, well-formed girl, whose presence would disgrace no drawing-room. Of a slight figure but perfect in features, she still recalls the pale-faced little child who used to hobble about her father's house upon a crutch; but there is a blossom upon her cheek, and health and energy in her movements nowadays. Under skillful treatment, and the healthy influences that have surrounded her of late, her infirmity has gradually disappeared.

It is an important day at the Canterbury school, when next we see her. It is her seventeenth birthday, and her school-days are at an end. She has been writing a letter to her parents—these letters are the only links that bind her to the past—and the new one; Richard has them all, from the first childish travel to this, her well-penned epistle, safely locked up in an old desk—she is now sitting thinking of her father and mother with tears in her eyes. Why are they not here to-day? Around the room are spread all the little gifts her companions have given to commemorate the event; but, pleasant though the tokens of the good-will of her friends are, they cannot make her happy. Jessie has awakened there, and the good name she leaves behind. "Every body here compliments me on it, kind," thinks Jessie. "It is only my own family who forget me."

"Well, Jessie has plenty of new friends now, and, for aught we know, may have learned to do without her parents' love since last we saw her. There are many affections we count strong that a six years' absence weakens; and Jessie was young in the as we most of us know, is but a poor bond, after all.

So perhaps Jessie's love is of a less ardent nature than it used to be.

She has not much time, however, for reflection on this or any other score. There is a sound of wheels on the gravel-path, and a carriage rolls up to the door. It is Mr. Hale, and several guests. Sir Ian, who is come to take her away from school, and escort her to her new home at Hale Fields, where an archery meeting is to celebrate the day.

Jessie bids farewell to her companions of six years, and, driving away in Mr. Hale's carriage, looks up at the school-room windows with dimmed eyes, and sees the old cathedral, all blurred by her tears, for the last time.

"Here we are," cried her guardian, as the carriage turned into his gates at Hale Fields: "here we are, all ready, you see."

Jessie beheld the cloth-yard targets on the lawn, the servants hurrying to and fro, and the gardeners giving the last touches to their decorations.

"Don't fancy, Miss Jessie, this is all got up on your especial account. Other people can have archery-meetings, too. Dick is nineteen to-day, and he means to share in the honors too. Here he comes. He'll take you in to speak to Mrs. Hale and the girls."

Sir Richard Hale raised his wide-awake and took hands with Jessie. He had taught her to ride on holiday, and play chess another, so they were old friends.

Mrs. Hale was a stately woman, who kissed Jessie on her cheek, and took her welcome with an air of patronage that was not lost upon Jessie. Mrs. Hale's failing. She had the misfortune to be the second-daughter of a baronet, and had a weakness for good blood; hence she never took so kindly to Jessie as the rest of her family. Her husband, with a shrewd eye for business, knew Sir Ian, had never divulged to any one the real facts of Jessie's parentage; but Mrs. Hale had learned more than guess on the subject.

To-day there was even a more than usual amount of dignity in the good lady's demeanor; her head was carried more erect, and her dress rattled more sonorously and more swept by; for Jessie and was to be her guest to-day, and, to meet him, some of the first families in the neighborhood and the city of Canterbury had been invited to Hale Fields; consequently Mrs. Hale's reception of Jessie was quite a proud and impressive sight.

Jessie almost trembled when she heard of the grand doings that were to take place, and the grand people who were expected. But before her friends had half finished their confidences, the coachman touched his hat, Dick Hale threw down to the archer where they sat, and summoning his sisters to their sister's presence.

"Make room, girls; here's another beseeming rigid with horror. His lordship has arrived, and positively to escort him. Do, pray, put a good face or she'll be speechless in five minutes."

The two girls flew across the lawn, and left Jessie to their mother. He stood and watched them with a laughing face.

"Well, Jessie, how do you like being at home, isn't it? You and I are lucky folks to have such a birthday-keeping as this."

"I am lucky in having such friends, and such a home to-day. I little thought, though, when Sir Ian Hale wrote to me, that I should find such a gay assembly, or perhaps—"

"Or perhaps you wouldn't have come. Well, that's very polite. I think I had better tell my father that you'd like to have the horses out again, and go back to Canterbury. Is that what you're sighing for, Miss Jessie?"

"No," don't talk nonsense. I didn't mean, Richard, to—to—" and she stammered and stopped again.

"To insult your guardian, eh?" said Dick, recovering his good-humor when he saw Jessie looked distressed. "You had better not let my mother hear you insinuate that you don't care to meet her friends, Jessie. By-the-way, I wish the Chesterton set were all at Jericho, for I never want to invited here at all." Richard Hale looked really half annoyed.

"Why are they gather?" suddenly cried Richard. "He is looking for you, I know. Let's follow him; you have to be introduced to such a lot of people, Jessie, you'll be—"

Jessie had grown suddenly crimson, and Dick feared he had said something indiscreet.

"No, I don't know them."

"Oh, that's right. I'm not sort of origin always makes one suspicious."

Sir Ian Hale, who had disclaimed acquaintance with the Chestertons, there was such a sudden tumult in her heart, and such a singing in her ears, that for the next few minutes she remembered not her companion said.

"Is that Jessie Mallet

Hale's agency, to a quiet parlor, where they were left alone to themselves.

Of course the archery fete at Hale Fields was long remembered in the neighborhood, and gained considerable éclat from what certain ladies pleased to term "the romantic incident" that terminated the day.

One summer evening, some few years later, a family group was assembled about the shade of a sycamore, in front of a pretty farm-house in Devonshire.

It was Richard Mallet and his family, who were assembled in the garden at the Cliff Farm.

The father, with a roll of paper on his knee, and pencil and compasses in hand, was planning some improvements for the farm-yard. His wife, busy with her knitting, sat at a little distance. One of the boys lay on the grass at his mother's feet, reading to her; the other was watching the Plymouth steamer through a telescope. Jessie, alone with her father on the bench under the tree, sat with both hands clasped idly before her, and her face fixed on the sea. She looked very pretty in that thoughtful attitude.

"Father," she said, suddenly, "I was just thinking how strangely chance has come out of evil in our two lives. Uncle Zeb's wicked intentions seemed to have carried with them their own frustration. He has hurt us closer together than ever. I think I should never have shown how much I loved you had I not been separated from my home all these years; and I certainly could never have known how much you loved me."

Jessie took hold of her father's hand as she spoke, and looked at him with unutterable affection.

"Yes, Jessie, good Anu come out of evil in our lives, as you say. And I think people would often have less power to injure us than they have were we but true to ourselves. As long as you and me remained in Uncle Zeb's curse could never have done us any harm. Hollos! what are they up to there? See, boys, that Phil shouting like mad!"

There was evidently great excitement among the mother and her boys.

"There he goes, father. There's the gentleman who took us out fishing the other day, and jumped overboard when Ned fell into the water!"

A stranger was standing near the edge of the cliff beyond the garden-wall.

"Oh, do run and ask him to come in," said the mother. "I have seen him there nearly every night this week, and wondered who he could be. To think I didn't know him! You go too, Jessie; you'll know how to thank him. Here's your hat."

Jessie took her father's arm, and they set off for the cliff. As they drew nearer the stranger, Jessie suddenly grasped tight hold of her father's arm.

"Oh, stop, father—stop! Look, he's coming this way!"

Jessie had recognized the figure before her. It was that of Mr. Paul Hale.

He had been prowling about the neighborhood for some days past, on a secret out of which his sunike his usual open behavior. Wild ducks had been the ostensible object of his wanderings, as the gun upon his shoulder gave evidence of; but the sea-fowl appeared only to frequent one part of the coast, and that was the immediate neighborhood of the Cliff Farm.

It required no great amount of persuasion upon Mrs. Mallett and her niece Mr. Dick Hale to enter the house, and to stay and take supper afterward. And as, upon returning to his inn that night, he decided to remain another week in the neighborhood, it is to be presumed he spent a pleasant evening.

A few years further on, and we again take a peep at a family group at the Cliff Farm.

But this time they are assembled by a winter's fire, with the wind rumbling in the chimney, and the waves beating on the beach below.

A gray-haired old man is going to tell a Christmas story to his grandchildren. Grandfather has seen strange things since his youth, and can tell strange stories too.

"Let it be something true, grandfather," says a bright-eyed little girl on his knee.

"And let it have a terrible name," says Dick, a fine boy of nine.

"Suppose, then, I tell you your mother's history," says grandfather, looking at the young matron sitting by her husband's side.

"Yes, grandfather, tell them that," replies the children's father.

"But mother's history won't be a story," cries Dick.

"It will be as good," says grandfather; "and as you want a terrible name to it, Dick, suppose we call it a Dead Man's Revenge!"

THE NEW DANSEUSE, EMMA LIVRY.

THE accompanying portrait of Mademoiselle Emma Livry, the new danseuse, whose fame is filling the European ear, is said to be perfectly reliable. And though the ballet is an institution with which serious-minded persons should have as little to do as possible; though few good things grow out of it, or are connected with it in any way, it is not allowable for a newspaper to ignore its celebrities; and we therefore make room for the portrait of a dancer who seems destined to fill the place occupied by Cerito, Taglioni, and Fanny Elssler.

Emma Livry is a French girl, about sixteen years of age. Her father is understood to have been connected with the theatre in some subordinate capacity. When quite a child—almost an infant—young Emma was introduced to "the boards" in the part of a child figurante. Her graceful figure, pretty face, and extraordinary agility, quickly made her a favorite. When she was twelve years old, it is said, she was earning a handsome income. At that period, we are informed, a famous maître de ballet saw her, and having witnessed her agility, and the extraordinary quickness with which she mastered the most difficult performances, made an offer to teach her the highest parts in the ballet. The generous proposal was accepted. Emma was withdrawn from the stage, and became a regular pupil of M. ——.

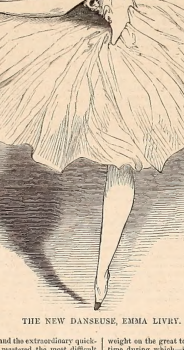
Very few persons who are unacquainted with the routine of the theatre are aware of the fatigues and trials of a dancer's life. It is doubtful whether any trade in the world involves so much or so constant muscular exertion. Nothing but incessant practice will insure the suppleness and strength which constitute a dancer's stock in trade. Early in the morning the spiritual for Terpsichorean honors must report herself at the school, and go through her exercises. There consist in keeping up a constant movement until nature gives way, and the dancer sinks exhausted on the floor; in whirling round on one foot until giddiness almost leads to delirium; in balancing one's self on one foot or one toe until the pain becomes too excruciating to be borne; in straining the limbs asunder, in every direction, until the muscles refuse their office. Young dancers frequently require absolute coercion to persuade them to pursue an apprenticeship so extremely painful. For more than a year after they join the great school at Paris they usually return home after their morning lesson in tears, worn-out, ready to faint, and suffering great pain in the muscular and nervous systems. Even after they master the rudiments of their calling, and are able to sustain their whole weight on the great toe of one foot, the length of time during which—in order to train their muscles—they are compelled to continue in rapid motion very severely tries the nerves. Indeed, a dreary promising young girls who choose the ballet as their sphere, very few have the courage and the physical strength to persevere.

Through this arduous apprenticeship Mademoiselle Livry passed with credit and honor. From time to time she was shown to connoisseurs, who unanimously agreed in advising her to persevere. More than one enthusiastic amateur was so struck by the charms of the youthful dancer that he would fain have deprived the world of her fame, and borne her away from her school and her prospects; but the lady herself and her parents were resolutely bent on success in the career she had chosen, and the admirers were one and all bidden to wait.



THE SOLAR ECLIPSE OF 7TH SEPTEMBER LAST, AS SEEN IN BRAZIL.

At last her début came. It was a great night. Every one in Paris knew that a young untried performer was to appear in a part which had been rendered classic by the exploits of the queens of the dance. Every one resolved to judge for himself. The theatre was crowded; the audience was discriminating. Emma Livry appeared on the stage, trembling and pale. For a moment her best friends entertained fears that her emotions might overpower her. Her first movements were timid and constrained. She had none of the factitious enthusiasm of the practised danseuse. In her, all was natural and genuine; what she felt, she showed. As she began to dance, the audience watched her with such interest as the evident timidity of the young girl was calculated to awaken; they were silent and critical; as the swell of the music rose, and the soul of the composition began to shine forth from the chords, young Emma began to forget where she was, and to enter into the spirit of her part; the audience grew more attentive; presently, she gave full play to her powers, and the house warmed and began to applaud; and now, encouraged by the sound, she exerts herself to the utmost, transcends all her rivals in grace and poetry of motion, and the audience bursts into a frenzy of enthusiasm. The début was a success. Emma Livry was what in this country we should call an institution. She occupied a fixed place among Parisian stars.

The most touching anecdote connected with the success of the young girl couples her name with that of her famous predecessor Taglioni. The latter, who in her day was the favorite of Emperors and Republics alike, has for many years enjoyed the fruit of her labors, in an opulent retirement on the lake Como, and at Venice; but no one can be heard of the promise of young Emma Livry she left her retirement, hastened to Paris, and hired a box for the season at the theatre where her successor performed. They say that Taglioni's was the first voice which applauded her; that her bouquet was the first which fell at her feet; that her voice was the first which, after the exciting triumph of the evening, warmly and generously congratulated her on her success. The French papers are full of enthusiasm on the subject. They have even gone so far—in their desire to do honor to Taglioni—as to invent a new name for her; they call her the maîtresse of the dance.

THE LATE SOLAR ECLIPSE, AS SEEN NEAR RIO JANEIRO.

THE solar eclipse which took place on 7th September last was not generally visible here, owing to unfavorable weather; but a very fine view of it was obtained in other parts of this continent. Near Rio Janeiro it was perfectly visible. The accompanying engraving will convey a fair idea of the extraordinary spectacle, as it was witnessed by an eminent French astronomer.

It is hardly necessary to mention, even for the benefit of our very young readers, that a solar eclipse is caused by the intervention of the moon between the sun and the earth during the daytime, and that the effect of that intervention is that the sun's rays are intercepted, the day turned into night while the eclipse lasts. In former times, when superstition was more common than science, eclipses used to be regarded as evidences of the divine wrath. Every one remembers the fatal results which followed the eclipse during the Athenian siege of Syracuse; much of the terror of the early history of New England was due to similar causes. So, in every age, the ignorant and superstitious minds are prone to ascribe to divine intervention physical phenomena which enlarged scientific experience explains in full.

During a total eclipse of the sun the earth assumes a dull gray, then a bluish, and finally a black color; the stars appear; night seems to set in; the cattle prepare to rest, and horses frequently—spontaneously—run away—another member of the phenomenon—display signs of evident terror and alarm. Even animals appear to feel the fear by the awful gloom which overspreads the face of nature. While the eclipse lasts an unnatural bright spiritual light, like the aurora borealis, usually, in cloudy weather, marks the site of the sun's disappearance; at other times the solar rays radiate from its obscured surface, and look like a dozen comets starting on their meteoric journey through space. Persons of an imaginative turn of mind have frequently fancied they detected a peculiar color in the atmosphere at these seasons; there is no scientific reason for any such phenomenon.

As the sun begins to emerge from the shadow nature breaks forth into song: the birds begin to sing; cattle rise from their sleeping-place; man, wise as he may be, welcomes with sincere joy the return of the luminary to which the earth owes the breath of life. From hill to valley the dark cloud rises, and instant flute, blending with the rainbow which so frequently accompanies the close of an eclipse, dances round tree tops and church spires, as if even inanimate objects shared the joy of created beings. A total solar eclipse, it is without doubt, the most awful and sublime sight that it is ever given to man to witness.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER IV.

Insanis sanus, et intigit nunquam,
Insanire paras bellum pulvisque Mycenis
Mollevit avenae Penates,
Et te non paterna capit insania.—HORAT.

IT is the gray of the evening. Fairthorn is sauntering somewhat sullenly along the banks of the lake. He has missed, the last three days, his walk with Sophy—missed the pleasing excitement of her society, and her, still more timid by whose obsolete glories he considers her very interest as a social circumstance. He has missed, too, his more habitual and less irritating conversation with Darrell. In short, altogether he is out of humor with himself, spleen on the swans, who follow him along the wave as he walks along the margin, intimating either their affection for himself, or their anticipation of the bread crumbs associated with his image —by the amiable note, half snort and half grunt, to which changes of time or climate had reduced the vocal accomplishments of those classical birds, so pathetically melodious in the age of Moschus and on the banks of Cayster.

"Not a crumb, you unprincipled beggars, growled the musician. "You imagine that mankind are to have no other thought but that of supplying you with luxuries! And if you are asked, in a competitive examination, to define me, you benefactor, you would musician—I thing very low in the scale of creation, without wings or even feathers, but which Providence endowed with a peculiar instinct for affording nutritious and palatable additions to the ordinary ailment of Swans." Ay, you may grunt; I'm all that you—as a pie!"

Slowly, out through the gap between you gray crag and the thorn-tree, wandered the little path to drink just where the faint star of eve shoots its gleam along the water. The musician—for quiet pressure and quickens his pace, expecting to meet the doe's wonted companion. He is not disappointed. Mr. Darrell, Fairthorn and where the twilight shadow falls darkest between the gray crag and the thorn-tree.

"Dear fellow Hermit," said Darrell, almost gayly, yet with more than usual affection in his greeting and tone, "I have not put when I want you. I am as one whose eyes have been strained by a violent outburst of tears, and who quiet pressure is like the relief of a return to green. I have news for you, Fairthorn. You, who know more of my secrets than any other man, shall be the first to learn a decision that must bind you and me more together—but not in these arms, Dick.

"Dilmus—dilmus!
Suppressa
Carpere lire, comites, parati."

"What do you mean, Sir?" asked Fairthorn. "My mind always mingles me when I hear you quoting Horace. Some reflection about the certainty of death, or the ungrateful subjects is sure to follow."

"Death! No, Dick—not now. Marriage-bells and joy, Dick! We shall have a wedding!"

"What! You will marry at last! And it must be that beautiful Caroline Lyndsay! It must—it must! You can never love another! You know it, my dear friend—and I shall see you, then, happy before I die."

"Ay, foolish old friend!" said Darrell, leaning his arm tenderly on Fairthorn's shoulder, and walking on slowly toward the cottage, "I will often smell you that no marriage-bells can ring for me!"

"But you have told me, too, that you went to Twickenham to steal a sight of her again; and that it was the sight of her that made you resolve to wed no one else. And when I have railed against her for fickleness, have not you nearly frightened me into a belief that for her you might rail against her but yourself? And now she is free—and did you not grant that she would not refuse you? Is she not the kind and faithful henceforth? And yet you insist on being—granite?"

"No, Dick, not granite; I wish I were!"

"Granite and pride," persisted Dick, courageously. "If one thing be left of the one, one only breaks one's spade against the other."

"Pride!—you say!" repeated Darrell, mournfully; then aloud, "No, it is not pride now, whatever it might have been even yesterday. I will confess to you that I have had a passionate misery of which she can not forsake. She would accept me from pity, Dick? Because she thinks she owes me reparation—because she pities me. And my heart tells me that I should become cruel, and mean, and vindictive, if I were to live day by day with one who created in me, while my life was to be passed with her known in its morn, and to feel that that love's sole return was the pity which makes the weak-ling full of my age. No; if she pitied, but did not love me, when, eighteen years ago, we parted under peculiar heeding circumstances, I should to dream that woman's pity mellows into love as our locks become gray, and that the heart grows into ridicule. It is not pride that speaks here; it is rather humility. Dick. But we must not now talk of age and by-gones. Youth and marriage-bells, Dick! Know that I have been for hours passing in review the events of my old-fashioned notions dear Lionel's happiness. We must think of living as well as of the dead, Dick. I have solved the problem. I am happy, and so shall the young folks be."

"You don't mean to tell me that you consent to—"

"Yes, to Lionel's marriage with that beautiful girl, whose parentage we never will ask. Grant men are their own ancestors; why not womenare fair women? Yes, Fairthorn, to-morrow I shall of course secure to my kinsman and his bride an ample fortune. Lionel will be present for his honeymoon before he departs for the wars. He will fight with good heart now, Dick. Young folks of the present day are not to be set against sorrow as they were trained to do in time. And that amiable lady who has set me to pity for me, has, of course, a brave pity for a charming young couple for whose marriage she hebtened, in order to save a heart from break. And rather than she should pine and fall ill, and—no matter; all shall be well and happy, and be for the happiness of the living. But something else must be settled; we must think of the dead as well as the living, and this cottage of Darrell should be buried with me in the grave beside my father's. Lionel Haughton will keep to his own manse. Live the Haughtons! Perish, but with no blot on their shield—perish the Darrells! Why, what is that? Tears, Dick? Pooh!—be a man! And I want all your strength; for you, too, must have a share in the sacrifice. What follows is not the dictate of pride, if I can read myself aright. No; it is the final conclusion and sentence of a long and hard struggle between my conscience and my heart, a surrender that satisfies my crotchets of honor. At all events, if it be pride in disguise, it will disappear with action in others; you and I may have a sharp pang—we must bear it, Dick."

"What on earth is coming now?" said Dick, dolefully.

"The due to the dead, Richard Fairthorn. This book of our England, in which I learned from the dead to love honor—this poor domain of Evelyn—shall go in bequest to the College at which I was reared."

"Sir!"

"It will serve for a fellowship or two to needy, brave-hearted young scholars. It will be thus, while English institutions may last, dedoted to Learning and Honor. It may sustain for mankind some ambition more generous than mine. I may not have, in my then old age, a home, but my dear father's name, like the Darrell arms, shall live on in my love to the dead, Dick! And the old house thus becomes useless. The new house was over a folly. They began to build it when I was a boy, intending for me married: not a stone stood on stone! The foundations still pass over last since! And this task I order you to see done. I have not strength. You will then hasten to join me at Scarborough. But come of earth on which Horace wished to breathe his last sigh.

"'Tis no mean love I seeke.
Insolvat arces—ille—tu—"

"Don't, Sir, don't. Horace again! It is too much. I feel choking—choking at all the strides presented to him was really too monstrous for Fairthorn's endurance. He turned his countenance and whenever a hand that he almost caught him by the throat, and sobbed out, "You must be joking."

"Seriously and solemnly, Richard Fairthorn," said Darrell, gently, yet imposingly, in a manner that threatened him with strangulation. "Seriously and solemnly I have uttered to you my deliberate purpose. Now, you must go to the house of our lifelong friendship, to face this pain as I have—solemnly, cheerfully, and with no more accents to the utterance than the instructions I shall leave with you on quitting England, which I shall do as soon as I have seen Lionel and his dear old friend, calm days, clear consciences. In climes where whole years are passed and no man knows his themselves sunk in graves—where one petty grief for a squirrel's lost house we have to lay, I suppose, in a Lethean draught, or to wail moaniike, rail against vain dreams and idle pride, cultivate vine and orange-trees, with Horace—nay, nay, Dick—with the FLUTE!"

CHAPTER V.

More luxurious can never be the lot that lurked their How melts into their waters. And when fate natures Shall close their eyelids, and their limbs are still.

DARRELL escaped into the house; Fairthorn sunk upon the ground, and resigned himself for the moment to the most unphilosophical grief. He dearly he started up; a thought came into his brain—a hope into his breast. He made a cautious, stealthy approach into a projecting nook of the ivy-covered hall-door—plunged into his own bedroom—flung open—and, with a cry of joy, the door re-emerged, a letter in his hand, with which he had just time to catch the postman, as that functionary was about to turn from the door with the official bag.

Left thus hastily performed, Fairthorn shambled into his chair at the dinner-table, as George Morley concluded the grace which preceded the meal. Mrs. Morley and Miss Morley were already made the grand event of the passing day. But Mrs. Morley's appetite was not to be easily quelled with Waife, the Morleys alone shared, with host and secretary, the melancholy entertainment. Mrs. Morley and her eldest child, Harriet thorn; Darrell's manner perplexed him. Mrs. Morley, and Harriet thought, with considerable reference in secrets that concerned others, though in all his own he was to her conjugal sight par excellence the model man. Mrs. Morley was piqued the best woman in the world, ever wishing to be something more than she was, and aspiring to dear old family pictures that scowled at her from the wall, and informed Fairthorn that she had suddenly addressed George a question as to the texts and authorities by which the Papal Church defends its doctrine of Purgatory. That troubled a little, and no doubt Fairthorn, who which lasted not only through the rest of the dinner, but till Mrs. Morley, ever a little out of countenance, and delighted to notice the undeviating attention which Darrell paid to her distinguished spouse, took advantage of the first pause to rise, and retired. Fairthorn finished his bottle of port wine, and, for the moment that there was an open Purgatory, but inclined to advance the novel heresy that Purgatory sometimes commenced on this side the grave—slinked away, and was seen no more that night; neither was his flute heard.

Then Darrell rose, and said, "I shall go up stairs to our sick friend for a few minutes; may I find you here when I return?" And the host said he his can follow mine."

On entering Waife's room, Darrell went straight forward toward Sophy, and cut off her retreat.

"Fair guest," said he, with a grace and tenderness of manner which, when he pleased it, could be ineffably bewitching—"I teach me some art by which in future rather to detain than to scare away the precious in which I am about to make myself still more terrible the charms that subdue the young." He led her back gently to the seat she had deserted—placed himself next to her—addressed a few cordial queries to Waife about his health and comfort—and then said, "You must not leave me for some days yet. I have written by this post to my kinsman, Lionel Haughton. I have refused to be his embassador at a court in which, by all the laws of nature, he is to be the subtle himself to his consequence. I can not even hope that he may escape with his freedom. But I claim that. Three happy, indeed, if that be the merciful sentence you inflict."

He raised Sophy's hand to his lips as he ended, and before she could even quite comprehend his meaning at his words—so was she startled, confused, incredulous of such sudden change in fate—the door had closed on Darrell, and Waife had changed his bed—his chamber—for the not Providence kind?

Darrell rejoined the scholar. "George," said he, "the kind enough to tell Alban that you showed me his letter. He kind enough also to write to Lionel Haughton, and say that I gladly acknowledge her wish to repair to me those losses which have forced me to give up and the grave alone. Tell her that her old friend (you remember, George, I knew her as a child) sees in that visit the same sweet gentle spirit that which soothed him when his son died and his daughter fled. And that her wish is granted. To that marriage, in which she compassionately forsaw the best solace left to my bereaved and world colonel—to that marriage I give my consent."

"You do! Oh. Mr. Darrell, how I honor you!"

"Nay, I no more deserve honor for consenting than you deserve censure for writing. I had continued to refuse. To do what I deemed right is not always to be happy in the sense that twelve hours ago. To what so sudden a change of resolve is one who changes resolves very rarely to be able to render to any human being? Alban, or to that metaphysical skill with which the wound alone can perceive, and compelled me to review all its judgments. I do not attempt to determine; yet I thought I had no option but the course I have taken. No; it is fair to yourself to give you the chief credit; you made me realize you more resolve, by the force of mind—I have found one. And now pay your visit where mine has been just paid. It will be three days, I suppose, before I can leave my room. In his new regiment at * * * *, can be here. And then it will be weeks yet, I believe, before his regiment sails;—and I'm all for short courtships."

CHAPTER VI.

Fairthorn frightens Sophy. Sir Isaac is invited by Darrell, and a Family Council is held.

SUCH a sweet voice in singing breaks out from one heedless beeches! Waife hears it at noon from his window. Hush! Sophy has begun to sing.

She is seated on a garden bench, looking down on the lake toward the gloomy old Manor House and the tall spectre-palace beside it. Mrs. Morley is also on the bench, hard at work on her sketch; Fairthorn prowls through the thickets behind, wandering restless and wretched, with wrinkled brow and all words of sorrow. He hears that voice singing; he stops short, perplexed what to perform. "Singing," he muttered, "singing in triumph, and glowering at me very House ele- dooms a transaction. My own time making his lyre amidst the conflagration of Rome!"

Sophy's voice, which was somehow or other can not sit long in any place, and cries that day of my companion, wanders away from the bench, and comes upon Fairthorn. Hating, in her unutterable secret bliss, the musician who had so often frightened her in the days of her shuttered secret sadness, she sprang toward him with welcome and smile in her face, and held out her hand. Dogeness out of his tub. Fairthorn recoiled sidelong, growling forth, "Don't—you had better not!"—grinned like most savage grin, showing all his teeth like a wolf; and as she stood, speechless wonder, gazing with fixed eyes, as slank edgewise off, as if aware of his own murderous inclinations, turning his head every then once, and making it at her; then, with the vomited mystery which enveloped his exit, he was gone—vanished behind the hedge, or amidst a bush, or into a hole—Heaven knows; but like the lady in the Siege of Corinth, who warned the renegade Alp of his approaching end, he was "gone."

Twice again that day Sophy encountered the strange musician; each time she same meaning aspect and weird disappearance.

In Mr. Darrell's room over a little, and asked Sophy, timidly, of George Morley.

"Always," answered George, dryly.

Sophy felt relieved at that reply. Whatever is habitual in a man's manner, however unpleasant, is generally forgiven. Still Sophy could not help saying,

"I wish poor Sir Isaac were here!"

"Do you?" said a soft voice behind her; "and pray, who is Sir Isaac?"

It was Mrs. Morley, who had come forth with the resolute intent to see more of Sophy, and make herself unusually social as she could. Guy Darrell could never be kind by halves.

"Sir Isaac is the wonderful dog you have heard me describe," replied George.

"Would he hurt my dear if he came here?" asked Darrell.

"Oh no," cried Sophy; "he never hurts anything. He once found a wounded hare, and he brought it in his mouth to us so tenderly, and seemed so anxious that we should cure it, which we accordingly did, and he have wounded creatures hurt him, but he never hurt the hare."

Said George, sonorously,

"Ingenuus didicisse fideliter artes
Emollit mores, nec sinit esse feros."

Darrell drew Sophy's arm into his own. "Will you walk back to the lake with me," said he, "and help me to feed the swans? George, send your servant cxpress for Sir Isaac. I am impatient to make his acquaintance."

Sophy's heart involuntarily pressed Darrell's arm. She looked up into his face with innocent, joyous gratitude; feeling at once, and as by magic, that her love of him was gone.

Darrell and Sophy rambled thus together for more than an hour, and when they came back in mind, unaware to herself; he succeeded. He was struck with a certain simple poetry of thought which pervaded her ideas—not artificial sentimentality, but a natural tendency to look to all that is sensitive and delicate in the beautiful which lies hid from the ordinary senses. His favorite books to Lady Mountfort, that, though far from learned, she was well and acquainted with literature than he had supposed. And sometimes he changed colors, and breathed his short, quick sigh when he recognized her familiarity with a passage in his favorite authors which he himself had commended, or which referred to the Caroline of old.

"I want the dog Waife, who seemed now recovered as by enchantment, walked forth with George, Darrell and Sophy with Sophy. Sir Isaac arrived—immense joy; the doe butts Sir Isaac, who, retreating, stands on his hind legs, and, with extraordinary dignity, butts Darrell's hat, rents fire; the doe in her turn retreats; half the new silver-mounted don and dog are friends.

Waife is indecent, without much persuasion, to join the rest of the party at dinner. In the first social fall Fairthorn contrives to avoid the fire. Waife is entreated by George to read to excuse me now," said he, "but I must not lose the latter portion of "King Lear." Darrell, who never was a play-goer, and who, to his middle life, is ignorant of the name of Shakspeare since he left college, was wonderstruck. He had himself read beautifully as declaimers, I suppose, do; but his talent was not mimetic—not imitative; he could never have been an actor—never thrown himself into existences wholly alien or repugnant to his own. Never or few, perhaps, in the highest, though often varying, was always Guy Darrell.

But when Waife was once in that magical world of art, Waife was gone—annihilated. Nature; the part lived as if there were no actor to it. It was the book—it was Lear.

For the first time Darrell felt what a great creature a great actor really is—what a luminous, unconscious critic because great. Scenes of which no connoisseur ever dreamed! When the reading was over, and the fire burned low, the gloomy old hearth knew the charm of a homecircle. All started incredulous when the clock struck nine. And not as Sophy, on entering the door, out from behind the window-curtain glared a maddening, spiteful eye. Fairthorn made a move at her, which 'tis a pity Waife did not see—it would have been a study for Colbian. She uttered a little cry.

"What's the matter?" cried the host.

"Nothing," she said she, recollecting her question to betray the hostile oddities of the musician. "Sir Isaac was in my way—that was all."

"Another evening we must have Fairthorn's flute," said Darrell. "Why, Sir Isaac, you not here to-night!—he would have enjoyed such melodies, you know."

Said Mrs. Morley, "He was here once or twice during the evening; but he vanished!"

"Harriet cannot sense his form," said George, Darrell looked annoyed. It was his peculiarity to resent any jest, however slight, upon the absent friend; and at that moment his heart was perhaps more warmed toward Dick Fairthorn than he would have cared to own. He had not determined to be as amicable and mild toward the guests as he intended to be toward Fairthorn. George might have had the flip of a sarcasm which would have tingled for a month. But as Mrs. Harriet seemed to have forgiven, he would, bravely,

"So, George; Fairthorn's foible in vanishing—his forte is fidelity. If my fortune were to vanish, Fairthorn would never disappear; and that's more than I could say for all I were a King, and Fairthorn—a Bishop!"

After this complimentary figure of speech "Good-nights" were somewhat hastily exchanged; and Fairthorn was left behind the curtain with feelings more than the master's guests as little, it is to be hoped, like those of a Christian Bishop and his fellow-creatures as they possibly could be.

CHAPTER VII.

"Domus et plenior Ursæ."

Fairthorn finds nothing pleases in the Ursæ, to whom Darrell is anxious for the welfare.

ANOTHER day! Lionel is expected to arrive an hour or two after noon. Darrell is in his room, and is anxious for the arrival. He has drawn up a rough copy of the codicil by which Fawley is to pass into the hands of Lionel. He will be consigned to the care of grateful Learning, linked with priors and fellowships—a public benefaction, and forever the representatives of its republished bearers. Preparations for departure from the domain of Fawley must have begun. There are large boxes on the floor; and favorite volumes—chiefly in science or classic—lie piled beside them for selection.

What is really at the bottom of Guy Darrell's heart? Does he feel reconciled to his decision? Is the virtue of his new self-sacrifice in itself a consoling reward? Is that cordial urbanity, that cheerful kindness, by which he has been yet more endearing himself to his guests, sincere or assumed? As he throws aside his pen, and leans his cheek on his hand, the expression of his countenance may perhaps best answer those questions. It has more winnigled melancholy than was habitual to it before, even when in his gloomiest moods; but it is a melancholy much more soft and subdued; it is the melancholy of resignation—that of a man who has entered a long struggle—and his enemy is the opposed Necessity, in casting into the sea the thing that had been to him the dearest.

But in resignation, when complete, there is always a strange relief. Despite the sadness of it, Darrell is less miserable than he has been for years. He feels as if a suspense had passed —a load been taken from his heart. Never, till he has secured, to the best of his judgment, the happiness of the living, and the relinquishing the dead to their own life has been vainly devoted, and immolating the pride attached to it, he has yet, to the last hour, been true to the "dues to the dead." No descendant from a Jasper Leedy and a Gabrielle Dermeuts will sit as mistress of the house in which Lovelty and Honor had garnered, with the wrecks of fortune, the memories of unsightly fame—or perpetuate the name of Darrell through children whom blood has a curse and shame has an infamy and a blot. Nor was this consolation that of a culpable pride; it was bought by the dedication of a spirit that had never before made sacrifices to living wants—to living happiness. So pity would not be profaned if pity was not his own —Lionel not barred from a prize that earth never might replace. What mattered to them a misdirected gift, although it represented many hundreds of pitiful acres? Their children would not be less blessed in the healthful, unpretentious home were not shaded by those darksome trees —one less lively of wit, if their school themes were not signed in the register by the name of Lionel Haughton.

A slight nervous knock at the door. Darrell has summoned Fairthorn; Fairthorn enters. Darrell takes up a paper; it contains minute instructions as to the disposal of some of the buildings. The mutterings of the new pile may be dispensed of, and carried to the corner of any where. Those of the old house are sacred —not a brick to be carried from the precincts around it. Yet, from foundation to roof, all to be piously removed—to receive formal inter, sent down in the still depths of the lake. Then and the lake to be filled up and turfed over. The pictures and antiquities selected for the Darrell Museum are, of course, to be carefully transported to London—warehoused safely till the gift-from one to receive it—be ready to claim. The pictures and articles of less value will be sent to an auction. But when it came to the old family portraits in the library, and the old homely furniture, familiarized to sight and use and love from infancy, Darrell's pen paused, and his invention failed. That question was reserved for further consideration.

"And why," says Fairthorn, bluntly and coarsely, urging at least reprieve, "why, if it must be, not wait till after the marriage? why must the old house be buried before you are?"

"Because," answered Darrell, "such an order, left by will, would be a reproach in my heirs; it would wound Lionel to the quick. Done in my lifetime, and at once after I have given my blessing on his marriage, I can suggest a thousand reasons for an act of my own; and my manner would at once dispel all idea of a covert affront to his charming innocent bride."

"I wish she were hanged!" cries the lawyer, muttered Fairthorn, "coming here to do such astonishing mischief!" "Yet," I can't deny her, "its no use talking. You must get some one else. Parson Morley will do it—with pleasure, too, no doubt; or that bullying old man whom I suspect to be a conjurer. Who knows but what he may get the better of you in the end, and he is looking on with his wicked one eye; and then there will be an end of him, too, which would be a great satisfaction!"

"Fshaw, my dear Dick; there is no one else I can ask but you." The Darrells, I can't deny, we had enough of his arguings; and the old man is the last whom my own arguings could deceive. Vet justice.

"Don't, Sir, don't; you are breaking my heart—I—a shame, Sir," sobbed the poor faithful rebel.

"Well, Dick, then I must see it done myself; and you shall go and live in Surrey, and I'll get some villa to suit us. I don't see why Lionel should not be married here, and the old house will be clear. And—yes—it was cowardly in me to shrink. Mine be the task. Shame on me to yield it to another. Go back to thy flute, Dick.

"Xeque libus
Extorpe exhibet, seu Polyhymnia
Lethoum vitigat trudens laudibus."

At that last remorseless shaft from the Horatian quiver, "Venenatis gravida sagittis," Fairthorn could stand it bound no longer. He rose with a shudder—plunge—and once more the man was vanished.

CHAPTER VII

The Flute-player shows how little Music hath power to soothe the savage breast—A Mystery.

FAIRTHORN found himself on the very spot in which, more than five years ago, Lionel, stung by Fairthorn's own incontinence of speech, had been discovered by Darrell. There he threw himself on the ground, as the boy had done; there, like the boy, he brooded moodily, bitterly—were with the world and himself. To that letter, written on the day that Darrell had so shocked him, and on which letter he had counted as a last feeble hope, no answer had been given. In an hour or so Lionel would arrive; those hateful nuptials, dooming Rawley as the nuptials of Paris and Helen had doomed Troy, would be finally arranged. In another week the work of demolition would commence. He never meant to leave Darrell to superintend that work. No; grumble and refuse as he might till the last, moment,he knew well enough that, when it came to the point, he, Richard Fairthorn, must endure any torture that could save Guy Darrell from a pang. A voice comes singing low through the grove—the patter of feet on the crisp leaves. He looks up; Sir Isaac is scrutinizing him gravely—behind Sir Isaac, Lionel. Sir Isaac had probably left his pulpit—yes, lending its faithless neck to that female criminal's destroying hand. He could not bear that sight, which added insult to injury. He scrambled up—darted a kick at Sir Isaac—missed the dog, and fled. Sir Isaac, and looked her in the face (her—not Sophy, but the dog) with a reproach that, if it could have been put into words, words of shame, would have cut her to the heart; then, turning to Sophy, he said, "Let him be." Lionel Haughton shall not wed the child of disgrace! Fear not, Sir; all is safe!"

She shed not a tear; nor was there writ on her countenance that CHAGRIN, which Sophy's self-love might have detected over it at her young lover's melancholy farewell. No, now she was supported—upheld—by a virtue far above the pale of a sorrow—now love was to shelter and save the beloved from disgrace in disgrace. At that thought disgrace fell harmless from herself as the rain from the plumes of a bird. She looked up, and, kneeling, she kissed her hand.

By the porch door she met Waife and the Morleys. With a kind of will impressed on her at the old man's arm, and drew it fondly, glisingly within her own. Henceforth they were to be as in years gone by, one to the side of a servant

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were easier for Beeves, the demand for which . . . . [illegible] Cows were quiet . . . . Veal Calves were in demand at full rates . . . . Sheep and Lambs were in moderate supply and steady . . . . Swine were less active. . . . The reported receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compare as follows:

	Week ending Dec 26	Week ending Dec 19
Beeves	3,372	3,153
Milch Cows	107	132
Veal Calves	377	379
Sheep and Lambs	22,000	23,000
Swine	14,504	13,027

The total receipts of Live Stock at the New York Market during the fifty-two weeks ending December 26, comprised 156,176 Beeves, 6,502 Milch Cows, 19,722 Veal Calves, and 1,040,757 Sheep and Lambs.

The usual range of prices and number of retail sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

	Number of Sales	Prices per lb.
Beef to premium Beeves, per pound	5	6 @ 8
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head	60	30 @ 60
Veal Calves, per pound	41	6 @ 7

" per pound	6	6 @ 10
Live Swine, per pound	71	5 @ 6
Dressed "	6	6 @ 7
Roasting Pigs, each	10	50 @ 75

The Country Produce Markets have been well supplied with the principal articles of consumption, and prices have been very brisk. The fluctuations in prices have been unimportant. Some excitement has been occasioned among dealers by a notification from the City Government that the laws respecting the preservation of Game and Fish would be rigidly enforced hereafter. The result of the season's efforts of the authorities city officials would be the discouragement of contemplants of the prosecution of their unlawful business.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRIDAY EVENING, Friday, Dec. 31, 1858.

The closing week of the year has been a trying one in the money market. Specie has been steadily pressing the banks, and the consequent stringency has been felt in the New York Stock Exchange and Financial circles. The principal cause of the stringency in the New York Money Market is the fact that the banks have accumulated, and the prevailing impression in financial circles is that it will go at least one per cent. lower than the last, as soon as the banks can obtain a portion of the last loan at high figures have done well by it.

Money continues to be very easy. There is perhaps rather more inquiry, and rather more caution is displayed by bankers than was the case some weeks since; but there is as yet no trifling talk of a less rate of interest for the present. Exchange on Europe continues, in the absence of shipments, at a favorable rate, and the supply is not very great.

Stocks are quite steady; there is no business going on now among the speculative juniors of the street. The receipts of all the railways are very poor, and, in the absence of business on the great lines, the public can hardly be expected to enter the street as buyers of stocks.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER NOW PUBLISHED.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2 50 A YEAR.

HARPER'S WEEKLY has now been in existence two years. During that period it has been more than once its aim to make it the best possible Family Paper for the American People, and it is the fixed purpose of the Publishers, in the peculiar field which it occupies, no existing Periodical can be compared with it.

Every Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains all the News of the Week, Domestic and Foreign. The comprehensiveness of this department is, it is believed, unrivalled by any other publication. The Political Intelligence is carefully and accurately illustrated, at the time of publication, by Engravings, Portraits, Maps, Plans, &c., which are executed by the most skilful artists, and which the reader every foreign picture which appears to possess any interest. In this way the publishers of HARPER'S WEEKLY may rely upon obtaining a Pictorial History of the times in which we live, compiled and illustrated in the most perfect and complete manner possible. It is believed that this feature of the Magazine alone—of which about one hundred and fifty have already been published—is worth far more than the whole price of the whole year of its subscription.

The literary character of HARPER'S WEEKLY is supplied by some of the ablest writers in the English language. The Publishers have made arrangements for the receipt of early proofs of the principal articles in the "Edinburgh" and "Quarterly" Reviews, and of the best articles in the "Blackwood" has appeared entire in its columns; one or more short Stories, and the best that can be purchased at home or abroad; the best Poetry of the day; Instructive Essays on topics of general interest; Literary Notices of the books of the time, in the shape of Editorials and the Longer's Literary Criticisms; a Chess Chronicle; and full and correct reports of the Money and Commercial Markets.

RICH AND POOR.

FASHIONABLE STORE.

ONE OF THE FIRST LADIES IN THE CITY. "Is it customary to allow such low people to frequent your establishment? It is so annoying to overhear such vulgar remarks, as wishing to buy a three dollar shawl even, when they know that every cent they can earn should be expended on something to eat, and not to wear. Such people ruin themselves by imitating their betters in dress; in fact, it has entirely disgusted me with buying this set of sables. Just observe Fido he can never bear the sight of those miserable creatures. Dear Fido!"

HARMONIA CRIER. "Mr. Smasher will attend to her case. Indeed, Madam, it is very disagreeable, I assure you. We will guard against such annoyances again in the future."

RETIRED FISHMONGER'S LADY. "Why, Mrs. D——, you look famished! How you have changed since Mr. D——'s death! Not in the fashion! Still wearing the old set! Goodness gracious, I can't imagine how you can venture into the street without a new set of sable. Now, only yesterday, my dear Jane wished me to have a $300 set; but I assure you, Mrs. D——, she just laughed at him—$300 set indeed—$900 or nothing, said I—and home they came. Don't you think they become me?"

POOR MAN. D——, simply said good morning, and continued her search for some kind lady among her former acquaintance, when times were good, to borrow 50 cents to keep her family from starving.

YOUNG WIFE. "How shall I dress my hair, dear? As I wore it at the matinee? or as I had it in the morning?"

PROVOKING HUSBAND (who never notices). "Well, let's see; the way you have it now, I think, is the best."

WHEELER & WILSON'S
SEWING MACHINES.
PRICES GREATLY REDUCED.
Office No. 505 Broadway, New York.
SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.

GOOD NEWS.—A reduction in the prices of Sewing Machines is announced in the present number. Their utility is established beyond question, and, at the present prices, we see no reason why they should not be found, as they ought to be, in every household. Several varieties are manufactured, adapted to many purposes, so far as public opinion has been formed and viewed, the preference is emphatically accorded to the Wheeler & Wilson machine for family use, and for manufactures in which strength and durability are not the principal requisite. Among the titles have been issued to many of the patents of any pretension have been brought fairly into competition. In every case, the Wheeler & Wilson machine has won the highest premiums. We may mention the State Fairs of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Illinois, Wisconsin, Virginia, Michigan, Indiana, Mississippi, Missouri and California, and the Fairs in Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, Baltimore, Richmond, and San Francisco. At the Fair of the Mechanics' Institute Association, the Examining Committee, composed of gentlemen of the highest standing, who without a dissenting voice awarded for the Wheeler & Wilson Machine the highest premium, a Silver Pitcher, valued at $25. Where facts do not establish a reputation, we know not what can.—Christian Advocate and Journal.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

Vol. III.—No. 107.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 15, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

THE YACHT "WANDERER."

THIS now famous vessel, whose recent cruise is causing so much commotion throughout the country, was built at Setauket, on Long Island, under the superintendence of Commodore Hawkins, and launched in June, 1857.

Her original owner, Mr. Johnson, sold her about a year ago to Captain Corrie, of South Carolina, by whom she is at present owned. In the month of June last, the surveyor of Port Jefferson, Mr. J. J. Norton, came to this city, and stated that, from the repairs which were being made to the Wanderer, the size of her water-tanks, and the quantity of stores that were being put on board of her, he had suspicions that she was about to be employed in the slave-trade. Mr. Norton was so positive that the Wanderer was seized and placed in charge of the United States Marshal. That official, however, was soon persuaded by the owners that it was all a mistake; and after detaining the Wanderer for a week or so, let her go. The next heard of her was early in December last, when she suddenly loomed up on the coast of Georgia, and was charged with having been engaged in the slave-trade. She hailed from St. Helena, but without regular papers.

The general opinion—which to some extent is corroborated by the evidence taken on the trial—is that the Wanderer did not herself carry slaves from Africa, but that she served as the pilot and decoy of a larger vessel which did; and that between three and four hundred slaves were landed on or near Jekyll Island, and from thence scattered throughout the Southern country. Many of the Africans have been seen and identified as natives of Africa.

"I WOULD THAT SHE WERE DEAD!"

'Tis a night in cold November,
And I sit by a hearth of my own;
The fire is blazing brightly,
But I sit by its blaze alone.
It is ten long years, I remember,
This very self-same night,
I stood by this hearth-stone thinking,
And gazed in the bright firelight.

That night of all nights, I remember,
I had drawn to my loving side
A girlish form in her beauty,
And proudly I called her my bride;
And I loved her fondly and dearly—
So dearly it seemed like a dream—
And I stood by this firelight thinking,
While I pictured it out in the gleam.

There, far in the deepened shadow,
I had built me a beautiful home;
In the midst of the lakes and the forests
It stood like a living poem.
I had children playing beside me,
I had wealth and a true-hearted friend,
No care to press heavily on me,
And all that the world could send.

And here, in the embers glowing,
I wove me a wonderful name—
The name of a poet and patriot,
With a world-wide whisper of fame.
But above all these pictures of glory,
There was one I had lain to my life:
This home was the case for the jewel,
My darling and beautiful wife!

The years have run swiftly to nothing,
And I sit by the fire and stare
In the glow of its embers vainly
For what I once pictured there.
There is only a clouded changing;
Where glimmers of light come out,
But before I can trace the picture
They vanish and leave me in doubt.

Ah! where are those beautiful pictures,
Those pictures I painted in light,
And why do I sit here lonely
On this chilly November night?
'Tis a tale of a terrible import;
I tremble, and shudder, and start,
Whenever, by day or by darkness,
I tell it into my own heart.

I worshiped her wondrous beauty,
I praised it in sunshine and storm;
Her dream-like face in its glory,
Her delicate roundness of form.
It was part of my love to tell it;
I gloated on what I had won.
Oh! would that my tongue had been speechless
Before the wild telling were done.

As soon would I thought to have doubted
The source of eternal life
As the purity, truth, and honor
Of my young and my beautiful wife.
O God! in thy mercy save me
From the memory of that day
When she fell from her truth and honor,
And passed from my side away.

I have stood by the bedside cursing,
With my soul in a tumult wild,
When you took, in your gracious wisdom,
My only, my heart-born child.
As much, O God! as I loved her,
I hoist to your stern decree,
Though it tears out my soul when I say it,
She is better in heaven with thee.

I have sat by this fireside trembling,
While the wealth I had madly won
Was passing away from my keeping,
Like mist from the morning sun.
It was something to mourn for a moment,
But I lived in the world alone,
And I gave up the gold and my trembling
With a single, silent moan.

I have drunk from the cup of sorrow,
And eaten the bread of shame;
But of all that has passed before me
I was still in my heart the same.
But oh! this day thou hast crushed me—
This day, of all days of the year,
Thou hast left me here by my fireside,
With a shivering, deadly fear.

This day I have seen the woman
Who lay on my bosom for years—
The woman I worshiped in sunshine—
The woman I worshiped in tears.
She was old, and wan, and haggard—
I would that this saying were all;
But—she wore a dress that I gave her—
I gave her—before her fall.

It was ragged, and torn, and draibled,
But I knew in an instant again
The horrible shade of each color,
That burned to my quivering brain.

THE YACHT "WANDERER."

I have seen her the star of the evening,
Wearing that robe of death,
When my heart overflowed with the praises
They spoke of her under the breath.

She was old, and wan, and haggard;
She was shaved, and drabbled, and torn;
But she was not worse than I am,
With the light of my life all gone.

I met my eyes on the vision,
And I bowed my stricken head;
I only uttered one silent prayer—
"I would that we were dead!"

I am sitting here in the firelight,
But I can not trace a line;
The woman I loved in years agone
Stands with her life in mine.
God, in thy mercy listen to me,
Ere the light of my soul be fled—
Listen, and grant this single prayer—
"I would that she were dead!"

OUR FOREIGN POLICY.

IN moments of fond patriotic delusion, of pleasing national hallucination, we are not to apply to our beloved country, and to our beloved selves, many high-sounding epithets and sesquipedalian phrases that a sober judgment can hardly uphold. Among these are many of diplomatic and statesmanlike expression at the head of this article—Our Foreign Policy!

Our world really thinks, from the immemorial times that these words are used by honorable Representatives and more honorable Senators, by Secretaries and by Presidents, in newspapers, in orations, in Messages, that this country really had something like a line of conduct in regard to its foreign concerns—some notions—some traditions, at least—which might properly be called a Foreign Policy.

No greater error can be imagined or asserted. This country has no foreign policy whatever—nothing that can decently pretend to the name. Japan is not more destitute of a foreign policy than the United States.

How can it be otherwise? Every four years we put a new man at the helm. Sometimes, it is true, we select one who, from long service at home and abroad, may be truly called a veteran statesman, like Mr. Buchanan. Oftener we take a gallant old bush-fighting colonel, like Taylor; or a Western politician, like Mr. Polk, or a pivot of party combination, like General Pierce, neither of whom had any knowledge, whatever of Europe or of any of the languages of Europe. Our Cabinets, again, are composed of men of the same class—men whose lives have been passed in domestic party management and party warfare. How on earth, or why on earth, should they take any care about our foreign affairs or our foreign policy? The most election in New York or Arkansas is more important to them than a score of European revolutions.

Look again at the men whom we send abroad as diplomats. Diplomats indeed! The foreign ministers, with here and there rare exceptions, are notoriously given as the mere reward of political service at home; and fitness, whether resulting from residence abroad or knowledge of the European languages, is a positive disqualification.

"I desire, Sir," says General ——, a highly respectable Member of the House from Arkansas, "to recommend Mr. —— most strenuously as a very fit and proper person for the post of Minister to the Court of Turin."

"Has Mr. —— ever been in Europe?"

"No, Sir!"

"Does Mr. —— speak French or any other European tongue?"

"No, Sir! and I should be glad to know whether any such aristocratic requisition as that is to be made?"

Unhappily General —— is as logically right as he is indisputably important to the dominant party in Arkansas. Education is an aristocratic qualification; and all aristocracy with us being odious and leading to ostracism, the gentleman who has never seen Europe, who does not know a syllable of any foreign speech, is sent abroad, to wear a cocked hat and an embroidered coat, and draw his very comfortable salary.

And so our foreign affairs go. Here are all the great transit routes between our Atlantic and Pacific possessions left utterly at the mercy of hordes of ignorant and mongrel barbarians, with England and France directly and indirectly striving to get control of them; and, ten years after the golden discovery of California, all we have actually done for the protection of the great highway is to make a treaty (Monument of folly!) by which we have bound ourselves not to establish or exert any influence over that part of this continent so indispensable to the integrity of our empire. Oh! our Foreign Policy!

Here again is Mexico! crumbling to pieces before our eyes, and we sit stupidly gazing on the process, doing nothing to assert or maintain our influence in that country; and all the while the great European powers are steadily and systematically at work to create and maintain interests which are directly hostile to ours, and which some day must stand directly in our path of empire. Oh! our Foreign Policy!

And at the very time that all this is going on—while the currents of empire are in motion around us in every direction—while the unequaled industrial energies of Americans are achieving marvels of every kind, we—the people, the politicians, the statesmen of this great country—like a parcel of Kilkenny tomcats, are snarling at each other over the library bone, or the Tariff bone, or some bone or another, and eating each other up with infinite howling, and yelling, and clawing, and scratching—of our intelligence, and of our energies absorbed in paltry questions of local policy and local plunder.

Away with the delusion of our having a Foreign Policy! Better than this state of things, let us recall our avowers and ministers, abolish the mere show of expensive and useless establishment, and husband our resources till the nation has the will and the intelligence to enter upon the career of empire in a manner that becomes us.

HOW IT INVESTS MONEY.

HAPPILY, the difficulty of finding an investment for money seems to oppress chiefly people at this time; for the simple reason that much fewer people than usual made, in the year 1858, more money than they required for their household expenses. It was, emphatically, a year of small profits. Still there are some persons, even at the present time, who have more money than they can spend, and to them the following remarks are addressed.

Persons who are not engaged in commercial pursuits usually put their money in one or more of three ways—either they lend it to corporations; or they buy stocks; or they discount commercial paper. An active-minded man, with a fair capital and some experience in business, will evidently prefer the last-mentioned investment. In ordinary times a shrewd man can make, without much risk, from ten to twelve on his money, by discounting good paper and using his facilities at the banks where he keeps his account. Many men make more than that sum in this way, and do not lose one year's profits in ten years' business. But this employment of money will naturally be unpopular with those who will freedom from care, anxiety, and labor. They will buy either land or stocks.

There is no use to be said about land. It can not be lost or ruined by mismanagement. Revolutions may destroy it, indeed, but Western wars our other accidents can permanently affect it. A lot 25 by 100 in the city of New York, or a farm of one hundred acres in immediate distance of a railway station, can not but increase in value as the country improves. No commercial or political calamity can for disaster can ultimately impair its real worth. It is a solid, reliable property. But the very reasons which make it permanent and safe render its absolute property to hold operate with equal force against it. Persons who have real estate to sell expect to be paid for the advantages and conveniences compared with other kinds of property. The certain advance in its selling price is foreseen, and taken into account by the owner when he purchase, therefore, must expect to pay not the real value at the present time but the prospective value ten years hence. Thus, when the city like acres on the Hudson or Long Island, or in Westchester or Richmond counties, are sold, not at their real value to-day, but at the price which they are likely to be worth in 1870, or thereabouts. The purchaser must make his mind up to hold the property for that time, or more, and to lose the interest on his purchase-money for the years before he can really feel that his purchase is worth what he gave for it. This is a serious drawback to real estate as an investment.

As to stocks. There are but two kinds of stocks generally dealt in—State and city bonds, and railway shares. With a few honorable exceptions, the reliable descriptions are already selling at very high prices. The New York, Massachusetts, United States, and other first-class securities, are all selling over par. The second-class State stocks—Virginian, Tennessee, Missouri, Pennsylvania—are below par—between 90 and par, or thereabout. First-class city bonds are equally high. There are a few bonds of South Western cities bearing high rates of interest, which may be bought at low prices; but they are subject to the contingencies of Western United States, and other first-class securities, are all selling over par. The second-class State stocks—Virginian, Tennessee, Missouri, Pennsylvania—are below par—between 90 and par, or thereabout. First-class city bonds are equally high. There are a few bonds of South Western cities bearing high rates of interest, which may be bought at low prices; but they are subject to the contingencies of Western legislation, and any prudent man would buy them as a permanent investment. Finally, there are railway stocks and bonds. At first blush, it does not appear that there can be any question of the real value of first or second mortgage bonds on the leading railroads of the North. It would be at once pronounced that there are many legal questions respecting railway securities which our country have not yet settled, and which may seriously affect the value of even first mortgage bonds. For instance, it is not clear to what extent the usury laws in force in the various States may not invalidate the claims of bond-holders who bought bonds under par. Nor is it yet settled whether a mortgage bond can affect a rail laid down after the bond was issued, though said rail was laid to replace a worn-out rail on which the bond was secured. These and other questions must be determined by judgments of courts of final resort before even mortgage bonds on railway property can be classed as unquestionable securities. As to railway stocks, the experience of the last twelve months has convinced even the most incredulous that they can not be considered as property to be held for dividends. No railway in the North earned a fair income in the year 1858; most of them ceased to pass dividends; a few—and a few only—have fully accommodated a cheap fraud, and borrowed money to pay their usual percentage of "profits." But the experience of the year has convinced every sensible person that this class of securities must be carefully avoided by all who seek permanent and safe investments.

On the whole, we see no better employment for the money, by those who do not desire to devote their time to watching their stock-market investment, and husband our resources till the nation has the will and the intelligence to enter upon the career of empire in a manner that becomes us.

HOW IT INVESTS MONEY.

HAPPILY, the difficulty of finding an investment for money seems to oppress chiefly people at this time; for the simple reason that much fewer people than usual made, in the year 1858, more money than they required for their household expenses. It was, emphatically, a year of small profits. Still there are some persons, even at the present time, who have more money than they can spend, and to them the following remarks are addressed.

Persons who are not engaged in commercial pursuits usually put their money in one or more of three ways—either they lend it to corporations; or they buy stocks; or they discount commercial paper. An active-minded man, with a fair capital and some experience in business, will evidently prefer the last-mentioned investment. Nor is it yet settled whether a mortgage bond can affect a rail laid down after the bond was issued, though said rail was laid to replace a worn-out rail on which furnished the means for its accomplishment; just as they granted enormous sums of money to the Collins line of steamers, which was controlled by a liverpool firm. And after all, the telegraph turns out to be so English a scheme that even the designs of the Company are unknown here.

We stated many months since that so soon as the telegraph was in working order, the people of this country would discover that it was all a humbug and purpose a British enterprise, which would, in case it need, be used against the United States just as naturally as the British fleet or a British battery. The failure of the enterprise has precipitated the verification of our statement.

The explanations for the people of this country to try what they can do toward the laying of a separate Atlantic Cable. A cable could be laid at a moment's notice to connect Cape Breton and Portugal; and it would, we imagine, be easy to obtain from the Government of Portugal the necessary guarantees for the safety of the enterprise in case of trouble in that kingdom. Such a line of telegraph would at all times be held at America's mad, in the event of hostilities between Great Britain and the United States, would enable this country to communicate freely with the European continent. Until some such cable is laid, Britannia, do what we may, will rule the sea, so far as telegraphs are concerned.

ABOUT DEAD MEN

THE old adage which, being enshrined in decent Latin, commands the respect of every one who does not understand the defunct tongue, declared that one should say nothing unpleasant of a man who was dead. The theory, apparently, is that death, like charity, covered a multitude of sins. Hence, though a man had led the life of a reprobate and a sinner, yet, when he was dead, it was proper to allude to him as a Christian and a saint. The most notorious rascals of all this principle were the old priests, who, as every one knows, would, every day of their lives, the greatest reprobates in the world, speak of the departed as "at rest in Christ." In our day, the newspapers, after abusing a man to the hour of his death, no sooner announce the sudden circumstance of his demise than they publish the most flattering obituary notices of his private and public career. And people are forbidden to say a word in spite of their firm belief that Smith was a villain in the flesh are brought, by the burial of said Smith, to the point where he had many good qualities, or was, on the whole, a credit to his day and generation.

The credit of deviating from this established practice belongs to the people of Boston. The Boston papers—which have more than once rendered themselves infamous throughout the country inaugurated the system of telling the truth about dead men. Within the past six months Boston possessed the rather unique luxury of both millionaires—both men before whom common humanity was apt to cower. The one was Thorndike—the other was Augustus Thorndike. Both were unsavory individuals, whose only merit was their wealth. Under ordinary circumstances, the death of either would have been lowered into pompous graves under a fire of funeral eulogies, and would have been duly canonized in the local journals. But, as it is that the truth has been told about them, and honest portraits drawn from life, in the Boston papers.

When Francis died, with nearly three millions of dollars to his credit, the leading banks and of Massachusetts, the newspapers described him simply as he was—a mean, sordid miser, without a thought beyond the accumulation of the vilest trace of heart or sentiment of any kind. When Thorndike died, after elaborately diminishing his children, the Boston journals of Boston were not afraid to say that he was what his will proved him to be—a narrow-minded, selfish, revengeful man, managing in a whom spleen and spite had extinguished the last spark of generous humanity.

We should be glad to see this practice prevail in New York as well as Boston. There ought to be some distinction made between a Peter Cooper and an Astor—between a man who is, had both died in New York, the papers would have dealt out even measure of praise to both. Both men are dead—both are beyond praising. Were it generally understood that bad men would be denounced after death, many millionaires might try to relieve their feelings by exercises by some good deeds at the close of their career.

We have in New York several rich men whose names are synonymous with trickery, fraud, and greed of gain. As the case stands, when they die, clergy, press, and people will fall down and worship the immensity of their estate, and will honor them as though they were a credit, instead of being a disgrace, to humanity. Who will set the example of drawing a bold line between the good and the bad, irrespective of wealth? What clergyman will have the courage to warn his hearers against following in the footsteps of dishonest Mr. A, or the mean Mr. B, or the miser Mr. C, who died the other day, worth ever so many millions? What paper will give us an honest biography of a bad rich man? Is all the truth-telling in the country exclusively confined to Boston?

THE LOUNGER.

ROBERT BURNS.

A HUNDRED years ago, on the 25th of January, 1759, Robert Burns was born. The centenary of day catalogues, near the town of Ayr, the Kirk of Alloway, and the old bridge of Doon. On the 25th of this January, 1859, the great cities of another continent the most famous men are to meet and commemorate the birthday of the poor Scotch farmer's boy. In New York Bryant is to preside, and Halleck, who has sung well of the earlier poet, is to be present, and Dana, whose heart is large enough for every kind of honest man, is to deliver an oration. In Boston there will be no such talk as the name of the poets, Everett of the orators, and Holmes of the wits. Lowell, also, who has sung of Burns, and his sweet song of whom Boston is proud, with the same reason that Cornelia was proud of her jewels, will show, by her presence, how they love the man, and honor the poet, Robert Burns.

As we write, we see a photograph of his birthplace. It is a low, long hovel of one story, heavily thatched. The wall is broken by two short windows to the roof; and two large windows with clumsy shutters outside, and a small square window of four panes. A log is under the eaves, by the side of the door, announces that this is the "Burns cottage. Robert Burns, the Ayrshire poet, was born under this roof on the 25th of January, A.D. 1759," and the date of his death thirty-six years after forward. On the other side of the door, as a pendant, is another sign with the proprietor's name; and in the middle, in large letters, "Refreshments." The cottage are a low hedge, and some trees; but the house is mournfully desolate.

"Yes, it is unutterable both," says the Ettrick Shepherd "and in the depth of winter, was Robert Burns born, when years ago the snow was in the shape of his portraits."

And here is another photograph of Alloway Kirk, it is an entirely roofless building, but with the stone walls and gables standing complete, and a stone belfry on the gable. There are trees and bushes in the gable end under the belfry there is a slab on which is a "Burns" cut in the stone, and underneath drawing stones at or otherwise injuring the soil or tomb-stones will be prosecuted." A large tree grows magnificently in the midst of the Kirk-ring, spreading its branches above the walls, and the grave-yard which surrounds the Kirk is full of mossy tomb-stones, some sharply cut and evidently new. The ruin is not beautiful, no since clung to it and clamber over it; but the whole impression is one sympathy that belong to the story of Burns hang it with indescribable tenderness.

And here is another photograph of the "Auld brig o' Doon." It is a winding, bowery stream; the abrahs come up to the sides of the bridge, which is the banks and trees bloom fresh and fair, and the bridge leaps from shore to shore in a single arch. Through the arch another bridge is seen beyond. Both trees and sunbeams at the end of the "brig." All is tranquil and peaceful. There are no ruins, places like it in romantic, pastoral beauty; but new few of such exquisite loveliness.

"Tam'n trink my heart, thou warbling bird.
That wantons through you flowering thorn
Thou minds me of departed joys,
Departed—never to return."

Here, lately, in December, a monument at Ayr. He died at Dumfries on the 21st July, 1796, and his remains were placed under the monument on the 5th of June, 1815. It is a conspicuous, circular, open temple. Nine or ten Corinthian columns support a pediment around which are inscribed words. The whole is surmounted with a rather awkward pedestal, supporting a tripod holding a vase. There are long and heated discussions about this, and so much honor was showered upon Robert Burns when he was dead! The last was the address of the commander of the cavalry of the Cinque Ports, quartered at Dumfries, marched as one of the chief mourners at the funeral of Robert Burns. Every day was declined a personal introduction to the living poet!

But what are the Earls and the monuments? A bardy, weak, honest, trampled, staggering, falling, boorful, humorous, human, sweet and noble poet. In his a brother of ours, by his singing our master, comforter, and teacher. Robert Burns lived and loved, sang and died, a noble, sorrowing, suffering, human being, a kindly, kindling influence, as long as the human heart throbs, and laugh, loves, hates, pares, and remembers.

THE WIDOW'S MITE.

IN a city of New England a young handmaiden of the Master Vine was assigned to a certain district to canvass every house. Some people gave her large sums, some small, and some nothing at all. She met with many rebuffs in her work, and gave every body the opportunity of sharing in the good work. One poor old woman gave her a humble shop, where an old woman sold cakes and candles, and stated her mission.

"My dear young lady," replied the old woman, looking at her sadly, "I have sad a nothing to-day or yesterday. I have a family to support, and how do you think I can spare any thing for such a purpose?"

"Oh! I did not expect you to give me any thing," answered the young handmaiden; "but I thought you might like to have the chance, that you might not feel that you had been neglected."

The young lady turned to go, but the old woman looked so wistfully that she lingered at the door.

"I wish I could give you something," she said at length, earnestly.

"I will take the good wishes, and thank you kindly," replied the younger.

"I suppose you only take large sums of a dollar and more?" asked the other.

"Oh, no, I take any thing that you may chooses to give."

"Well, my young lady, it would do no good to give you something, for there is no people as ever read of whom I loves as I do General Washington. I always cut out of the newspapers every scrap that tells about him, and lay it by to read at night after I have shut up my shop. I wish I could give you money."

She said it musingly and hesitatingly, and at last, after asking whether any one was not near too small, she took a three cent piece from her pocket, and, handing it to the young woman, said, earnestly:

"There, it's nothing; and you won't put it down in your book, please. I shall feel happier if I know I have done ever so small a thing for the honor of Washington."

FEE, FAW, FUM.

THERE are days in the summer when the wise people look up at the cloud-girdled sun as if it was a thunder in the air," and sure enough, before sunset the heavens are torn with terrific thunder.

In like manner, there is a notable feeling of belligerence in the political atmosphere within a few days. Last week, in Congress, Mr. Giddings was aggressman. The most bellicose billets have been some swaggering paragraphs. The honorable member for Arizona bites his thumb at the honorable member for Dacotah. Another honorable member hints that he will not take it lying down, but despises that which is willing. Peace, peace! Anywhere you will be, but not here. Why, as you said so, then I said so."

Nothing comes of it, of course, for nothing was meant to come of it. Why is not glad? Who wishes to mind more horrors or more atrocities? Death, in the midst of life, holds the keen scythe, and why should not the dudlo follow? If the Hon. Smith goes out to the bloody field with the Hon. Jones, there is no more loss in the business because the entire public knows perfectly well that the principal parties are not in it. And because they were particularly anxious about any body's loss, but because they were afraid that the loss might be the philosophy of the contemporary dust. There is some awful something which Bob Acres is afraid of when he says that he does not like cool sarcasm or challenge, and so he accepts it and runs the risk—as the corresponding editor of the Herald does. I suppose there is a difficulty involving the ducllo, immediately turn on a stream of ink, and you have settled it to your satisfaction. Or, rather, the ink stone believed in the virtue of an ipse. How much easier is the latter way!

Let us hope that Smith's bones will not be ground to make Jones's bread. Let every distinguished statesman, when he is commissioner or representative, be allowed to charge loss and infamous falsehood upon his opponent. Let there be a code that ought to satisfy the extremest requirements of decency, humanity, and self-respect. The letters of public men are made to be read, and if they are making them equally free of good-nanners; and the public knows all that is necessary to let them be allowed to call each other evil names, but not to fight—and they will all cry "Amen!"

M. DE LAMARTINE.

THERE was lately some talk of renewing the effort to raise a sum of money for the benefit of the country; but no effort could be more hopeless. For a very pretty problem for the mathematical people to find out is, how much the subscription list of the Mount Vernon subscription, to compute the probable number of the subscribers and the subscribers for Lamartine.

But the latter has just completed the third year of his "Course of Literature," and bewails the tardy accumulation of francs upon the national subscription list. He gives an historical history of his affairs. He declares that he is not going to surrender his property to his creditors and keep Francs. "Never," he says, "will I work. I do not despair: active patience will in the end overcome misfortune, and the noblest way to live is to labor."

Oh, Lamartine! Lamartine! How great wert thou in the days of long-ago, in the hideway of the Hôtel de Ville, when the world looked on delighted, and saw a poet pacifying France and Lamartine! A delightful, romantic, natural history! An anarchy could hardly be stayed, and thy tongue was the key of the storm-gates which kept back and replaces the falling stones of the social structure! The one name every where repeated with enthusiasm and affectionate was that of Lamartine. Then, indeed, sneered at non-water; but a ship of state and letter dead in rose-water than go ashore upon the rocks of savage terrorism.

In the days of Forty-eight Lamartine did, in the truest dramatic sense, a very great service to his country and to civilization. He established a claim upon the gratitude of his fellow-citizens which no one urges, and he is the first and most persistent. Yet the author, but in hand, begging an alms to save his seventeen years, is a sight which makes the most idiots from memory that of the poet ruling a mad crowd with words. For a single moment of fire to his country his country had paid him with a splendid renown. Why should he stand bescheming, year after year, for a paltry few francs?

There was once another author not far from Paris who made a plan for the permanent relief of benefactors of mankind—one of the best-beloved of men. Of him, too, his country was proud; he was easily the first man of his time in literary renown. This author, too, fell into pecuniary distress. Probably there was no man in the world who had been touched, and delighted, and elevated by his sympathetic genius but would have gladly sought to help him in his straits had any chance been offered. It was not offered, nor demanded; but in his declining years this man addressed himself to the task of righting his affairs by hard, honest labor. The task was prodigious, and it was prodigiously performed; but it overwhelmed him. Worn year after year was consumed in the labor, until the brain wandered and the cunning hand dropped to his side. He died, in the pres of the battle, like one of his own heroes of romance and chivalry; and the world went over his grave as the dear mistresses of those heroes bewailed them. The end crowned the work, and showed that the man whom the world had loved and honored was a man indeed.

Can Lamartine remember Walter Scott, and ask another franc for charity?

MORE MOUNT VERNON.

"DEAR BLOUNT,—DON'T you think the Weekly is a little hard upon the effort for the purchase of Mount Vernon? Yours, truly,

NOT at all. In the editorial columns, a week or two since, there was a statement of "the futile resolution" made by persons who wished to commend themselves from giving to the fund. Certainly there was no unkindness in publicly stating what every body knows. The great fact of the whole matter is, not that we are going to buy Mount Vernon, but that the project has been started in the country for nearly a year, and Mount Vernon is not yet purchased.

A Lenten season see that there is great danger of Mount Vernon's becoming not a monument of the love of Washington, but of our regard for our own pockets. There are at least fifty thousand people in the city of New York able to give fifty cents to the fund, and not know it. Now they do not do so. And why not? Is there any other reason than that they don't care to? If they do not, they ought to care to? Yes, but is not the moral value of the purchase of Mount Vernon greater than the memory of Washington, not that we ought to? Suppose by raking and scraping and incessant tugging and struggling the adequate sum is finally got, and the bargain concluded, can it possibly have the slightest effect upon the daily life and conduct of a rude and love and homage? You may carve over the portal "The nation to its Father," but on the reverse you must write "Mean as ever," and the postupity puzzle over that, as we puzzle over the Egyptian hieroglyphics. It is probably perfectly simple, if we only had the key.

There is another view worth considering. Here the great trials in the editorial rooms, that in this country we do not honor our famous men in this way. Nor do we. Nor have we ever done so. Be it blamed. If it were an indication of any want of zeal love and reverence for Washington, we might be justly censured.

But why should we be troubled that we have not a certain way of showing our feeling? It is not the substance of the question. It is a pity that the tomb of Washington should go to decay; but that can be very easily remedied, and will be, when we may be the result of the effort to buy the whole estate.

And for one, the Lounger has often enough protested against the tendency to deify Washington. His whole wish is not to see the memory of Washington be emphatically a man, and yet there is a popular superstition which invests it with a certain mystic. A great many good people fall into a passion of indignation because Thackeray represented Washington as a man of a certain period, acting like other young heroes of the same time, and like all young men.

"The slanderous British novelist!" cried they, "to tarnish the early fame of our greatest, most glorious, and purest!"

Exactly, gentlemen, and how much do you subscribe for restoring his tomb from his dishonor?

"Not a cent. His descendant ought to be ashamed of himself for bolding on to a few dirty acres as if they were wards of gold dust!"

We may not wish to buy Mount Vernon, but we certainly have a right to traffic in sneering, and abuse Mr. Washington for not letting us gratify our sentiments of veneration for his memory.

Ten thousand men, instead of two hundred thousand. Mr. Washington's general character is not to be questioned. He was a business man, a merchant—and so do we. And because we are mean enough to want to buy cheap, while you are willing to pay as high as they should we abuse him for the meanness of wanting to sell dear?

Naughty one! Not to trouble the women who have undertaken this work, and who labor so earnestly for their object. And it will surely show nothing more than that they had mistakenly made their own form of respect the measure of that of their countrymen. It is a fine thing to be just and full-hearted.

In any case an effected ignorance of what every body thinks and says is not advisable. A FRIEND sees articles all the time plunging their heads in the sand, and he can say whether they are bidden or not.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—CLYDE, Cincinnati, is reminded that an editor must keep his paper clean for the sake of his readers, and must consequently consider many circumstances that may not be known to or appreciated among them. A journal which aims to satisfy the largest number of readers, and to draw from every class its often inaccessible to many of its friends, will often be exposed to individual criticisms; but its conduct will, of course, be determined by the general satisfaction. Equally, of course, it is a blunder to insert any thing which is not correctly and reliable; and it is not always a good a judge of that as any of his readers? He is always glad to receive suggestions, and a good editor always considers them carefully; but in a paper evidently edited with care, it is fair to presume that any marked policy or custom is the result of experience and reflection.

—DES MOINES inquires about the comical genius of Americans. American literature has a certain vein of genuine humor, as in Irving, Holmes, Lowell, Curzons, and others; but it is certainly deficient in that prompt, sparkling, grotesque, and burlesque fun which so sparkles and crackles in Dickens, Hood, Lamb, Thackeray, and the entire Punch literature. There is surely something ghastly in an American funny paper. The best things we do in that way are generally in a vein which has been opened over the sea; and if we depended entirely upon our own humor for our entertainment, American life would be a very solemn tragedy.

—B. F. R. wishes to know who is the author of the beautiful poem,

"In summer when the days were long."

It is seven years, nearly eight perhaps, that the Lounger was reading a London Leader, and was struck by the very great beauty of a little poem which was signed H. He "clipped it out," and it was published in the Tribune, from which it was copied into all the papers, and had a very wide several collections. But the author is still unknown to the Lounger, who is sorry to part with the feeling that he first made the poem known in this country. Does any body know any thing more about it?

—A correspondent speaks very kindly of Mr. Buchanan Read's pictures, especially of the one now in this city, and which is owned by a Philadelphian.

"I am always at a loss to say whether Mr. Read cares most to show color or its drawing. Here, as usual, the same excellence appears in both. This is an ambitious performance. Well-executed conventional figures are the principal figure that airy grace necessary for the effect of the floating drapery. The color is rich and pleasant sounding, and I am willing to pronounce this the most successful work as well as the most ambitious performance. Then again we have 'Sheridan's Wooing,' a handsome subject treated at home, but painted in an American and not a Roman style. Mr. Read does not get foreignized by his foreign wanderings."

—The Lounger can not recall the copy of verses which E. S. writes.

—O. B. TEBE, as his name implies, is a member of the Mouse Club, a set of jolly good fellows, who laugh at their own jokes and make themselves funny. The Club, as every body in Utica, it appears from his letter, was appointing O. B. just a committee of one to discover the point of somebody's else joke, and to report "where the laugh came in." The Lounger is afraid the report and the laugh will come in the same. He is very sorry he can not help his correspondent. There are so many Mouse Clubs scattered that every body must find out the point of them for himself; and if you find they have none, why then, probably, the point is somewhere else. Ask the company for trying to discover what does not exist.

—J. E. H., of Elmira, writes:

"In the Weekly for December 4 a couple of epigrams were given as 'By R. Bulwer Lytton,' the first of which is as follows:

"In ancient days—and no great loss—
They hung the knave upon the cross;
Now differently they deal with us,
And hang the cross upon the knave!

"I wish to know whether this epigram is a real personage and known to be the author of the above, or whether it is only a newspaper attribution? And also, whether the epigram is correct as given above, or if I remember it have seen it printed anonymously many years ago, and which was as follows:

"In ancient times the custom was
To hang the rogue upon the cross;
But now the custom is in vogue
To hang the cross upon the rogue."

The Lounger can not say which is the original form—but upon the other point he can inform his correspondent that R. B. is a misprint for E., and that E. Bulwer Lytton is "a real personage" and a "known" author unquestioned. He has written several novels, and a poem called the Siamese Twins.

—That first friend, A CONSTANT READER, thinks that the Lounger, in the name of his working men, for his labors in giving them information which they can not find any where else.

"I have searched in vain for the correct pronunciation of that very word (Dictionaries) in many places, and also in the list of words mispronounced at the end of Webster's Dictionary, the quarto edition. I hope the editor of that edition will see this letter, and that he introduce it in the next edition. If it wouldn't be troubling you too much, I should like your opinion on the etymology of which I have been greatly puzzled."

He then suggests the word Ptisan, which the Lounger has tried. He demands to know what a quarter edition of a dictionary is—how much too much one person can be puzzled with a single word?

When he has received answers to these questions, he can enter upon the discussion of the words proposed in a more tranquil frame of mind.

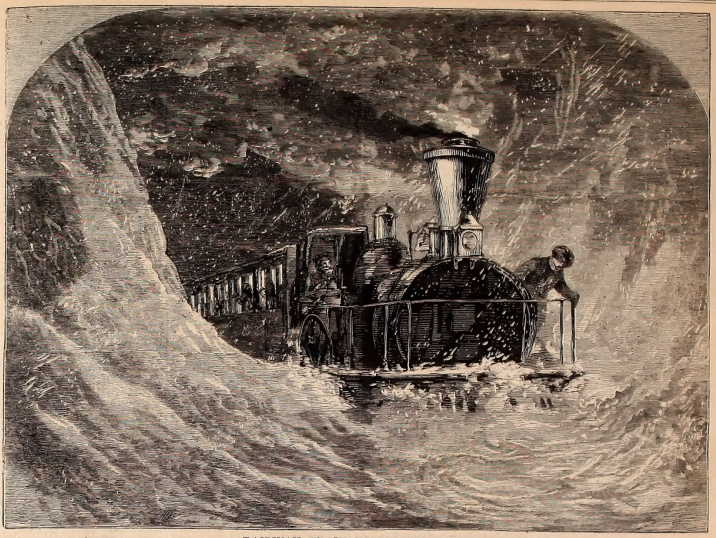
—The Lounger has the following from an eyewitness of the voyage of the Surnmark:

"NEW YORK, December 31, 1858.

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—In running over your valuable Weekly for November 27, I find a statement of the sailing of the steamship Surnmark, the first that ever crossed the Atlantic, and the Baltic. I was a witness to her passing up the Baltic for St. Petersburg. On a fine, clear day in the Baltic sea, abreast of the island of Gottland—salute—yes, like the Admiral at Cork, now a great smoke, supposed it to rise from the Island of Gotland; we, in the name of our host, were a three-mast full-rigged ship, no sail set. At about 3 P. M. she was alongside, exchanged signals, spoke her, and informed us we were bound for St. Petersburg to present her to the Emperor of Russia.

"Yours respectfully, CAPTAIN L. TURNER."

THE UNITED STATES SLOOP OF WAR "BROOKLYN."



RAILWAY TRAIN IN A SNOW-STORM.

STOPPED BY THE SNOW-DRIFT.

UNITED STATES STEAM SLOOP OF WAR "BROOKLYN."

THE beautiful specimen of naval architecture was built for the United States Government by Jacob A. Westervelt, and is now at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, ready to receive her men, guns, and stores. Her length on deck is 247 feet, breadth of beam 43 feet, depth of hold 21½ feet, being 700 tons, government measurement, and is rated at 14 guns on the upper deck, although pierced for 26.

On the 27th of July last the Brooklyn was launched, and on the 1st of January, 1859, she took her place in the United States Navy. As a full description of her has already been given in the daily papers, we will only mention a few of her peculiarities of construction and model not embraced in any other similar vessel. Although by far the largest ship of war in our navy, or in the world, and carrying, of course, the heaviest battery ever placed on board of any vessel of her class, she still her draught is but 16 feet when fully equipped for sea. This is a desideratum which has been long sought for in our navy; but, unfortunately, up to the building of the Brooklyn, could not be obtained. The secrecy is now solved, and the Brooklyn's model has already been taken as a type in the construction of several others, and the same must combines on this deck are of makogany; a wood never before used for such a purpose in our navy. All the spars required, including those for three boats, are carried upon a bridge amid-ships, elevated above the deck sufficiently high to clear it under, which is an entirely new arrangement. By this improvement the space upon deck is kept clear and unobstructed for working the guns. On this deck there are two water-closets at each end for the accommodation of warrant officers and other officers; a great convenience, and one seldom appreciated in the construction of our vessels-of-war. Her cables are all carried upon this deck by one of William Sibsby's improved capstans, constructed the best one in use by all who have tried them. Below, on the berth-deck, are the accommodations for her men and officers, arranged in accordance with the most modern and improved plans. Her entire complement will be about 800 men. The captain's cabin is situated on the left of the ship in length at the after end of this deck, and in point of elegance and convenience surpasses that of any vessel in our navy. The woods used in its construction are rose-wood and white holly. It contains a state-room for the captain, one for the secretary, a bath-room, water-closet, pantry, and store-room. The entrance is from the after-deck by a circular stairway of mahogany. In the hold are stowed the iron watertanks, magazines, breadroom, shell-room, cables, &c. Of the latter article of interest here is the engine, built by James Murphy & Co., and Stillman Allen, by all who have used it, to be as perfect as can be produced in the United States. The boilers are Martin's patent, now generally adopted in the naval vessels. The propeller is of composition, 14 feet 6 inches in diameter, and weighing 5 tons. A model arranged for hoisting on deck when not needed, and can be taken out of water by means of a capstan, arranged for the purpose, in less than two minutes time. She is spared precisely like sailing vessels of similar tonnage in the merchant service, her sail-power being merely an auxiliary affair. Her speed is estimated at ten knots under steam, when ready for sea. She will cost considerably less than one-half of the money spent in building the fur-famed Niagara, and will be, in the opinion of many naval officers, a more efficient vessel as a man-of-war. The hull, while building, was subject to the inspection of Naval Constructor Isherwood. He, with the supervision of the engine was allotted to Chief-Engineer Daniel B. Harmony; both of whom are justly celebrated for their high attainments and practical skill in their several departments. It is reported that she is to be fitted out immediately for a cruise in the Gulf of Mexico.

SNOW SCENES.

THE accompanying pictures will be recognized by all who have had the good or evil fortune to be caught in a snow-storm at the North while travelling. One of them represents a train caught in a drift, the angry locomotive looking helplessly, as helplessly, as the snow mountains reared across its path, and the unwonted excitement among the passengers, endeavoring to "save ahead." The other picture represents a sleigh, with extra teams attached, vainly struggling through a real "snow-bender." Such scenes are pleasanter to imagine than to realize."

LITERARY.

THE POWER OF PRAYER, by Rev. Samuel Irenæus Prime, D.D., published in this city by Scribner, is one of the most remarkable of the religious and historical books of the day, and demands the attention of every reader of such matters. It is a history of the recent astonishing revival of religion in America, and especially in New York—a history overwhelmingly interesting in its details. No such history has been written since Luke wrote the story of the Pentecost, for there has been no such subject to relate.

No man can past by this remarkable event of the nineteenth century without profound admiration. Whether Christian or Jew, Mohammedan or Pagan, the philosophic man must pause to view the conversion of thousands on thousands of men to a creed so simple as the Christian creed, and a faith so pure and yet so different from the faith of men of the ordinary world. In this view alone the revival of 1858 is one of the great events of the Christian era. Its effects will be visible on the world a thousand years hence, and the Church will always regard it as one of the epochs in its history.

But this is a very worldly and commonplace view of the subject, which Dr. Prime's work is by no means calculated to encourage. For he, with the eye of a Christian philosopher, sees in this, the fourth great era of the religion of the Cross, an evidence of the existence of a higher principle than human reason, and a revelation of a more spiritual mode of thinking: a higher power above the destinies of men; a God who hears and answers prayer.

In short, the great truth taught so eloquently by the book is the connection of the revival with prayer-meetings. Not with "Great Revival" meetings—first in Fulton Street, and then here and there and every where in the broad land—the instances of private conversation after special prayer—the growth and strengthening of the movement in every direction by the habit of secret prayer—all these make up a logical sequence which, we defy any sound minded man to resist the conviction that this religious movement is the work of a Divine Being superintending the affairs of men—and, in a word, the work of God. The value of the book in this way in order to call the attention of our readers to the most solemn topic of the age because of the answers of God to prayer have been written.

Dr. Prime has proved himself eminently capable of writing this book. His prominent position in connection with the movement, and the access he has given him the best means to gather facts; while his peculiar power with the pen, his appreciation of the peculiar feeling of human minds, his rare skill in sketching character as in pointing a moral; and, above all, his sincere devotion heart to the service of his Master, and his eloquence in writing the praises of that Master, make the book so worthy every of the great subject, and of the age, and one which will delight the reader, as well as the child in his historian as with the great story which he writes.

A rarely beautiful little book, both in external appearance and in its contents, is THE LIFE OF THE NEWFOUND SCHOOL OF SCOTLAND, edited by Mrs. Hallock, and published by Phillips, Sampson & Co., Boston. This edition is not, in all respects, a facsimile of the European, as the editor has removed some of the more quaint words of the Scotch words and phrases, and substituted those that American children can understand. In some instances we regret the change; but as a whole we are thankful for the book, and for the skill which Mrs. Sillers has displayed in the task. It is a book to delight the reader, as well as the historian as with the great story which he writes.

ROSY-CHEEKED APPLES.

Come here, my babiola,
Come here to me;
Rosy-cheeked apples
You shall have three.
All full of honey
They dropped from the tree—
Like your bonny self,
All the sweeter than they're two.

Come here, my babiola,
Just shun your fair hand;
You are like my own babiola,
Long—long since.
Ah! for lack of nourishment
He dropped from the tree—
Like your bonny self,
All the sweeter he was wee!

Oh! old, frail folk
Are like old fruitlets;
They can not stand the gust
Of the cold blast
Dot Heaven takes the fruit.
Though sweet they be to us;
And we mourn our fairy blossom,
All the sweeter that they're wee.

Come here, my babiola,
Come here to me;
Rosy-cheeked apples
You shall have three.
All so full of honey
They dropped from the tree—
Like your bonny self,
All the sweeter they are wee.

This song will serve to give a fair idea of the character of the volume, and to commend it to the favor first, and to all lovers of the beautiful in song next.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, 4th January, the Senate met in the old Chamber for the first time. Liberal appropriations and associations connected with the room were made by the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The Senate removed to the new chamber. Senator Mallory, from Florida, took his seat during the day. Numerous resolutions of inquiry were introduced. Mr. Bigler gave notice that Mr. Benjamin would introduce the Finance Committee's bonding bill. Mr. Hunter introduced a bill for public expenditure. Senator Hunter introduced the first Appropriation Bills of the session, viz., for the Executive and the Military Academy Bills.——In the House, Mr. Bradshaw moved that the Committee on Territories inquire into the expediency of completing the capital of Utah. Various reports were presented respecting works of internal improvement. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. Phelps in the chair.

On Wednesday, 5th, in the Senate, Senator Brown moved for a commission to examine the yellow pine business of Georgia, referred. Senator Seward moved that the Judiciary Committee inquire whether more legislation is required on the Dred Scott decision. Senator Stanton moved that an inquiry be made into the leasing of Government circles for electioneering purposes held over. A message was received from the House announcing the deaths of Gentry Chambers, and eulogies on the deceased were pronounced by Senators Davis, Bright, Brown, and Crittenden.——In the House, the vice-President (General Constitution was presented by Senator Seward and referred. Senator Mallory presented the credentials of Hon. Jacob Thompson, a Representative, and a speech made before the Southern Citizens. The Pacific railroad Bill was taken up, and speeches made thereon by Senators Bigler, Hunter, and Iverson.——In the House, leave was refused for the introduction of a bill to increase the pay and rations for the construction of railroads. The bill for the Certificate of Indebtedness was then taken up, and a long speech made thereon by Mr. John Cochrane. The Indian Appropriation Bill was then taken up, and after a tumultuously insolvent, were made by Messrs. Lovejoy, Phelps, Pryor, and Letcher, when the previous question was moved and rejected.

On Thursday, 7th, in the Senate, various petitions and reports were presented. Mr. Hunter introduced a bill for the issue of Senator Seward, calling for correspondence with the British Government relative to the Central American. The French Spoliation Bill and the Pacific Railroad Bill were then taken up and discussed by Senators Bigler, Hunter, Benjamin Stidell, Doolittle, and Trumbull.——In the House, much business of a private nature was transacted. Mr. Stephens announced that the Oregon Bill was in order, as the Senate Bill, 34. Mr. Stephens moved that the Senate Bill be taken up, and the House bill be laid on the table. Mr. Stephens then moved that the Senate Bill be taken up, and the House bill be laid on the table. Mr. Davis, of Mississippi, made a speech against the bill, in which Mr. Grow participated. The previous question was taken, and the bill passed by a vote of 56 to 20. The bill appropriating $30,000 for the purchase of astronomical observations for publication was then taken up, and after the filled up of Mr. Hall, in making remarks in favor of the support of the Military Academy at West Point was passed. The Senate bill for the relief of the widows and family members and clerks of the House, foreign ministers, ministers at the Court of St. James, Secretaries of the Presidents, and a Vice-Presidents and ex-Senators, was passed. The Senate bill for the relief of the widow of Lieut. Selden, was passed. The Senate bill authorizing the correspondence of our Government with France and Great Britain relative to the Central American, was passed. The United States, was adopted. Leave to offer a joint resolution appropriating $10,000 for the purchase of Mortura case was refused. In Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill, Mr. Lovejoy moved to the condition of our foreign relations, and the state of the existing public debt, and the Indian Bill, the Pacific railroad bill, and the Indian Appropriation Bill was postponed.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK.

THE Legislature of New York assembled on January 4th, and the Governor's Message was delivered immediately thereafter. The Governor congratulates the people on the prosperous, a goodly position of it being confined to the financial affairs of the State. The receipts for the year $21,010,000, of which upward of $2,000,000 are placed to the credit of the canal fund, leaving a balance of $1,000,000 wards for the financial year was $1,972,000, not enough to pay the interest on the debt. The expenditures together with the interest on the debt and other claims amounted to $3,000,000, leaving a deficiency of $1,000,000. The Governor recommends the immediate adoption of financial skilful of our canals. He proposes, however, to pass the collection of the canal revenues, thereby leaving the amount required for that purpose small compared with the total expenditure. He says, and he thinks the Legislature the necessity of devising ways and means by which the annual expenditures within the limits of the Revenue in the Canal fund, an actual deficiency of $400,000 also exists in the canal fund. He thinks the present system is working satisfactorily and recently. The failure of several banks to comply with the law, he recommends the act requiring of them to send annual reports of their condition to the Legislature. He also recommends a return from giving notice, by the Governor, of moneys due to false book upon the returns of 1857, and the facts he derives from them. He recommends the repeal of the tax of the eighty-eight real corporations in the State, ceding nearly $100,000 to the Treasury, which is paid annually to stockholders in 1857. Those roads have a funded debt of nearly $50,000,000, and a floating debt in excess of $10,000,000.

Referring to Quarantine matters, the Governor intimates that there are still hopes that Sandy Hook may yet be obtained as the site for the establishment of the Quarantine of New Jersey. The prisons and the various charitable institutions of the State are in a satisfactory and very needful.

Various other topics are touched upon briefly. The lobbying system he considers a curse to the country, and deems it with some severity, and expresses his determination to exercise the pardoning power in such cases as he shall have good reason to believe have been passed through the influence of the Legislature, and not on the question of slavery, on which the Governor uses strong language.

He asserts that New York has always maintained a position favorable to the Union, and that she will not tolerate secession or disunion, but will be found in her place, while disclaiming all right or wish to interfere with the institutions of other States, and maintaining all her own rights, she insists on her right to maintain, wherever the laws will be found, the personal liberty, the security of liberty over slavery, whether as condition of persons or property. Of intellectual, social, and general well-being.

Mr. Littlejohn, of Oswego, was chosen Speaker on the first ballot.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Governor Banks was inaugurated on 7th inst., and delivered his Message to both branches of the Legislature. It is quite lengthy and discusses various topics at length, and gives an encouraging account of the material progress of the Commonwealth.

The Bank returns show that while the specie in banks has increased from $11,000,000 to $11,000,000 last year, the loans have been increased in the same period from $41,000,000 to $49,000,000. The inflation and the ability and confidence derived from a larger amount of specie, have led to an increase of discounts and loans, to an unsafe and unwise extent.

The expenditure of the past year for educational purposes was $1,000,000. The number of children under 5 and 15 years of age is 325,981, of which 218,198 have been in attendance upon the schools during the year, showing an increase in attendance of 19,167 pupils on last year. The School Fund from which our system of schools is supported is about $1,500,000.

The Governor recommends the School Fund to be increased to three millions, from the sale of land on the Public Lands.

The public debt is $1,214,000, for the payment of which, at a future day, the most ample provision and security has been made.

The Message commends retrenchment in County expenditures, and to the Judicial System.

The Governor makes no allusion whatever to National politics.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF PENNSYLVANIA.

The Message of the Governor of Pennsylvania states that the finances of the State are in a very satisfactory condition. The receipts at the Treasury for the past year were over four millions; the expenditures were three millions and three-quarters; the balance on hand is over three-quarters of a million, and the entire State debt nearly forty millions. He recommends a great reduction in the public debt, looking toward its extinguishment. Speaking of the sale of the Main Line, he says that the Commissioners who sold the Pennsylvania Railroad Company have acted within the law. He says that the Commissioners have been too low. Protests of the early completion of the Pittsburgh and Erie Railroad, and the Sunbury and Erie Railroad, are made by the Governor. Regarding the banks, he recommends a careful inquiry into the present condition of the banks of Lancaster County Banks, and the Bank of Shamokin. He refers to the existing laws, and says that, hereafter, the Bank should be no further increase of banks or banking capital under the present laws. The Free Banking Law he can not approve of any bills chartering additional banks, unless they are based upon specie basis. He recommends that certificates of loan be issued to the Governor, Auditor-General, and State Treasurer, to be sold at par, when the interest of the State shall require it. Capacity or the loans depreciate in the market. The Governor demonstrates an urgent necessity for increased duties upon foreign importation, and the Governor informs the views of the President relative to the change proposed by passed by the House of Representatives of the Message is devoted to KANSAS. He regrets to say that many various outrages have been committed which has been virtually withheld from the people of that Territory. The Governor says that the Constitution of the Territory of Kansas is of the most liberal character. He recommends the passage of a law to provide for the education of teachers. The benevolent institutions of the State are in a prosperous condition. He says that the libelic, the kind, and the deaf and dumb being properly cared for and educated. The Governor gives an interesting view of pauperism. The number of the poor in Almoner Office during the year is 28,000, whose support cost over four-fifths of 1000 men, which is about one-eighteen the 160 of which are aliens. The Governor recommends, but not as great, proportionally, as in other districts of the country. He says that the number of pauper lunatics in the State is 1,000. He recommends the number of public asylums for crimes against the State, and the number of inmates, and says that the number of prisoners for offenses against police ordinances, 40-6; making the number of arrests for offenses against the peace, 1,000 out of 1,000. The murders during the year were 60, and the suicides 60. The number of persons killed by offenses to the population was one in 163; the proportion of offenders being of native birth, one in 1,000. The proportion of murders was one to 20,000; that of suicides one to 10,000. The infrequency of murders in this State indicates a defective administration of criminal justice. The reason for this is found in the fact that murderers escape capital punishment.

"I am persuaded that, in many instances, murder escapes all punishment, and in many more escapes with through the reluctance of juries to find verdicts which must necessarily be followed by capital punishment."

Governor Chase is decidedly of the opinion that executions should be private. He says that the fear of a capital offence, are due to the intemperate use of ardent spirits. He says that there is a strong feeling against a great deal of the lunacy, pauperism, and disease which exists. He recommends the repeal of the usury laws by legislature. The administration of civil justice has been highly satisfactory, and the general prosperity of all departments of industry is encouraging. The agricultural interests of the State are also recovering from the depression of the past year.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF INDIANA.

Governor Willard, of Indiana, delivered his Message to the Legislature on the 5th inst. He recommends the erection of suitable buildings for the use of the State officers, and the Supreme Court, and the Library. The Governor says of the public debt that it is not large. He recommends the Wabash and Erie Canal be completed, and that the State Bank of Indiana be authorized to keep the canal in repair; that the bond-holders are unwilling to undertake the work by any other means than those derived from the revenues, having already invested half the entire debt in the canal. The State Bank of Indiana might bonded thousand dollars for its completion, and that duty there will be found in the Legislature of their determination to clean the canal and abandon the work when the bonds are exhausted. Governor Willard, he calls the attention of the Legislature to the necessity of increasing the revenue, and that the Legislature should not wait the Government of the United States. The duty of the State in regard to the qualification of voters and elections. The Governor says that the right of the school is passed inflicting severe penalties on election officers who refuse to receive votes of duly qualified voters. He recommends also an appropriation to be made for the encouragement of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF MAINE.

Governor Morrill, of Maine, in his Message, adverts to the financial condition of the State, and recommends measures to the interests of commerce, but, owing to the pecuniary embarrassments of the times, nothing can be done. The Governor says that the Legislature has been constantly engaged in the public and the mutual expenditure now averages $164,000 over the annual revenue. He says that it is impossible to attribute to the more wise and interest policy for the promotion of public prosperity. He says that there is still great vigilance and watchfulness needed. The receipts of the year were $1,214,000, and the public expenditures $1,378,000. The Governor urges a large reduction of expenditures. He recommends the appointment of a commission to examine into the economical interest and the operations of the railroad. He recommends the Legislature to adopt measures to prohibit railroad accommodation or to State aid, he leaves the matter to the Legislature. He recommends a State Normal School, and also a renewal of the authority to the Land Agent to procure the sale of the public lands of Aroostook. He refers to an official investigation of the alleged frauds in the recent election in the Penobscot Congressional, and suggests additional legislation to preserve the purity of elections. He also recommends the repeal of the Maine Liquor Law, and says that State rights should be vigilantly guarded. He says that the people of Maine are devoted to the Union, but will not submit to any infraction of the rights of the free States; and calls upon the Legislature to make manifest their resolution to the cancer of slavery.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF DELAWARE.

The Legislature of Delaware met at Dover on Tuesday, and was duly organized. Mr. R. Carlisle was chosen Speaker of the Senate, and W. P. Jackson Speaker of the House. The Message of Governor Causey was received and read. He says that the financial affairs of the State be pledged in order to raise the necessary money for building and extending railroads therein and beyond it. He advises the Legislature to establish a free school system, and the adoption of some new plan for the better education of the children. He favors an amendment of the tariff, and recommends that the Senators and Representatives from that State in Congress be instructed by the Legislature to use their influence to restore the tariff of 1842.

THE STATE OF THE TELEGRAPH.

A writer in the Times who has answered with an operator just from Trinity Bay, says: "The feeling among the operators and others here is very well acquainted with the situation of the cable, and of such confidence that the Company will continue to transmit messages with. It will cut the joint in four or five pieces, and then lay it. Its air-chamber remaining at Cyrus Station, and day and night, day's work will be done. Messages sent by the cable are carefully watched, and will be reported to the Directors. When the cable was first laid down on the 15th of December, there were constant evidences, by currents flowing over the cable, that it was perfect, and though they were not sufficiently intelligible to be made out. Mr. Gerhardt expresses the greatest confidence that if the present cable is not restored to a perfect state, another will be laid down in the course of the distant day. As all is entirely well, it is unnecessary to communicate whatever is of importance to the Company's Directors, as they will see the telegraphic letters. The only instances in which he has refused to notify the Directors of the Company's affairs of the evidences of the existence of continuity in the cable."

HOW THE FILIBUSTERS GOT HOME.

The Mobile Mercury contains the statement of Captain Maury, of the schooner Susan. He says the Susan was given up to the Honduras court of appeals some time in March, at three in the morning, saw breakers under her lee. When the Spy hailed him from the shore, the Susan, under slight winds headway, went on to a sandy coral reef, bilged, and sank in 15 feet. The Susan was cut away, and the mainmast sent by the board. At daylight the Spy communicated with the shore, and when it was completed, and the filibusters were landed, the Spy returned to Belize in a small launch. Money and property to the amount of $1,000 was saved. Walker refused to sail with filibusters. Captain Maury left the steamer Spy at Belize, and took passage in a brig bound to New York, which they declined.

Admiral Seymour, hearing of their predicament, invited Captain Maury to dine with him on the anniversary of his voyage, and especially what had been done with Lieutenant Wyvie. He said he was glad to see him on his birthday, he would send them to the United States in the Spy. He then sent a boat ashore, and the men were landed on bay of England, in capital health and spirits. He did not inquire into their original difficulties, but treated them generously during their original stay. Admiral Seymour was himself at the head of the table, with Mr. Wyvie on his left, and the next, and both the officers of the Spy were the most obsequious of guests; and then leaving, sent them on to Mobile. The Mobile papers and the Mercury mistaken in honor of the Susan.

WHO WROTE THE BUCHANAN LETTER?

The Washington correspondent of the Baltimore American writes:

"Mr. Buchanan, as the Austrian Minister, will return home in a month, and it is now understood that he will be succeeded by Mr. Faulkner. It is not certain which is to be the successor to Mr. Faulkner, although the probabilities decisively are derived from a remarkable letter, addressed to him by Mr. Buchanan, and published some six months, has been ascribed to Edward Everett. As the fact is not denied by Mr. Buchanan's friends, it may not be out of place now to say, in this connection, that the letter in question was not written by Mr. Buchanan nor Mr. Everett, but by William Hunter, the nephew and adopted child of Mr. Buchanan's sister, Mrs. Hunter. The original draft of that paper was either in the handwriting of the parties or persons to whom it was addressed, or of persons with whom they had, or thought they had, every reason to be familiar. Mr. Hunter, although he may have received, and probably did receive, some assistance from Mr. Everett, in the way of phraseology from the hand of Mr. Everett, it is now ascertained, was in fact the writer of the composition of the real author, who never permitted even a pretense to be suggested to the public to the contrary, and is most eminent and administer, nor since then. The information can be had on my responsible name, and without the possibility of any knowledge on the part of the parties most implicated."

PERSONAL.

The latest intelligence from ex-President Pierce is from Naples, December 9, where he remained a week, but was then making preparations for departure, and took advice, to go to the Island of Capri, for the benefit of Mrs. Pierce, the state of whose health, it is said, has not be gained to learn, is far from encouraging. She has suffered much from the cold, and is very much out of her surroundings.

The Washington correspondent of the Evening Post says: "The New Year's calls at the White House yesterday were comparatively few. At 12 o'clock the Marines from the sutler down to the President's agent, most, whether he would or not, was obliged to be present, whether he would or not, was obliged to be present, whether he would or not, was obliged to be present

THE MOUTH OF THE COATZACOALCOS RIVER.

INCIDENTS OF TRAVEL ON THE TEHUANTEPEC ROUTE.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

TUXTLA, November, 1858.

On 4th we sailed from New Orleans for Minatitlan, Mexico, in a snug little brig, with some thirty-five mules and five human beings as passengers. The passage was dreary in the extreme, and I will be content with stating that on 16th the mountain of Tuxla or San Martine appeared in sight, "rearing its lofty forehead to the sky." San Martine (as it is known to seamen) is an extinct volcano, and towers up tremendously above the low grounds on the coast. It rises directly from the beach, and is supposed (I believe it has never been measured) to be some two and a half miles in height. From the Gulf it has the appearance of one mountain; but upon a nearer approach it separates, and is found to consist of three peaks. It is of immense importance to seamen and landsmen who travel in this vicinity, as its peak can be seen a distance of a hundred miles, and it stands "the solitary guardian of the coast."

We stood in with a stiff breeze all day, and near sundown we were close enough to see the "castle" distinctly; but the freshness of the breeze prevented us from entering the River Coatzacoalcos with safety before dark, so we were obliged to stand off and on all night. I had obtained a sight of the soil of the Aztecs!

In the morning the pilot came on board, and, taking charge of our vessel, we crossed the "Bar," and at ten o'clock A.M. we came to anchor a few yards from the town at the mouth of the Coatzacoalcos. While our captain was diplomatizing with the custom-house officials, and our mate engaged in the laudable enterprise of cheating the Mexican revenue by selling boots (contraband) to the pilots (who are government officials here), I managed to get on shore. I rambled around the bluff on which the castle is situated, and allowing my curiosity free scope, I protruded my "figurehead" every where; but in some instances, I fancy, without gaining a great deal of credit from the natives for my politeness and good breeding.

The settlement at the mouth of the river consists of about thirty houses or huts built of sun-dried clay, and thatched with palm, which grows in great profuseness all along the coast. The appearance of the town is squalid in the extreme, and presents any thing but an inviting sight to the emigrant or tourist. The "castle" (for so it is designated) is nothing but a barrack-room covered with red tile and surrounded by an octagonal wall, from the top of which seven black cannon (nine-pounders) protrude their muzzles seaward. It is the residence of the "Commandante" and some forty lazy, dirty, spiritless-looking "soldiads," portions of the renowned National Guard of Mexico.

On the left, and overlooking the fort, stands a solitary watch-tower, an old-fashioned "institution," built in the year one, and peculiarly Spanish, as the shape and size of the bricks of which it is built can testify. It is at present surrounded by a "barricade" of barrels filled with sand, around which, as a general thing, you will find some half a dozen of the "protectors of their country's glory" either sleeping off the fumes of too much "chinguerita" or else waiting in blissful indolence for the "relief," when they can turn into a dirty hammock, and, with the aid of the eternal cigar, seek repose from the arduous duties of their post.

While mournfully speculating on this scene, my attention was attracted by an exclamation of W——'s, who, knowing my modesty and my enthusiasm in any thing pertaining to the beautiful in art and nature, called my attention to a sight that instinctively brought the "tell-tale blood" into my face, and prompted me to bite my blushes, as many of our fair friends do, by spreading the fingers of the hand before the face, thereby intimating that they are forced to see "sights" disagreeable to their senses. I was taken by surprise, and would not, for a fabulous sum of money, have turned my head in that direction had I known what was in waiting for my visual organs. Leaning against the entrance to one of the huts was a young maiden, ever whose head not more than eighteen summers had rolled their soft refulgence. Her dress was picturesque, primitive, and classic, and perfectly eclipsed the drapery worn by the far-famed Greek slave, or the "Georgia major," of whom we hear so much. It consisted of an immense straw hat (I have bought one like it since) and a crucifix attached to a string of beads. Her attire was worn with a grace and ease that equaled, if it did not surpass, the fair promenaders of Broadway. Although not a Joseph, my modesty took the alarm, and, seizing W—— by the coat, I fled somewhat like the man

> And never looked behind him."

It was not so, I regret to say, with my friend

W——, who walked nearly the whole of the distance backward.

The harbor of the Coatzacoalcos is an exceedingly difficult one to make in a "norther," as the many wrecks strewed along the beach can testify. One, an English brig, lies directly under the castle wall. She was lost, some two years ago, by her captain attempting to leave the mouth of the river in a heavy norther. The madness of the undertaking is illustrated by the mournful spectacle of the "wreck," which lies high and dry, while the captain's "bones lie fathoms low" in the coral deep. The "bar" makes out in a perfect semicircle from the mouth of the river, and is formed of sandstone, and unchangeable—a fact that was verified by the late surveys made by the new Transit Company. The water on the bar, at its highest stage, is not more than fourteen feet; that is, when the "norther" blows and backs the water in the river. In calm weather the water is only twelve feet, making it exceedingly difficult for vessels of large draught to enter, although the steamer Quaker City came over in fine style on her first trip with the mails. There is an old chart—made by Cortez, and bearing his seal—of the mouth of this river. It gives the same depth of water found upon it now. The Tehuantepec Company intend to deepen the channel, and have commenced (so I hear) their operations already.

The scenery of the river, from the bar to Minatitlan, is very beautiful. The banks are very low, and subject to overflow and inundation at every high water; but the richness of the vegetation is unrivaled. The banks are fringed with the otate, a species of cane, furnished by nature with a beautiful willowy leaf, under which it conceals a row of "teeth" that, for sharpness and execution, will throw the masticators of the shark into the shade. Further removed stand groves of the cocoa and palm; the noble caoba—the cedar; the mahogany, of which but few specimens are left standing; the zapota, the rosewood, the quarzin, the palo mulatto, and nearly every species of vegetation extant in Mexico. The water is clear, and navigable for vessels of the largest draught. The current is about four miles an hour in velocity; and the mouth branches out like the Mississippi, although not so extensive in its delta formation.

Upon our arrival at Minatitlan we were welcomed by the United States Consul, Mr. A. C. Allen, to whom the mules were consigned. Mr. A. very kindly took me also under charge; and I am indebted to him for many little acts of kindness while in Minatitlan.

You will perceive, by the accompanying sketch, how much Minatitlan proper has grown since Major Barnard's survey in 1848; and now that the new route is opened, and emigration commenced, Heaven only knows where or when it and rival towns will stop growing! Minatitlan is the head of sea navigation. It boasts of a custom-house; a half-finished church; half a dozen large mahogany houses; a "cuartel," containing about a hundred of my especial aversion, dirty "soldados;" and several hotels.

At one of these I met some old friends, with whom I spent a delightful evening. After the candles were lit, and while we were in the midst of old reminiscences, the booming of a cannon was heard, whereat I expressed some surprise; but B——, laughing, informed me that it was the signal for a "fandango," and made the proposition to visit it. I acquiesced, and we proceeded to a house situated in the lower part of the town, from whence issued the sounds of guitars and feet, whose stamping sounded very much like the stampede of a herd of wild cattle. We elbowed our way through the crowd collected on the outside of the house, and entered the arena, in the centre of which, under the glare of a dirty, tinsely oil lamp, were some six dusky beauties dressed in their finest holiday attire, amusing themselves by executing a dance, the principal point of which was in stamping their feet to the measure of a song that was "powerfully yelled" in a cracked, treble voice by one of the principal performers on the musical instruments. It is a very customary joke here at fandangos for one to have his hat taken off his head and placed upon the head of one of the fair dancers, from whom he can redeem it upon the payment of a "media" or "real" when the dance is ended. It answers in many cases very well for a hundred men like myself, and serves instead of a formal introduction. It is not an unusual thing to see some languishing beauty dancing with two, three, and sometimes even four hats on, looking like one of the old cle' venders of London. The dances of this country are entirely one-sided. I have never seen but one (the marriage dance) in which both sexes participate. The fandango at which we were present is part of a "series," and takes place twice a week. It is kept up until the "wee hours of the morning," and serves as an excellent attraction for the monté bank, which is kept in active operation in the back room. The playing of monté here is prohibited by law; but around the table or bank you will find collected nearly all of the Government officials—the civil and military rulers of the town—busily engaged in either betting themselves or inducing others to bet, who, if they win, will lend or give them enough for another "stake." I paid a visit, of course, to the bank, around which the crowd was so great as to preclude the possibility of getting nearer than twenty feet to the table. A monetary glance was, however, sufficient for me, and not admiring the company of greasy negroes, dirty soldiers, and half-clad natives, I "removed" for the hotel.

Minatitlan has at present a collection of huts and houses numbering some three hundred, and a population of fifteen hundred souls (the dogs in an Indian village are not counted in, but are estimated as one half of the population). A very extensive mahogany business is carried on here, and the flags of nearly every nation are flying in this part. The mahogany is cut up on the Monteears (?), as they are called, and little bayous and other tributaries of the Coatzacoalcos, and is getting very scarce. The wood is cut a great distance from the town, and can only be rafted down in the season of high water, from August to November. There is a tax of one dollar levied upon every tree that is cut in the country. The labor of "getting it out" is immense, and is entirely done by "Peons."

Peonage is a state of servitude a thousand times worse than our slavery; for in Mexico you can advance a native a small sum of money, get him in your debt, and then retain him and make him work until your debt is paid. His wages, allowed by law, are twenty-five cents a day. You advance him a little money from time to time, you keep him in debt until old age overtakes him, and he is no longer useful, when you give him the amount of his indebtedness because he is only an expense to you then, and turn him upon the world perfectly helpless. The law allows a "poor" three days every year to seek a new master; that is, if he is dissatisfied with his old one, he has three days to find another who will advance the money to buy his debt. It changes his master, but it does not change his position. He is still a slave, and always will be.

I witnessed a funeral ceremony in Minatlan which struck me as being a very simple affair, and appeared in strong contrast with the parade and expense which I had seen in the States on such occasions. It was the funeral of a child. The father carried the body of his child—neatly dressed, trimmed with flowers, and laid upon a rough sort of bier—to the grave, selected in the suburbs of the town, upon his head; and then with the help of the boy, who followed with the shovel and pick, they dug a grave, into which the body was laid, the earth shoveled in, a cross erected at its head, and the ceremony was completed. I was told that a few days after a fandango in a lonely state of intoxication.

I had received and accepted an invitation to accompany the mules overland to Suchil, the head of about water navigation on the Coatzacoalcos River, and was told that the journey would occupy about ten days, for which I prepared myself. Through the kindness of Allen, and Mr. Murphy, the superintendent of the mine, I was furnished with a fine mule and a complete outfit, for costing some fifty "hard shirts" and other articles of luxury which are usually worn in "civilized" life, I mounted a "Jones shirt," a pair of "Jones" boots, a straw hat sixty inches in circumference, one of Colt's five-shooters, a Bowie knife, a whip, a pair of huge Mexican spurs, a large sketching umbrella, a camp stool, together with some little articles for sketching purposes, which completed an appearance of which I was not a little proud.

We started, a brave party, and despite all obstacles, including the obstinacy of the mules, progressed well enough for the first day or two. The mule natives we did not much admire, but we saw many pretty women. The principal beauty of the females is their hair, which they keep in fine order. They have a very fine hair oil (the Zopote seed oil), which makes the hair shine like a box of Day & Martin. They generally wear it braided, and allow the braids to hang down their backs. It is a wreath it in the form of a crown around their head. There are specimens of female beauty on the Isthmus that can not be excelled, and, at the same time, you will see hideous old women who fairly eclipse the hags of Macbeth.

The children are particularly bright, intelligent, and beautiful; but after arriving at the age of "reason" they become dull, stupid, lumpish, careless, and degenerate into fearful ugliness.

After leaving Minatlan, I arrived at some importance and the residence of the Governor of the district, I—— insisted not to see him, because "my mules ahead, a most exciting, promising me that when we arrived there he would show me a "character." I found it to be the old fat Capitan Peula!

Capitan Peula is a very famous character, and was one of Santa Ana's officers. I am told that he also held the rank of Colonel in the army of the Republic of Santa Anna's dominions. But it seems that his political preferment brought him into interview with the Governor's wife, who, tired to his plantation, where he raises coffee in abundance and has one of the finest estates in this section. We remained an hour with him, during which time he never ceased to talk politics, except when he examined the contents of his black "vase" that had been brought out in honor of the strangers. We left the old fellow sighing over the ruin of his country, "Los Unidos Estados!"

By the time we arrived at "El Pass San Juan," the terrapins of civilization, we were pretty well choked with dust and thirst. I rode up to the door of a hut, and in my best Spanish (I know about half a dozen words) demanded a drink of water. It was brought to me by a little dusky sprite, with a top knot like a shell over the top of her head, and a face like the old mustang colts that roam over the ranches in blissful ignorance of harness. She presented me with the "dicer," and on looking me out of her large dark eyes, stood ready upon the least signal to run away. I need you a hasty sketch of this mistrustful young nymph.

After leaving San Miguel, the first rancho, and met in the town called Cerro Colorado, and said to be thirty miles distant. It was expected that we should encounter two days' ride of this road. We were also told that our trail lay through a dense swamp, through which it was necessary to ride. It took us but a trifle, in fact, that it could be done without a guide. The "vaqueros" were kindly offered to do so, and accordingly, on the next morning we were waited on by one of the aforesaid "vaqs," dressed in his holiday suit, with the assurance to charge ten dollars for the trip; but I—— and I——, considering that one peso was an exorbitant price for a guide, refused the kindly offer of services, and dismissed him.

After some hunting we procured the services of a boy belonging to one of the families for the sum of two dollars. The boy was very young, but it was asserted that he was every inch of the ground between the rancho and Cerro Colorado. We struck out boldly, packed our mules, and took our winding way across the plains again. It was near noon when we left the grassy plains and entered a low, swampy tract of country, covered with a thick and tangled chaparral, through which we followed the lively pyramidal little trail of our guide down, when the boy, who was on the lead, cried out for us to halt, declaring that he had taken the wrong path—that the one which we were following led into a "gaggonie" used by the cattle in the dry season to obtain water from. We held a council, in which the boy participated. He advised that we should go back and seek a dry spot on which to erect our tent, while he would search and find the best trail. His proposition was received and carried into execution. We made our camp, prepared our supper, raised our mosquito bars, and not having any inclination to sit up and keep the mosquitoes and other insects company, we crawled in, and slept without interruption until dawn, when Jose raised the alarm that "the guide was gone!" We turned out and found that it was the truth. The scoundrel had taken his horse and "ensnared" Lenares and Quail saddled up mules and started for the ranche, determined to capture, and use force if necessary, to compel the young rascal to keep his agreement. But on their arrival at the ranche he was non existe, not having made his appearance. In an hour after the flight of the guide, Lenares was somewhat alarmed at his absence. Lenares, however, knowing no more the Isthmus than the man in advance (the usual way of doing business in this country). After quite a stormy argument, in which Lenares accused Quail of having bribed the lad, and threatened to have them all arrested and taken to San Juan (a journey of two days, under escort for time) a brother of our former guide, with whom he returned to our camp, and from whom we learned to pay another guide before he could induce him to go.

When they joined us we struck our tent and took our way over the self-same path that we had traveled the day before. The guide, however, made it all but new sight, and kept up a constant shouting with his machete, cutting the vines and chaparral out of the way, while we, in single file, entirely blocked up with the undergrowth. Our trail was singularly wild, and picturesque. After that we were traveling through "the Valley of Desolation." The trees, which were scraggy, blasted, and dead, were covered with a thick and tangled chaparral, while the dank swamp mould silently covered the whole of the landscape. Much each of our path we were obliged to hew; and it was with the utmost difficulty that we could keep the mules in the road. Our path became more and more, and the rays of the sun had begun to illumine but a few surrounding objects, we began to prepare our camp without delay. To all our questions regarding a good camping-ground our guide returned a negative reply. At last Lenares and I——— intituted a cross-examination, and compelled the guide, finally, to own that he did not know whether he was on the right trail or not. Upon ascertaining this fact there was some very strong swearing, and the momentary of the whole race of "Grasses." The boy urged us to send back to the ranche that night and he would get us out of our trouble in a twinkling, and protested very earnestly against our design on his part to cheat us. But I—— was not to be done, for the sun was sinking fast. We cut down two branches, intending to allow us to rest on which was done in a hurry. We stretched our ropes across the path to keep the mules from straying, took, like a true Yankee, a "square meal" (a real to light his cigar (he is a most inveterate smoker), after which he mounted his horse, cried out to the guide, "Addonzar muchacs!" and they both disappeared in the coming gloom of the night, leaving the camp in charge of the sleeping mules and myself. Lenares kept his anger smothered until morning, and then, I——, "by the time," for Lenares is the best talking man on the Isthmus. The story was told; and Lenares demanded that the guide should return to his duty, or else he would not put us on the right track. The old man agreed, provided that Lenares would remain with us as zoo (our dollars). Then Lenares did rave. He cursed, threatened, and finally declared that he would not be cheated out of his money. That he would take the boy back with him and force him to find the way out. But the old gentleman would have kept his word but for the unforeseen circumstance of the boy's absence, who, wisely concluding that his services would be dispensed with, had disappeared. Lenares was in a trap, and was obliged to make the best of it. Quail and I——— accordingly paid the old man four dollars; and told him, at the same time, that if he attempted to play him false he would return and give information on the whole family. Forcing the old rascal to ride before him, he started on the trail without a guide. He brought some provisions with him also, from which we made a hearty meal. During the progress of this we discovered that the guide—such one of us to stand sentry two hours, and each in turn, the first sentry to be awakened, and instructed to shout the old villain if he attempted to leave. He showed no disposition to leave, however, and of course woke up his companions at the whole sixth.

The day was given to "romance," and we commenced our explorations again. About noon we reached the banks of a very deep and rapid stream called the San Antonio Creek. As we found, on inquiry, that I——— and myself were the only swimmers in the party, it was decided that a raft should be built, and that either I——— or myself should enter the water and see how deep and rapid it would be propelled. In a moment of enthusiasm, and without stopping a moment to think of the consequences, I——— declared that I would go (I have since regretted my precipitancy). The raft was lying upon the bank all ready to be stripped off my clothes, and taking a short hitch around my body, I slipped into the water. The current was very strong, and I found it very deep at the landing; and I, not being a very good swimmer, experienced a little difficulty in crossing.

However, I accomplished it, and on landing I turned my eyes to the "other side of Jordan" to see how my companions were advancing. The raft and the boy was imagine my intense surprise and disappointment when I found that there was nothing to be seen but the mules, the human portion having retired to the chaparral to cut the timber for the raft. I was struck to trust myself in the water again; the water was much too deep at the landing to think of standing in it, and it was just beginning "to work through my hair" that I was in a "fix." The mosquitoes and robadore pounced down on my helpless, and nearly drove me crazy. I hallooed, yelled, danced, slapped, hugged. I plastered myself with mud from head to foot. I stripped the leaves from off a plantain, and made myself a sort of garment, a la Adam and Eve, and a brush, with which I made frantic endeavors to keep off my tormentors. An eternity pas-ed (half an hour) before the party appeared with the necessary logs and commenced preparations for building. I could perceive a smile on I——'s face, while Quail and Lenares absolutely laughed. That capped the climax of my woes. I had tried to keep my temper; but when I——— asked me if I had examined the country on my side, and if there were any signs of water, I could bear it no more. I——— and many other like facetious remarks, I flatly let my reason. I raved and swore, and doubtless, at the time, proved very plainly the existing state of my feelings. However, every thing has an end.

The raft was finished. Quail, taking my clothes on one hand and my boots (the pride of my life) in the other, struck out for the other side, keeping his weight that they tilted up, precipitating Quail, head first, into the water. I——— cried, "My boots! my boots!" I cried; "take care of my boots! don't, for God's sake, lose my boots! Quail swam on to the shore" (the last of my boots would have been no joke, I can assure you). Quail could not swim, and consequently made a most lubberlike splattering and half drowned. I made another appeal to him to "save my boots!" Quail did not pay any heed to the thing, which was, indeed, if he meant to say, "Confound your boots!" During this scrimmage the raft had reached the raft and caught Quail, and with the united help of the party on that side succeeded in getting him in safety on the shore. Lenares and myself were safety the appearance of Quail when drawn out of the water, and we were overcome with mingled feelings when I saw that my boots! my beautiful boots! were safe. In a few moments he was transported to the other side, and we commenced operations. We approached me, and casting my boots, with a triumphant look, at the feet of their owner, in audible manner, "There take your beastly boots! you've made noise enough about them. I suppose that thing, there, is precious to me; but all you cared about was your boots—your great beauty boots!"

We next night made the alarming discovery that our provisions were getting alarmingly low, and thought it best to push on. We did so rapidly, until we reached our haven, only ten miles! I cannot describe the joy that I felt at the sight of the mules and baggage.

It would be tedious and useless to give you an account of our adventures, day by day, through this swamp. Suffice to say that it occupied us seven days, and that I——— was the last to get fairly out of it. Enough, after that path was, however, completely broken by us, and we were soon two hours in going a distance which we had formerly been arrived at another delightful obstacle, a quagmire, not over fifty feet in width, but of such a dirty nature, with the mules and baggage.

It would be tedious and useless to give you an account of our adventures, day by day, through this swamp. Suffice to say that it occupied us seven days, and that I——— was the last to get fairly out of it. Enough, after that path was, however, completely broken by us, and we were soon two hours in going a distance which we had formerly been arrived at another delightful obstacle, a quagmire, not over fifty feet in width, but of such a dirty nature, with the mules and baggage.

Next day we were informed by the vaqueros of us the gratifying intelligence that Cerro Colorado was only a league ahead. Cerro Colorado, however, proved to be a very different affair from what we had anticipated. Instead of a village, we reached it at last.

The ranche of Cerro Colorado consists of two large and commodious houses, thatched and covered in orange-trees, plantains, and the wild vegetation common to Mexico, and situated on a fine eminence on the left bank of the River San Juan. There are no less than three families residing in this rancho, consisting of the head of the Encarnacion Master Ramon and his sister. They had a very much opposite to the owner of a ranch which I made and presented them with). All of the young girls (and there was a "power" of them) were their children, or their near connexion. It was twisted in two rolls, and wound from the head to the back of the head, and then hung down in a single braid to the bottom. Add to this a very fine set of teeth, and a very dark complexion, and you have a very singular appearance.

From the moment we journeyed on, over a very fair road, to Tatahuicapa, a little country town, with, of course, a village church, we never pitched our tent. Our saddles and baggage we deposited in the Casa del Commandante. The Casa del Commandante is the house of the chief magistrate of Spanish origin—at least in this country—and is generally the largest, and, at least, the best house in the village: it is dedicated to the use of strangers, who can stop here (finding their own food, of course) as long as they please. It is proper to say that it happened that there was one individual in the village who was not a native of the country, and to set up our tent on the Plaza.

During our stay here we spent much time in the kitchen of our hostess, the niece of a priest, who, though unmarried, had a fine boy, round whose neck hung one of the twenty-five cent tickets of Wood's Minstrels. The culinary arrangements were singular. It is not unusual to see some of the house-keepers, or matrons, stripping corn at their doors, surrounded by a crowd of dogs, turkeys, and hogs, of which latter they have some fine specimens.

[TO BE CONTINUED IN OUR NEXT.]

THE GRINGE FAMILY.

CHAPTER I.

If an antiquary were to amuse himself hunting up all the queer families in the kingdom, and then pick from each the queerest member, and so make up a new family, queerest of the queer, he would at the end have gotten together pretty much such a branch of old creatures as sat together on a cotton October night. A lump of oldest machinery (ante-modern, antediluvian even), and of dullest oil, turned lazily on a spindle-legged table beside a tall old man. He had the air, or so speak, of that illumination to himself, for which his business he was about; so that it very much protested the notion of a light to a very old and other figure, who were all held fast in the shadows, might have been smuggled in during their booty, or kidnaps, stolen, or any other dishonorable in the world. Brigands or smugglers, there was present there a kind-looking old woman, and a lot of these human beans.

Two, inquisitive, and unlicked beyond all credibility; Gill, cadet, and rather more unlicked if such were possible—which exhausted the male list. Of these was then Ben, principally in his knee; roughclouted and raw-armed, rude in dress, accustomed to the open air, and sunburnt. She might have gone out as-charing or a-cooking by the day, or as not to the scullion, and been accepted as much even by the most sensitive antediluvian. That was Jane. Here was Sal, her sister: a gawk, a lout—in short, nothing better than Sal! Here was also Jen the gawk, keeping to her old father, like wax. There was Ned Frank the gawk, joint pet of old Gringe and Jen. There was the African hound, pet and delight of Tom, Gill, and the rest.

The whole crew—men, women, and dogs—was blanched together by the same pallid moonlight. But a word—just one word—for Tom. Tom was the great uncouth member of the Gringe family. In the matter of Tom, Gringe had been a little wilful; stands for mouth projected foolishly; for cretinous confounding of the letters of the Abecedarian Burbs and Hare; for inarticulate animal noises in lieu of ordinary sounds of accent or dissent; for brain-laughing fits, and for a face very ready for he was of the stables, shabby—having been cuckled, wronged, and put upon from pinnacle. Grooms had been his boss, and he was senior wrangler of the great equine university. Heat and cold he had known, and had been put to bed at night on the couch-box. In short, the Gringe flung up had no manners, no learning, no reading, no catechism. They were all in a sort of mourning for their mother, who was Gringe's second wife, and died in child-bed. Tom was the son of his being brought into the family with her. However, he answered to the name of Gringe; and in his house they grew and fattened. She, good soul! had been of easy-going nature and of Jumper persuasion, having superintended Jumper light-vans waiting for which consumed most of her time. So, having died young, as she had lived, in strict Jumper principles, she had turned over on her side, one morning, and died with great decency and in the odour of Jumper sanctity. Master Abednego Scurtivine, Jumping high-priest—not, however, before she had left him a few Jumper-offspring—to reverence, respect, and care for the father she left to them. For, in all their roughnesses, the Jumper-children were much attached to-wards to their mother. Nay, Gill, the savage, was observed shedding big drops on the nine of Baltimore Tall old Gringe, therefore, fared well among them.

CHAPTER II.

Tom sits on the floor, in sweet fellowship with the hound, busy cutting up the cat's old collar. He is all in the dust and dirt of the corner. Gill, with his hands in his pockets, whistles; and his hands in his pockets, whistling, making kick at a small fire, which is all the fire there is, and heel nails on the floors. It his extraordinary charm for him, that fanciful foot-ball play. Jen is on a stool at old Gringe's feet, and Ned Frenck peeks being in that region too. Sal sits at the fire, by long legs with her bare arms out, akimbo. Master Sue asleep, with her head on her red elbows, as though she had been the worse of ether, and had a bad day of it. The Imp is in the middle, wide awake, indeed; hopping on one leg, and chatting and grinning to the African hound. The Imp's eyes are shooting busily to all sides, seeking something to do, and her little arms are akimbo, ready for anything. This was her evening's diversion, and she had been (temporarily) all the year round; no lack of piquancy in it for being so often repeated. Thus, to take this very October night for example, Imp had sat Sue in a chair, apparently torpidly after that figurative charing, and that long fight in carrying her unnatural feet with a dreamy stupidity; the Imp, furnished with a wisp of stout brown paper, which she ignites gingerly, keeps alive on tiptoe to stave Sue in nodding over the fire. As comes natural to stout brown paper, no flash results, but prodigious clouds of smoke. Then, tossing with a whisk into the likeness of Puck, she holds it knowingly under the nose of unconscious Sue, who snuffs uneasily, and goes through all manner of diverting convulsions; but in the end is waked up, only on the bare verge of suffocation. Such gapings and chuckings for breath were never seen; Puck all the while shrieking with laughter. But our clear-girl, when somewhat brought round, fetches up a huge cud and launches it furiously—to be dodged, however, by shrieking Puck. It lights on Gill the savage, who starts with a growl, and swears. Another shriek from our Puck. But Sue—just now all but assaulted—is on her feet to be talking to Gill across from the chair, with her big arms squared, others to right of her, by way of three-inch, or pocket-rule, was very much the tragi-comedy of every night of the long year, as well as of this special Friday night.

All this while Old Gringe had been sitting thoughtfully back in his high chair, counting their antics wearily, with his hands sometimes over his face, sometimes on the head of little Jen with his eyes directed to the fire, playing with a stony stare; at times racing round the room like lumps, neck and sack. Now a sigh, now a groan, now a clasping of his thin fingers together. There must have been some deep anguish and distress of mind at the bottom of all this (let Gip—in so well blinted at once, it was something penitential), the whole mystery of which lay in the fact that this night was a Friday night, and that the month was the Usfume month of October. Like enough there had been a warning letter on Old Friday night to an old October month. However that might be, after a long spell of this weary thing, he turned to little Jen and said, softly, "Lend me your arm, child, while I go up to my cabinet;" and so, leaning on her, who was to him little more than a prop out of the room and was presently unlocking that notable ball called Gringe's Cabinet.

"Father," says little Jen, knowingly, "you want to fetch down the big writing-book?"

"I do, child," he muttered, "and to-night above all nights in the year. Oh, if I could but write my soul clean and white!"

Jen thought he must have done that long since, if writing could do it; for every night of their lives, unfailingly, the key took down from it. It was drawn forth from a little safe inside the cabinet, which was a square door, with a red shooting bolt; and that little safe was inside again of a little mystery; as there was positively no getting at the big book. Little Jen wondered as he took it; but never asked. So he came down; and with the racket replaced the high chair in its niche. No one, therefore, heard those short groans and weary, heavy sighs with which he went to work to be warmed to his writing work. It was, indeed, likely enough that Mr. Gringe had, somewhere among his shelves, a spy-glass, and a stereo as a closet skeleton.

"Would-not, restitution !" he whispered to himself, his pen writing the words he whispered; "which has been sounding ding dong in my ear for so long back; it's the only cure, the only salvation. Better work-house than such a hell of thought and—"

Here the universal rocket struck in, and general outburst. The imp having privily fixed a needle upright in a chair where she knew he would sit down. She lost a good bunch of her hair by the transaction.

"Here is another year come about now," he wrote on. "A year more of wretched thought and conflict, and one step nearer to a resolve. Riches never brought with them so complete a Nemesis! In mercy lend, Heaven, to make a start!"

With that he took forth a great foolscap sheet, and began to write something headed, "I, John Gringe, being of sound mind and body," but he did not, and worked down steadily to the foot, when it would have been a perfect incumbrance of paper, but for the absence of the signature and the two attesting witnesses. But the poor, brain-tossed man had written a whole century of such intentments, yet not one of them was ever executed. For there were other things to be done ere he left, making the second party to the conflict. "These poor, willful wretches must go out and live, or starve and die. Restitution or starvation! Starvation or restitution, which, which? And all of my doing!" Here he covered up his face, and swinging his long upper person to and fro, groaned and groaned again.

Perhaps it was this that prevented his taking heed of a letter that little Jen had been vainly pushing into his face for the last quarter of a minute. The postman had just brought one. He opened it, and began to read mechanically; but was presently tumbling all with excitement and relief. He merely said, in a low voice, "It wanted but this —it wanted but this;" and read it through once or half a dozen times. The letter was on soiled paper; was dated from the mean house-of-call in the city, and was very short—so short that it may be given here:

"OLD THAMES TOWN INN.

"DEAR MR. GRINGE.—You have never been missed; likely never heard of me. I am the daughter of your brother, Will Gringe, who, as you may remember, went out quite destitute to the Australian colonies, and there died three of starvation. My husband, who was after Uncle, is dead some two months since, at Sydney, left with a child, and without a farthing in the world. Help me if you can.

Your niece,

"MARY CORAM."

"Poor soul !" he said; "if she only knew !"

CHAPTER III.

Such a night as that budget brought to him! Old Gringe tossed and wrestled, and sobbed over his dead brother and family, saying that it was all his work, and seemed likely to go mad. No one heard those ravings, though, for his room was fast barred.

Next day he had gotten on deeper mourning, and had sent to the Three Tuns house-of-call for Mistress Coram.

She came in a trice, and was standing before him, demurely, with her little girl of some six years old. A tall, sharp, black-eyed, reflective girl (for she was no more than a girl), of very few words, but prodigious observation. She took them all in under her quick first glance, and was digesting the fruits of that observation all the time after. Old Gringe, who at first fact covered up his face, thinking he was his deluded brother, remaining this her lot of good cheer, for she shall not want for any thing while he lives (as, indeed, for his wife to himself). She shall come, he tells her, and live with them—she and her child; to which she answered, curtsying, that she could not leave her, and that she will try and be as useful as she can.

The family gather round and survey her curiously; much as the Ogalistan folk did Captain Cook and his party. Nay, Tom, the eldest grandson, and with a stupid reverence, lays his hand upon her shoulder, and says, "Cousin, you look very like the poor savages. But she at once, and without more ado, had taken off her bonnet, and was busily making things right with the young savage to be in confusion. Before the end of the day she was quite one of them, and Gringe's house, which there a whole twelvemonth—nay, had taken up a quiet tone of influence and authority over the wild crew, which kept Gill under an unusual quietude.

"You are as bad as Benjamin, dears," she said, one evening to the younger Gringes; "you would too old for these child's tricks! Only consider, Tom, a great strong man like you ought to be working for your living—or your family!"

"Dy ;" the tidily, sly' plow, eh?" Tom asked, with a wise look.

Gill the Savage stopped his kicking all at once, and let Jen's occupation seemed to be gone. It was only for a moment, however, before he was lying at her distractedly, and keeping close under the shadow of her mother Gringe. "If you would knew it well, too, having said to herself, as she answered, almost all events are to be the only role!" For all that, she was dear dear, poor little Jen, and what not.

Before long Coram was out old Gringe protested that Mary Coram was the greatest comfort in life to him, and she let wrought the completest reform in his house's economy. Not that she was cooking. She was teaching the girls women's work, and the men servants, with a will; but she was not cooking, but she had even always open, and there was one little matter which exceedingly mystified her.

"Tom, dear," she said, one day, when Gringe was rooting up stairs among the lumber, "Tom, you've been always used to the range, and you can't accounts every night?"

"They're all accounts," says Tom; "they're his life and adventures. My eye! they must be full of dogs and horse-racing; don't un think so?"

"Ay," says Jen, "and she's in 'em always as those fits going to lod of nights!"

"Ay," says Tom, "Uncle Coram, don't tell now on me; but, d'ye know, I think governor is fazed'd being hung! so does Gill and Sue. Like enough he is not. He only cuts, and he's to be walked away mysterious to sup."

"Dy ;" the tidily, sly' plow," he said to herself, "wonderful powers of observation."

"He must keep it under his pillow," she said (it was about this time a good deal between Gringe and Sooner's Orations was being performed nightly; in the meantime, the old gentleman was getting on the stumbling-block), "he must keep it under his pillow," she said, reflecting.

Tom was the out; for, putting in her hand softly, it rubbed against the key and brought it out. A long, narrow key, with a curious knob at end of the bold cabinet. She went over softly, and fitted it in carefully. Though it gave a short shrick in turning, which made her start and tremble, it did its bed, it did not stay her; for she knew that old man slept heavily. The door opened, and she stood safely, and the shooting-bolts, and there, at last, was the writing-book, with its key beside it. Moving like a ghost, she took it and began to open it to read hastily, up and down. Very curious revelations these were, and of a most extraordinary satisfaction. It was the same story written over and over again (say five or six hundred times) with unmeaning variations, but again and written out afresh nearly every night; for this sort of confessional practice gave the writer relief and comfort.

"May Heaven in its infinite mercy forgive me!" headed nearly every page; "but can it, can it, can it?" A single but heinous transgression. Here it is in a sentence: "I, John Gringe, being of sound and eldest brother, and their father's pet, and by ingenious sophistry, propitious lying, with terrible forgery, and with unmeasured cunning, did by the eldest with one shilling; to drive him from the face of his parents, and to live in his place, basely." The poor outcast had gone forth to struggle, and had, day by day, sunk lower and lower, until it was ended by starvation and death.

As she read the same story told over and over again, she was overwhelmed with pity and something like grief. Not for a few seconds did she perceive that there was another person standing before her looking at her. It was Gringe, and more than little Jen. She was caught in the fact.

"Mary Coram," he said, in a rage, "Go to bed!"

"I shall till father in the morning," little Jen answered.

Coram laughed under her breath.

"You shall not tell him, Jen," I know a secret of his. Take care, my girl; don't play tricks with old men. You might put house of this on end. And little Jen went off to bed, vowed for the time.

Coram's plot, from that night forth, was wonderfully ingenious. Old Gringe, who had done murder in her eyes, was fraudulently in possession of her money and her child's. The feeble old wretch should be brought to make what atonement was left him; by which indeed he was struggling every night he do.

Here was her tactique, or at least a hint of it; for she wrought it out in a thousand subtle and complex ways, never losing sight of her aim for an instant.

One of those lonely October nights, when all, save the two were gone to bed, she was sitting beside him, close under the dull influence of the lamp, hurling on one thumb till long past midnight. Abundant tears from her as she told, so naturally and so minutely, the sad history of her father's slow decadence; of his weary progress downward into the poor man's shoals. Painfully and slowly, with wanderings, into expressible tragedy and poor thrills, his gaugings for his and subsistence, and her little childish efforts to help, ing in a lonely place and strange country. Not a thought, not a pang was passed over by her, leaving all to be told. It was all told in the end, by mysterious voices; while Old Gringe, with short sighs, listened to the lamp-lit, dreary tale, his fingers clenched together, beneath which his head bowed still. Thus the night went along up to bed, and long and tottering, at something past one o'clock.

You may be sure that the mottled Mongrel's tail had a terrible time of it; which was the reason it would smile to herself as she stood alone when he was gone, and say, softly, that it would do. Indeed, it promised fairly enough for those being of sound mind and body. Papers came thick and fast, the following days out nearly every day. Jen always incomplete; without signature, without attesting witnesses. He knew all these mechanical and halting instruments, and stamped impatiently in her chamber. But she held on fast to her tortures, and Old Gringe's poor family was saved.

"I learned uncle," she said, "there is some mystery or trick between you and Coram, and though that wicked people had got between him and his father, and poisoned his ears against his son. Was not that so, Mr. Gringe?"

"Who indeed?" said Gringe, thoughtfully. "Who but Coram? Ah, Jen, Jen, if they were murderers, uncle—real murderers. There is blood on their hands at this moment. Don't you think so, Jen? Don't you think that such wretches are haunted with remorse; and is another world with which have murderers' joy? Don't you think so, uncle?"

This treatment evidently ought to be, but she could only unanswer that little Jen, to her fond bosom always held to be silent as a church secret, wrapped up in her own little world of pain, as private; and that he seemed to be soothed by her talk. Little Jen, too, was looking at Coram dear, sadly about her own fate, and her own recovery. Perhaps, if she held the poison, little Jen had the antidote. Between the couple of they overheard little Jen something to this effect:

"Father, you have something on your soul. Tell your child all, and she don't tell one a word of it." And she would unfold—poet as my dear Shakspeare, Jen?—even to the murder—and lay in certain good books and treatises.

Coram hated little Jen; but still her prison was better than little Jen's attitude, and worked all this, while it was getting on to the last day of October. Having assembled lots of her tactique, which she plied simultaneously:

"Gill," she says, "I thought you loved horse and riding?"

"So I do," says Gill, rapping out an oath.

"Then why don't you go and ride?"

"Why? because the old man won't keep a horse for me."

"Well," she answers, "all young men of your age have horses, and ride."

"Who's to get 'em?" says Gill. "So they have I believe."

"Your father should let you have a horse: you don't cost him much in other things."

"Dang him, he shall," says Gill. "I'll speak to 'un about it."

"Tom," she says, at another time, "how much money have you by your father's gift?"

"Not a copper," Tom says, opening his eyes wide.

And thus she worked on Sue and Sal, until, before not many days, they had all, as it were, struck a bargain between them and Coram to get the old man mind. He met them suitably, and told them to get about their business. Nearly open riot was the consequence. It was a regularly organized one.

Little Jen that same evening came up to her with a face of unusual gravity.

"Cousin Coram," she said, "you are a wicked woman. It is you who are setting them all against father. It is you—because you will not understand the book, and that night, and what a hypocrite you are. Is it not so?"

"Ish!" was the only reply she got.

The truth was, Coram knew she durst not speak, for her own secret—agreeing very fair to the thirty-first of October—a date written down very large in her diary; and it was only because Gringe was getting hourly more excited and more miserable. She, too, had read of that date, and was looking on it with approach. In conflict within this season to rage terribly; and outside, the rumbling of the storm was being puffed out and rolled and menaces they assailed, gathering round him at all hours.

"Are you a horse?" "Money?" they shouted at him until he grew furious at last, and shook his poor, grey head, and cursed at them, and cursed them.

Executioner Coram, vigilant tortures, never slackened an instant in her insidious work; and as little Jen stood in her way full as much at the last as at the first, she openly put a spoke in her wheel also. Something in this way it was: Old Gringe, raging and sorrowful over his book of confessions, one night, and vowing there is no salvation for him here and hereafter; that evil genius exhorts him to spiritual comfort at the ministration rap of the Reverend Josh MacStarbrior, or even at her hands. Why not tell her the secret of the book at well as to little Jen? Note how cleverly this is put. The old man wakens from his dream:

"Jen," he says, angrily, "knows nothing of this book! Or does she? Or he had noted. Jen, you have been reading this book! Answer me!" being disturbed from under his pillow, and his book was not in the same spot in his cabinet. With trembling eagerness he puts Coram to the question, and extracts from her reluctant soul that she had indeed surprised little Jen one night (falling at his return. But strict secrecy as to this revelation was enjoined. Henceforth distrust and sour glares at poor Jen. But by that time it had finally come to be the morning of the thirtieth of October, ere of that mysterious thirty-first.

CHAPTER IV.

A QUIET, cold, shivering day, with keen, razor-edged blasts from the north, sleet, sudden, and disgusting. The crew, who were, as it were, on strike, provided authority in corners, as if they too felt its influence. Old Gringe was in his study, and had kept himself close in strict retreat in his own chamber. He must have written prodigiously, for, every time that Coram's ear was laid to the key-hole it heard the feeble scratchings of a pen over paper.

Legree darkens, color, and more miserably, as it it came to five o'clock, when the Reverend Josh MacStarbrior arrived, and was shown to Gringe's own chamber.

That swelling divine ranted and raved, and shrieked and groaned at him, for a good two hours; until, indeed, truth gathered on the man's tongue, and his eyeballs protruded. He then went his way.

Finally, at out seven o'clock, the old man himself came tottering down, candle in hand, looking like a true ghost; quite ghastly, and all shrunken, as he appeared next morning. The skin was tightened down like, over his face, and he was bent down like a bow, and quite ill. The day, and the Reverend Josh MacStarbrior, completely had done their work. What was to be the end of it all?

Gringe had expected spectral disturbances during to-night, the candle dancing up and down in his room, Coram had heard him in bed about one, the family vault instead of his room, the haunted pale Pandemonium rife. Then came Belial noise and confusion, and a ring from the bell that hung in the room, with cries of "Well done! At him, Belial!" and other encouragements. In short, there was a dog-fight going on between the new French poodle and the hound, being set against each other by Gill, who had a bet on one, as right it must be owned, without difficulty. Just as the old man entered the room at last, for a good hour, the old poodle had toppled over on his back, and was kicking out his legs and paws in extremities of death. The hound was standing over him, and in his throat. A very near victory it was. Some of the beloved dog crew kicked the poodle, and quite turned at seeing this ghostly old man shaking his shrivelled arms at them, invoking specific punishments on their heads—but he could not drive away as he came. They heard him call feebly for Coram, who came at once.

"Tell Servientish and his clerk," he said, "to be here the first thing in the morning."

Jen had prepared herself to find herself down to rest that night, for she knew now that every thing would be right, and that Gringe would be in perfect regularity in the morning. True, little Jen was down to her, as usual, but that she saw was what her wicked plot was; that she, Coram, was killing her poor father by inches, with what and how many accessories. Nor would she, as the sun rose, she would go to him and expose to him the whole plot.

"Bah!" said Coram, with a loud laugh.

The morning of this anniversary—the thirtieth of October—was now upon them. Servientish and clerk were waiting below in the gloomy chamber, Gringe was shivering, and was cold. They were bidden to be in waiting at eight o'clock punctually, and there they were at eight o'clock with punctuality quite all ready. Coram came down with secret glee.

Jen was to go up stairs, gentlemen. I hear Mr. Gringe stirring in his room. Please to walk up."

Old Gringe, with face sharpened from overnight into hatchet shape, pressed out at them from the bespeaked door.

"Who are there?" he said, in a prying, inquisitive way. "Oh! I know now." Walk in, then, gentlemen. Every thing is comfortable, as you see."

They walked in, and got out their papers.

"Glad to see you looking so well," Servientish said, not regarding much the truth of his speech. "I am glad to see you look well this night, Sir, Gringe went on "in old poodle dog, Sir. A very fine dog, Sir, that. Ah! you have had to-morrow with every respect."

Servientish looked at his clerk.

"You wished your will, Sir, to be drawn?"

"So I did," said Gringe; "are you ready?"

"Quite ready, Sir."

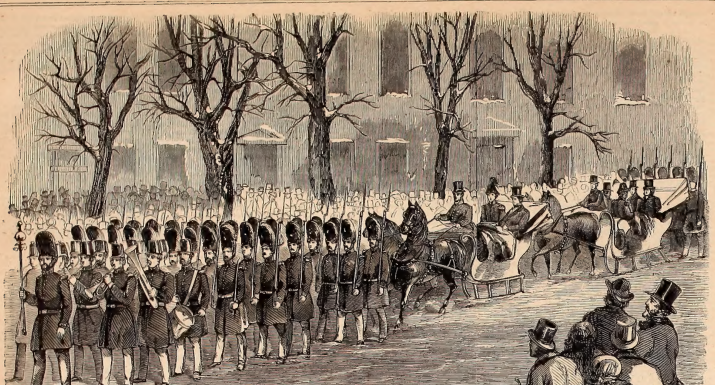
"Just wait a second," said Gringe, going over to the door, "and I will get those things in the regular way—according to law."

And he put on a paper cocked-hat, and took a walking-stick, and solemnly led the way down stairs before them with cheeks puffed out and ridiculous dignity.

He was mad.

CHAPTER V.

THE game was up for Coram, just as she was winning too, which was the mere provoking; for she had actually got the select establishment for little Old Gringe sojourned for the remainder of his days, and had got to be mistress of it, and a handsome cost, be gave so much trouble. In this unexpected way she was carried out of the world, with garment be one day and head, leaving not so much as a ghost of a will behind him. So little Jen got all. And, if any cares to know what she did with it, we can tell them that she did not forget those two wild step-sisters, Sue and Sal; nor would she have forgotten Tom and Gill, only they had gone to the dogs long before. She even offered a share to her cousin to wicked Coram, who actually went out as a governess in respectable families where there were widower fathers.



INAUGURATION OF GOVERNOR MORGAN—GOVERNOR KING PROCEEDING TO THE CAPITOL.

THE INAUGURATION OF GOVERNOR MORGAN.

An attentive correspondent enables us to give, as part of the history of the times, a couple of illustrations of the change which took place on New-Year's Day in the government of the State. Our first illustration depicts Governor King's procession to the State Capitol at Albany, to resign the trust committed to him; the second, the swearing in of his successor, Governor Morgan.

At noon on New-Year's Day the Albany Burgesses Corps, commanded by Capt. Spelman, and attended by Scribner's band, escorted the Governor elect from his residence to the Capitol. They numbered 57 muskets, and were a fine-looking body of men. At the same time Company B, of the 76th Regiment, commanded by Captain Van Yechten, escorted Governor King to the same place. It was one o'clock when the latter reached the Capitol. The Burgesses were already in possession of the Assembly Chamber; Governor King's escort accordingly fell into line in the Capital grounds, while the Governor himself entered the building.

The ceremony of inauguration did not occupy over fifteen minutes. It has been so often described that we will only say here that the oath was administered to Governor Morgan by the Secretary of State, and brief speeches made by the outgoing and incoming chief magistrates of the State. After the ceremony, Governor King and his escort adjourned to a hospitable collation at the residence of the former.

We will take this opportunity—as we have felt bound to criticise many of Governor King's acts—to acknowledge that, while his judgment has in our opinion been occasionally faulty, the office he held has never been filled by a man of more purity and rectitude.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER IX.

The letter on which Richard Faithorn relied for the defeat of the conspiracy against Fenley House House-hold is delivered. The House of Wyvern is thoroughly A Physician attempts to medicine to a mind diseased. A strange communication, which hurries the reader on to the next Chapter.

It has been said that Faithorn had committed to a certain letter his last desperate hope that something might yet save Fawley from demolition, and himself and his master from an exile in the last smiling nook of earth to which home in that smiling nook of earth to which home in that smiling nook of earth to which Horace invited Septimus, as uniting the advantages of a mild climate, excellent matter, capital wine; and affording to Septimus the prospective pulsings of sprinkling a tear over the cinder of his poetical friend while the cinder was yet warm; inducements which had no charm at all at Fairthorn, who was quite satisfied with the Fawley Southlowns—held in just horror as wishy-washy, right with which to wash his hands as are Dorsetshire to a cinder for the pleasure of sprinkling that cinder with a tear.

The letter in question was addressed to Lady Montfort. Unscrupulously violating the sacred confidence of his employer, the troublesome valet, one after scanning her language to desire not to consistent with the respect due to the fair sex than which he had attained to no higher, of all the desolation that the perdidious nephtals of Caroline Lyndsay had brought upon Fawley, declared that the least Lady Montfort could do to repair the wrongs inflicted by Caroline Lyndsay was—not by pity his master—but by her pity for killing him. He repeated, with some grotesque commentary of his own, but on the whole not inaccurately, what Darrell had said to him on the subject of her pity. He then informed her that Darrell's consent to Lionel's marriage with Sophy; in which criminal exposure it was evident from Darrell's words that Lady Montfort had had some nefarious share. In the most lugubrious colors he brought before her the fatal consequences of that marriage—the extinguished name, the demolished dwelling-place, the renunciation of nature and itself. He implored her, by all that was sacred, to contrive some means to undo the terrible mischief she had originally encouraged, and had recently helped to complete. His epistle ended by an attempt to conciliate and flatter. He referred to the image of that wild Caroline Lyndsay to whom no hall was ever refused a favor; whose entreaties no one had resisted as not one whose young ideas he had communicated the elementary principles of the multiplication table to whom he had played on his flute, winter eve and summer noon, by the hour together; that Caroline Lyndsay who, when a mere child, had left Lady Darrell where she willed, as by a thread of silk. Ah, how frail, thorn had been the fair Caroline's future years ago, he had thought that Caroline Lyndsay was to be the sunshine and delight of Fawley—she which she had lived to bring the cloud and the grief! And by all these memories, Fairthorn conjured her to put the cloak off for a single day, had evidently helped to bring about, or, failing that, to contrive that Caroline Lyndsay was not the object of her remorseful and affectionate compassion!

Caroline was almost beside herself at the receipt of this letter. The picture of Guy Darrell effacing his very life from his mind—of himself destroying the last memorials of his birthright and his home—the conviction of the loftiness and purity of character of his bleak and unsympathetic existence—the experience she had already acquired that the influence failed where it was not as frank by hoped it might begin to repair and to bless, all overpowered her with emotions of yearning, tenderness and unmitigated indignation. What could she do? She could not offer herself again to be rejected. She could not again urge, again to force her penitence upon the man who, while acknowledging his love to be unconquered, had so resolutely refused to act, in the manner she had once deceived his trust—the Caroline of old! Alas! if he were not convinced of that, that her pity was the substitute, and not the companion of love, how could she undeceive him? How say—how write—"Accept me for I love you." Caroline Montfort had no pride of rank, had had no pride of sex; that pride had been called forth, encouraged, strengthened, through out all the years of her wedded life. For Guy Darrell's sake, and for him alone, had pride that had cast away—trampled upon; such humility was due to him. Had she not been humiliated by her own vice in vain, could it be repeated—would it not be debasement? In the first experiment she had had no but to be rejected—in a second experiment she might have but to endure his contempt. Yet how with her exquisitely affectionate nature—how she longed for one more interview—one more explanation! Some chance could but bring it about! It might be but a pretext—a fair reason apart from any interest of her own, to be his friend, to correspond more! But in a few days he would have left England forever—his heart yet more hardened in its resolves by the last access to which he had been sternly recognized to be a due to others. Never to see him more—never to know—never to do that sacrifice he was suffering now—would perhaps suffer more hereafter, in the reaction that follows all strain upon principle—never to hear a word of comfort from her—her who felt torn to be his comforter!

But this marriage, that cost him so much, must that be? Could she dare, even for his sake, to stand between two such lovers as those of Lionel and Sophy—confide to them what Fairthorn had declared—accuse them of gruesomity? She shrunk from inflicting such intolerable wounds. Could she be her sister's heir inability to solve this last problem, she hethought herself of Alban Morley; here, at least, he might give effective support. She sent off to his house entreating him to call. Her messenger was some hours before he found the Colonel, and then brought back but a few hasty lines—"Impossible to call that day. The Cunx had come at last! The Country, the House of Vipont, the British Empire, were trembling in the balance. The Colonel was engaged every moment for the next twelve hours. He had the present Earl of Montfort, who was intractable and stupid beyond conception, to see and talk over; Carr Vipont was hard at work on the materials for the new Administration, which Acting Carr Vipont. If the House of Vipont failed England at this moment, it would not be a Cunx, but a CRASH!" The Colonel hoped to arrange an interview with Lady Montfort for a minute or two the next day. But perhaps she would excuse him from a journey to Twickenham, and drive into town to see him; if not at home, he would leave word where he was to be found."

By the beard of Jupiter Capitolinus, there are often revolutions in the heart of a woman, during which the great Unity—Vice, plays on plain-speaking, with a minim of frightened ing.

"My dear lady," said he, "yours is a case in which physicians can be of very little use. Their remedies are only for the relief of those superficial functions fail to reach; worsy of some sort—decided to worry. And unless you yourself can either cure this, or very much relieve it, why, worry, my dear Lady Montfort, will end, not in cut suspicion—worry will end in softening of the heart and holes in the lungs—; but in a confirmed aneurism of the heart, and the first sudden shock will kill you. Your ladyship's life, that heart is a noble organ—bears a great deal—but still its strength is limited. The best hearts in time are more common than they were;—over-education and over-civilization, I suspect. Very young ladies are not what they were. They have less flurry, not worry—a very different thing. A good chronometer will go for a century and standing, that gets worried into acute inflammation at the age when feeling is no longer fussy, and kills without warning, or sometimes, if the grief is very great, by the concussion. Pardon my shortness of life, by inducing a prudent avoidance of worry in future. There is that worthy old gentleman Time, who is the doctor of the conscience in the moral emotions given heart-disease; also of the fine sensibilities of the nerves. Time is more common than they were—the first for your gentle sex, the second for our generation. Time is the doctor for their victims at the entrance into middle life. I have a very fine case of pulmonary worry in the next room, come to live a hundred—never saw such a splendid formation—such bone and muscle—such power of clear lady—all the worse for him. His strength leads him on to active service—exposure. He has caught foreign savaging Paralysis and falls him to earth with a blow. 'Tis your Hercules that I have in there; who despised the weak. But he will prudently slums all excess. And so, my dear lady, I propose that I shall determine to wait for the hearts that abuse their own force of emotion; sparing hearts that, less vital, are fitfully in need of support. Now you are not listening to me! And yet my patient may not be quite sufficiently ill to-day to-morrow. I am going to mention, the other day, to the lady who attends to and nurses him, that I could not call this morning, as I was to be at the Lady Montfort at Twickenham, she became very much interested, and very much excited, and she begged me to give you. She seems very much attached to my patient—not his wife nor his sister. Some connection, I suppose, of another cleverish woman too. Oh! here is the note."

Caroline broke the seal and read as follows: "Mrs. Crane presents her compliments to Archibald Colquhoun Esq. and will call at Care Cottage, Vale of Health, Hampstead, at her ladyship's earliest leisure, not to-day, as Mrs. Crane has an engagement, not perhaps important to Lady Montfort, but very important to Mr. Darrell, will be given."

Lady Montfort started the doctor by the abruptness with which she sprang to her feet and the bell.

"What is it?" asked he.

"The carriage immediately," cried Lady Montfort as the servant entered.

"Are you going to see the poor Darrells, Mrs. Crane, eh? Well, it is a charming drive, and just what I should have recommended. Any exertion will do you good. Allow me;—why your pulse is already fifty per cent better. Pray, what relation is Mrs. Crane to my patient?"

"I really don't know; pray excuse me, my dear Dr. Ewes—"

"Certainly; go while the day is fine. Wrap up;—a close carriage, mind;—and I will look in to-morrow."

CHAPTER X.

Wherein is insinuated the highest compliment to Woman ever paid to her sex by the Author of this work.

LADY MONTFORT has arrived at Clare Cottage. She is shown by Bridget Greggs into a small room upon the fifth floor; folding-doors to some other room, closely shut—evidences of sickness in the house—plaisir on the mantel-piece—a dirty tray with a broth basin on the table—a saucepan on the hob—the sofa one of those that serve as a bed which always bring visits for one who may watch through the night over some helpless sufferer—a—a—Darrell's shawl thrown carelessly over its hard narrow bolster;—all, in short, betraying that pathetic untidiness and discomfort which mark the abode of the sick house to whose will order and form are subordinate—the important object of attention. Before establishing itself in a life that, within those four walls, has a value not to be measured by its worth to the world without, the more feeble and helpless the sufferer, the more sovereign the despotism —the more arbitrary the rule of nurse.

In a minute or two one of the folding-doors silently opened, and as silently closed, admitting Mrs. Crane, Darrell's presence as invisible as an iron grey.

Caroline could not, at the first glance, recognise that Arabella Fossett of whose handsomeness, if somewhat too strongly defined and somber-complexioned, she had retained a faithful remembrance. But Arabella had still the same imposing movement which had always accompanied the grey spirits of her young pupil; and as she now motioned the great lady to a seat, and placed herself in a somewhat recollected attitude, Caroline room bowed Caroline's lovely head in mute reproof.

MRS. CRANE. "You too are changed since I saw you last—but was more than five years ago. Your face does not look beautiful. It is still a lovely; you would not scare away the man whom you delighted to save. Your features are impossibilities. Do you know that I have a cause to be grateful to you, without any merit of your own? I have sometimes thought that your vindictive and evil passions crowding on me—your face—your voice—your form—always seemed there so beautiful—and, in this face, Evil looked so haggard! Do not interrupt me. I have but a few minutes to spare you. I set in the sight of that face, gentle recollections rose in my heart, and I was saved. Your sister Arabella, Caroline Lyndsay—truthful. Other thoughts came to be mean of that face, as other thoughts had been when it expressed such opposite passions as of former days. Jean not tell how, but from the moment of something came to me more powerful than I had known for years entered into my heart. Whether that same being had ever existed—pulled to the quick of my soul. Had I not seen you before, I might have dreamed of a supernatural influence and deep revenge. And a purpose of revenge I did form. But it was not Almighty—and not Evil. It was a purpose of a man who laughed to scorn the idea of vows due to me—vows to bind life to life—should yet cause you to feel something more of the bitterness but truth; that my truth at least should be kept to you. Do you remember what you said to me? Why did you hear a moan?—No! He lies yonder, Caroline Lyndsay—mine, indeed, till the grave shall give up its dead. He stands between you and he rests in their clasp, helpless as an infant."

Caroline, overcome by emotion, had fallen into that care-worn face, there was in it so will a mixture of melancholy tenderness, with a remorse, that expression of which the beholder is made impressed by the tenderness than by the strength, that unconsciously drawn to the woman; and Caroline again drew near, nearer than before, and in her deep soft eyes pity alone was seen. Little those eyes Arabella knew of a spell-bound, and the darker and sterner expression of which she had so vividly described to Darrell, and only the melancholy tenderness was left behind—She resumed:

"I said to Guy Darrell that I would learn, if possible, whether the poor child whom I ill-used five or six years ago, and whom I had since unwittingly done so benignly sheltered, was the daughter of Matilda—or, as he believed, of a yet more humble parentage. Ago I left Guy Darrell in the conviction that there was some ground to doubt poor Lionel Montfort's marriage. I had found in two letters addressed to him—one from that Gabrielle Desmarres, whose influence over little Isabel I had so fatally used, which she spoke of some guilty plunder with which she was coming to London, and another from a lady who had fortunes with her own. Oh, but the cold, bloodless villaining of the task! Guy Darrell, into which I had entered, who were treated as topics for me! Arabella stopped—the same shudder came over her as when she had described the epistles abstracted from the dainty pocket-book. "But in the letter were also allusions to Isabel, which led me on Darrell to be made by Gabrielle herself. Nothing very clear; but a doubt did spring up in my mind—Is she not about his own child?" The other letter was from the French nurse with whom Sophy had been placed as an infant. It related to inquiries in person, and a visit to her own house, which Mr. Darrell had made—and which the nurse had seemed to imply none deception, though but by a few delicious words. At this time the first impression of the suspicion these letters caused was but to make me more bent on repairing to Sophy my cruelties to her childhood. What if I had been cruel to an infant who, after all, was not the daughter of that false, false Matilda Darrell! I kept in my memory the French nurse's address. I thought that when in France I might seek and question her. But I lived only for one absorbing end. Sophy was not then in danger; and look even suspicion to me but to drive away. Pass on:—Guy Darrell—Lionel Montfort! his life has been imbittered like mine; but he was more loved, and could bear it better. He has known, himself, the misery of broken faith, of betrayed affection, which he could pity so little when its blight fell on me; but you have excuse for desertion—you yourself were deceived, and I pardon him, for he pardoned Jasper, and we are fellow-sufferers. Love weeps—Pardon my rudeness. I did not mean to pain you. Try and listen calmly—I must hurry on. On leaving Mr. Darrell I crossed to France. I found the nurse. I have studied the truth; here are the proofs in this packet. I came to see Jasper Lovely. He was on the eve of exiling himself from the country by wrongful—of claiming the child, or rather of extorting money for the restoration of the child of whom you had adopted. I told him how vainly he had hitherto sought to fly from me. One by one I recited the guilty evidences of which I had baffled his purpose—all the dangers from which I had rescued his life. In the madness of his fanfaron the project he had then concerned. I told him I would frustrate that project as I had frustrated others. Also, that I was in no hurry to so harsh?—why does this face so belie the idea of human kindness? I will not be hard—I will endeavor him; he felt but the reckless impulses to destroy the life that then stood between himself and the objects to which he had pledged his own self-destruction. I thought I should die before I saw him again, but not until I had the satisfaction that come over his face—the one glance of human sympathy and mercy; his arms obeyed him not; his strength, his talent, forsook him; he fell at my feet—one side of him stricken as dead. I left that day in his voice—never to see and Arabella flitted from the room, leaving the door ajar.

A feeble Voice, like the treble of an infirm old man, came painfully to Caroline's ear.

"Arabella—Arabella—Arabella—am I left alone? It is cruel to leave me so—cruel to be left alone—Arabella—Arabella!" Another voice could be tuned, the grim woman apologised and soothed.

"You gave me leave, Jasper dear. You said it would be a relief to you to have her pardon as well as sleep."

"Whose pardon?" asked the Voice, querulously.

"Caroline Lyndsay's—Lady Montfort's."

"Nonsense! What did I ever do against her? Oh—oh! I remember—oh! I have—I have it over again. You—she pardons me, I suppose! Get me my broth, and don't be long."

Arabella came back, closing the door; and Caroline heard herself called to the bed-room saucepan on the hob—to which the Marchioness had identified the former a very secondary object—the mild, looking thing of iron, under her iron-grey ringlets—

"You have—you have—me! He can't bear me out of his sight now—me, me! You forgive!"

Meekly Lady Montfort advanced, bringing in her hand the tray with the broth basin.

"Yes, I forgive you, Jasper dear; but let us help while I stay."

By the broth was poured forth and prepared, and with it Arabella disappeared. She returned as in a few minutes, beckoned to Caroline, and led her to the bed-side.

"Come in—say you forgive-him! Oh, you could not fear him; a babe could not fear him now!"

Caroline followed Arabella into the sick-room. The invalid was sitting up in bed, his head slightly surrounded. A pleasant room, too—with the windows looking to the eastern slope of the Vale of Health; the hearth so cleanly clear; swept so clean—the very ashes out of sight; everything—even the bed, the chair, the mantle-piece; the couch drawn toward the window, and not that couch, by any means, the dingy-gown of former days, warm coverlets heaped on the feet, snow-white pillows propping the head, and the invalid seemed as clean and comfortable a side mass—by, what, as the step advanced, and the eye's bosom-pain of recognition overflowed into Jasper Lovely.

Yet there, too much indeed for a babe to fear, lay all that was left of the Strong Man! No enemy but himself had brought him that wreck—mental, bodily, and worst of all—that of his own priceless treasures—Health and Strength —those grand and noble gifts of which Nature and made his inheritance. As a tree that is crumbling to dust under the guards of its bark, and the green garment of its leaves, until time and the tempest;—so, within all decayed, could that image of grandeur be seen, still, stirring, it fell. "And the pitcher was broken at the fountain; and the wheel was broken at the cistern." A family of valuable Greek Testaments, etc.

Jasper turned his dull eye toward Caroline, as she came softly to his side, and looked at her with a piteous gaze. The stroke that had shattered his mind had spared the face; symmetrical and compulsory abstinence from habitual stimulants had taken from the features that look of coarseness—whether of shape or color—that of late years had disfigured its outline—and was, perhaps, the delicacy that ends with youth be the delicacy that comes with the approach of death. So fine, in small degree, the moral which had been to him so fatal a gift, was once more visible—the features growing again distinct, as weakness succeeded to the hues of intemperance, and emaciation to the bloated cheeks and swollen muscle. The goddess whose locus adorn the outward shell of the human spirit, came back to her favorite's death-couch as she had come to the cradle—not now as the Venus Erycina, goddess of Smile and Jest, but as the warning Goddess Libitina, the goddess of Doom and the Funeral.

"I'm a very poor creature," said Jasper, after a pause. "I can't rise—I can't move without help. Very strange!—supernatural!! She always said that if I raised my hand against her it would fall powerless! He turned his eye toward Arabella with a glare of angry terror. "She is a witch!" he said, and buried his face in the pillow. Tears welled down the young woman's cheek.

LADY MONTFORT. "She is rather your good ministering spirit. Do not be unkind to her! Over her you have more power now than ever before, when you were strong. She lives but to serve you; command her gently.

Jasper was not proof against that sweet voice. With difficulty he wrenched himself round, and again looked long at Arabella Crass. Was it the sight did him good; then he made a sign to Arabella, who flew to his side and raised him.

"I love you as a good dog," he said, with a mournful attempt at the old rollicking tone—"a very sad dog—poor, shorn, a fool. But all ladies are indulgent to villains—in fact, prefer them. Never knew a lady who could endure 'a good young man'—never! So I am not to be—weight, weight—heavy as a church bell—but low as a church bell—money is a good bell! Brandy! give me brandy, you witch—I mean Bella, good Bella, give me brandy!"

"Not yet, Jasper dear. You are to have it every third hour; it is not time yet, dearest; you must attend to me. Indeed you'll get well and recover your strength. You remember I told you how lucky Lady Montfort had been to your father, and you wished to see and thank her."

"My father—my poor, poor father! You've been kind to him! Bless you, bless you! And you will see him? I want his pardon before I die. Don't forget, and—and—

"Poor Sophy!" said Mrs. Crass.

"Ah yes! But she's well off now, you tell me. I can't think I have injured her. And really Bella and myself are intended to be a little useful to one. Basta, basta!"

"Mr. Darrell—"

"Yes, yes, yes! I forgive him, or he forgives me; settle it as you like. But my father's pardon, Lady Montfort, you will get me that?"

"I will, I will."

He looked at her again, and smiled. Arabella gently laid his head full back upon the pillow.

"Throw a handkerchief over my face," he said, feebly, "and leave me; but be in call; I feel sleepy."

His eyes closed; he seemed asleep; even slumber they would from the touch.

"You will bring his father to him?" said Arabella, when Lady Montfort moved even again alone. "In this pocket is Jasper's confession of the robbery for which that poor old man suffered. I never knew of it before. But you see how mild he is now!—how his heart is changed! It is indeed almost more than he should; only you have seen him at the worst—his mind wanders a little to-day; it does sometimes. I have a fever to see it you. If once heard a preacher, not many months ago, he affected me as no sermon ever did before. I was told that he was Colonel Morley's nephew. Will you ask Colonel Morley to persuade him to come to Jasper?"

"My cousin, George Morley! He shall come. I promise you; so shall your poor sufferer forgiving father. Is there more I can do?"

"No. Explain to Mr. Darrell the reasons why I have so long delayed sending to him the communication which he will find in the packet. I have given you, you see, a packet all in first open, reading the contents yourself—a part of them, at least, in Jasper's amendment. It was a stratagem to break off your marriage with Mr. Darrell, nay yet to be of some value to you—you had better also study the papers in Colonel Morley—he may complete the task—I had meant, on returning to Dublin, to have written to Mr. Darrell, to make the inquiries which you will see are still necessary. But then came this terrible affliction! I have been able to do but little—nothing else but Jasper—terrible to quit the house which contains him for an hour—only when Dr. F. told me that he was attending you, that you were ill and suffering. I resolved to add to this packet Jasper's own amendment, and he gave it so readily, and went yesterday through the forging of the name with such a heart. I tell you that there is a change within him; there is—there is! Well, well—I resolved to give you the packet to transmit to Mr. Darrell; for somehow or other I connected your illness with your visit to him at Fawley!"

"My visit to Mr. Darrell!"

"Jasper saw you as your carriage drove from the park gate, and very many days since. Ah, you change color! You have wronged that man; you are sorry now you have so right to pride; you will see him again!"

"No—never—never!" faltered Caroline, with accents scarcely audible under her veil.

Arabella was silent for a moment, and Lady Montfort rose from her recumbent posture.

"You will see him again, I tell you!" and Arabella then, following her to the door—

"Stay: do you think me will die?"

"Good Heavens! Mr. Darrell?"

"No—Jasper Lowly?"

"I hope not. What does Dr. F. say?"

"He will not tell me. But it is not the paralysis alone; he might recover from that—no young still. There are other symptoms; that beautiful habit of mind—I fear it will be as has them not—they hasten death if he has But—but—but—IT IS MIND, AND MINE ONLY TO THE GRAVE NOW!"

CHAPTER XI.

The Crisis—Public and Private.

LADY MONTFORT'S carriage stopped at Colonel Morley's door just as Carr Vipont was coming out. Lady Montfort, in haste, hurried up to the carriage window.

"Mr. Vipont, good-day!—not seen you for an age! What times we live in! Wonderously The Crisis has come upon us! Sad loss in your poor Monthly; no wonder you've taken for him! Had his failings, true—who is not mortal?—but amiable, kind, always to be relied on in times of Crisis! But this crotchety fellow, who has so unluckily, for all us himself, attached to the Government, stands by to-morrow night—only think what may happen—the other fellows will come in, and—ruin DEBUGE!"

Carr is gone to find grooms and Dame Partington to stem the Debuge. Colonel Morley has observed Lady Montfort's summons, and has entered the carriage window on the other speak, however, he has rushed into the subject of which he himself is full. "Only think—if Sir Peter would be on the ministerial bench, all depends upon Guy Darrell! Montfort, who stems always in the current, has unluckily pinned full on his head, and crush him, says that if Darrell, whom he chooses to favor just because the seven others don't, does not vote with Government, why say the Crisis is a job! Fancy!—a job—the Crisis! Lord Morley, I'm told, called for Sir Josiah Snedge, who are both necessary to a united government, but who unluckily detest each other. Sir Josiah will by no means Cabinet, unless Darrell sit between—so says them. I suppose, from the tone of Guy Darrell's speech, Sir John Canty, our crack county member, declares that if Darrell does not come in, he will not stand. Montfort, you see, so far! Harry Bold, our most popular speaker, says, if Darrell stay out, 'is a sign that he is not to be supported Government!' In short, without Darrell, the Crisis will be a failure, and the House of Vipont annihilated. Sir Peter—smashed! I sent a telegram—(oh, that I should live to see such a word introduced into the House of Commons!)—to Carr Vipont last night, and he—(Carr Vipont, I mean says, what times these are!) to Fawley this morning, entreating Guy to come up by the mail, and he has sent me up a line from Horace, which means, 'that he will see me shut first.' I must go down to Fawley, and you know the rapid set of certain negotiations to as measures. I have but one hope. There is a report abroad that Darrell always privately advocated—which he thoroughly understands—which, placed in his own hands, would be triumphantly carried out in those measures, Lady Montfort, which, if defeated, shipwreck is inevitable, and which only Guy Darrell could frame ft, immortalize the minister who concocts and carries them. This is the hope which I entertain, and which I must and cancer. This is at length an occasion to which Guy may, and will, give his services to the country; let him reject it, and I shall tell him frankly that his life has been but a brilliant failure, because he has not used his splendid talents and usage requires the actual possession of that which confers power. He will lose his seat—he will lose his voice in the Commons. But we can arrange that; for if Darrell will but join the Government and go to the Lords, I will make Snodge, who has a great deal of voice and a great deal of jobbery, will join too—and the Vipont interests in the Commons—and speak to the country—speak every night—and all Guy's real friends will speak. Perhaps at last the peerage—devote himself for a year or two to the great measures which will consolidate for his fame—to the redemption of the House of Vipont—and to the Salvation of the Empire! Good-by! If he please, I will communicate—that is, he may retire from harness, and browse upon laurels for the rest of his days."

Colonel Morley delivered himself of this long address without interruption from a listener upon whose every word this Colonel's descendant fell, and in every hope that could reunite him to the beautiful object of his love.

It was now Lady Montfort's turn to speak; though, after subjects so momentous as the crisis and all its speculative consequences, private affairs, relating to a poor little girl like Sophy—nay, the mere private affairs of Darrell himself, seemed a pitiful bathos. Lady Montfort, however, after a few words of womanly commiseration upon the very sorry end to Colonel's discourse which touched her heart, hastened on to describe her interview with Arabella, and the melancholy condition of Darrell's once formidable enemy. For the first time Colonel evinced no more compassionate feeling than any true Englishman, at the mention of a lingering, painful disorder for a murderous Sepoy fell to the mouth of a cannon.

"A very good riddance!" said the Colonel, drily. "Great relief to Darrell, and—to every one else whom that monster tormented; and proved on; and with his life will vanish the only remaining obstacle in righting poor Willy's good name. I hope to live to collect, from all parts of the country, Willy's old friends, and give them a supper, at which I suppose I must not get drunk again! I should rather like to drink that not! But I interrupt you; go on.

Lady Montfort proceeded to state the substance of the papers she had perused in reference to the mystery which had been the cause of so many heart-aches and bitterness.

The Colonel stretched out his hand eagerly for the document, and, when it was finished his eye rapidly over the contents of the first paper, which was in Jasper's own hand, and then, without a word, turned to the next yet to spare in discussing these matters with you—may order your carriage round—the Regent's Park?—better than keeping it thus at my door with four old maids for opposite neighbors!" The Colonel was given, and the Colonel again returned to the papers. Suddenly he looked up with a start. "Lady Montfort, you always to be relied on in times of Crisis! But this crotchety fellow, who has so unluckily, for all us himself, attached to the Government, stands by to-morrow night—only think what may happen—the other fellows will come in, and—ruin DEBUGE!"

The Country Produce Markets were rather quiet. Prices varied slightly. The Game Dealers and Express Companies have been actively engaged in the duties of their officials, when they failed to receive the usual fees for the presentation of "Fish and Game." They consider the sentiments unjust and unconstitutional, and state that they have resolved to test its legality.

ARE INSURED BY WEARING
DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD'S
NEW MATINEE SKIRT WITH THE PATENT DETACHABLE
HOOP FASTENING
AND ADJUSTABLE BUSTLE.

SAFETY! since it effectually obviates the danger arising from entangling dress or foreign substances in the hoops!

COMFORT! because the muslin skirt can be instantaneously removed from the springs by PATENT DETACHABLE FASTENINGS, washed, with other garments, and at no greater expense, and replaced on the hoops in a minute!

ELEGANCE! because the scientific cut of the muslin skirt, and the fine material of which it is composed, give a graceful fall to the robe worn over it; and with its bell weather, enable the wearer to dispense with any intermediate skirt.

The MATINEE SKIRT has eleven hoops, weighs but two pounds, measures in Paris, TEN YARDS MADE BY MESSRS. DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD, and is the best fabric ever produced for a skirt, and is also indispensable to every lady who desires to combine in her apparel SAFETY, COMFORT, and ELEGANCE. It is sold in all the principal stores in the United States and Canada.

THE LAND AND THE BOOK;
OR,
BIBLICAL ILLUSTRATIONS DRAWN FROM THE MANNERS AND CUSTOMS, THE SCENES AND SCENERY OF THE HOLY LAND.

BY W. M. THOMSON, D.D.,
Twenty-five Years a Missionary of the A.B.C.F.M. in Syria and Palestine.

With two elaborate Maps of Palestine, an accurate Plan of Jerusalem, and several hundred Engravings representing the Scenery, Topography, and Productions of the Holy Land, and the Customs, Manners, and Habits of the Old Testament Times. Large Octavo Volumes.

PRICE THREE DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS.

The Land of the Bible is part of the Divine Revelation. It bears the impress of the Book, and gives lessons inevitable by exposition. Both have been written by the finger of God. Each is a key to unlock the other. Hence by the Gospel is a description of Living Epistles. To collect this testimony and popularize their lessons for the Biblical student of every age and class is the prominent design of this work. For twenty-five years this Author has been permitted to enjoy the most favorable light which the Land sheds upon it; and he now hands over this Fruit-Field, which to them who have not been thus favored. In this attempt the pencil has been employed to aid the pen. A large number of pictorial illustrations are introduced, many of them original, and all giving the Land and the Book a new interest. Many of the Certain Holy Places are presented. They are not merely sketches of imaginary scenes thrown in to embellish the volume, but pictures of living manners, and of historical topography, or expressive of interesting Biblical relations, which add greatly to the value of the work.

The most complete and reliable work in illustration of the Bible which modern research and observation have ever produced, is about to be issued from the press of the Harpers. We have been favored with an advance sheet. We venture to say that every Sabbath-school teacher and every minister of the Bible book a necessity. It will absolutely expound a Bible; and that any Christian family will find it a treasure, and a source of many and varied delight and information.

We have already noticed it in extenso, and we may add now that it is pronounced the most interesting, delightful, and valuable work on Palestine and the Bible that has been made for many years. It will be the very first subject and no intelligent Sabbath-school teacher can afford to go without it.—N. Y. Christian Advocate and Journal.

We repeat with emphasis, as the result of attentive examination of the work, that the Christian's work, that the Sabbath-school library ought to possess, and upon the topics of which there volumes treat, can afford to be without them.—N. Y. Evangelist.

FEARFUL SUFFERINGS AT SEA.

ON 9th January the bark Ann arrived at Pawtuxet, Massachusetts, from Fayal on 16th December. She had on board a shipwrecked sailor, by name William Kennedy, who has had one of the narrowest escapes from drowning ever heard of. His story is that he sailed from New York for San Francisco in the Margaret Tyson, Captain Morris. He states that the ship capsized in a gale on a Saturday night—he does not know the date, latitude, or longitude—and lay on her beam ends until Sunday morning, when she was settling very fast. Captain Morris then called all the men aft, and told them to look out for themselves, as he should go down with the ship. She soon had every appearance of sinking.

The ship had six boats, three of which were stove by the drifting spars about the deck, two were stove alongside, and the sixth was launched in safety. Five of the crew jumped into her; but she was capsized soon after by a heavy sea. Four of the men got on her bottom, and the fifth (the man saved) caught a rope hanging from the ship, and hauled himself on board again. He then stripped off part of his clothes, and swam to the ship's house, which had become detached from the wreck. He found two of the crew on it, and was soon after joined by two more, who had been floating on portions of the wreck. At this time the ship had entirely disappeared. Two men soon died from exposure. The third man became delirious on the ninth day, and jumped overboard. The fourth died two days before Kennedy was picked up. He says that he caught seven small fish with his hands, and occasionally caught water when it rained. He accounts for his being seventeen days on the wreck from the fact that the last man who died told him that they had passed three Sundays on the wreck. He does not know what date the ship was lost. He is an Irishman, and not very intelligent. Letters from the Captain of the schooner Orend state that it was in longitude 40° that he picked up Kennedy.

We illustrate herewith the fearful peril of Kennedy and his companions on the ship's house.

A RAMBLING STORY.

BOTH AN OLD AND A COMMON STORY, TOLD IN A MOST UNCOMPREHENSIBLE MANNER, BY THOMAS BUNTEY, IN THE COACHMAKING LINE.

GENTLEMEN all and ladies all, God bless you and keep you merry, and if any tale of mine can make you more jolly, why Thomas Buntey is not the one to say "No," that being quite contrary to his usual behavior, which is remarkable for good manners and comely conduct. It is a story about himself which Thomas Buntey is about to tell. He'll vouch for the truth of it, and if any man from 8st.-4 up to 12st.-8 dares to deny it, T. B. will be glad to prove his word before the face of Europe. When put up, T. B. is a round lion, and active. This story is about T. B.'s wife, and how he came by her. A man that can lift a sack of potatoes as easy as a new-born rabbit is not the party to be trifled with. But it's holiday time, gentlemen and ladies all, and that softens the heart. I am willing to confess I was out late last night, and—well, I don't mind saying it—T. B. had a very liberal supper. But that is my business. May all your bills be paid, and never be brought up twice!

I'll go so far as to confess this—which, mind you, no force alive could have wrung from me, though it happened a year back, if I hadn't been so minded—that I was in some measure to blame. I certainly did go so far as to say that I expected the conduct of a gentleman to a gentleman from a gentleman, and Miss Mivers heard me say the words, and is willing to swear to them if need be. Well, he wouldn't take it. He went make his remarks. "This is not the time for such discussions," said I; "you'll speak when you're spoken to, and until then remain unobserving," said I, cutting him short, for I hate obtrusiveness. Besides, I never will hear him abuse that sweet girl, who earns the very bread he eats. The man had been civil enough till then, and very gentlemanly.

Well, we all threw. Mine was a winner, being the highest. So far so good; so they brought in the refreshments as ordered. But he wouldn't know his place. I gave him the best of advice, and said, "For your sister's sake, let by-gones be gone-bys."

I was up in a minute, and after him as fast as I could put one leg before the other. He was a pretty runner, and might have done better if he had made it his profession; but that man never would take advice. And what is he now? He only knows too well, and so does Mrs. Pewters, who, three days ago this time twelvemonths, offered to take five pounds and cry quits.

So they carried him home and put him to bed. He wasn't much hurt; and after I'd forced his head twice into the pail he partially recovered, and allowed his boots to be taken away. My only fear was that she should return, for I was anxious to be favorable in her opinion—as good a girl as ever put a bonnet on, and youth like a week every six days she worked.

Well, when she heard my story she agreed with me that he was in the wrong. I must tell you I had sent for the goose, and she remarked it was a very fine bird, and thanked me very heartily for the present. I staid there about an hour, and all the time he never moved. She accepted my invitation, and it was agreed that if the weather was propitious we should meet at four to the minute.

In these matters the least said the soonest mended; so I was willing to take his hand, and did so. "Your conduct," I told him, very straightforward, "was not such as one gentleman expects from another gentleman; but at this season of the year I'll bear no malice." Then he said what was due, and we went back to her.

You ought to be told, before you can perfectly understand this story, that the bogie and boat work was getting very slack, and that she was forced "to play" a good deal. He, too, being a victim to rheumatism and a late riser, was out of work. Now, we had been remarkably busy. When I told Mr. Merrideu—our second gentleman—I should be away for three days, he asked if my work was in, and then expressed himself agreeable. So they paid me two pound sixteen, and I was as free as air. This suited me.

When I went there that evening every thing was in a rumpus. Seeing how things were going on, a man had been put in, and Mrs. Pewters was drinking green tea in her own room, and prepared to stand by events.

I never liked her much, but when I offered her a pound down she softened. He was very bad up stairs, and I had rebutted a good deal, for I reasoned I owes it—much to blame, especially the pushing him down the milkman's steps. But my blood was up, and then I'm dreadfully vicious. So she asked, very complaisant, if I'd join her in a cup, and I paid the money.

When the man that was put in was taken out, she was most overcome by the act and he was all gratefulness. "You never could keep a place, nor never will," I told him outright—just my way. He never denied it, and his head being still inflamed wouldn't take a drop. She said she never had passed such a pleasant evening.

Well, I made it my express business to speak to Mr. Merridew about it, and he was taken on for wheel-painting, at which he is clever. Every thing went on very agreeable for three days, and was most promising. That night I congratulated him, and spoke highly of his demeanor and proceedings. I never heard such thanks as she expressed herself of, for at this time she brought her work home, so we were much together.

The moment he asked me to become security I gave a straightforward "No." "Begin at littles and end at greats," I said. "That's all very well, but how can I make sure?" I remarked. She was on my side, and after all I had done for him gave him a rebuke for not being more conscientious.

The appointment was made for that very midday, and true enough I saw Mr. Hearne, and signed the bill. He was most profuse with thanks, which it pained me to hear, but I told him I did it for her, and no remarks of his could conquer my esteem. Who would have thought that three weeks after this he would have missed an installment?

She took on dreadfully. True, the back rent was paid. But rent is always going on; and if you pay the backs, why the forwards are advancing, and you should continually be prepared; at lent I did it so, and I can only one in ten thousand.

She agreed, crying all the time, to every thing I said. There were no hopes of him. It wasn't one glass nor three glasses, but a shopful of them. He were out the lungs by his spinning and snuffing, and as Miss Mivers remarked, he didn't pay for the very chalk that was used for him. I was kind and attentive, and affectionate there. But "Let it out," was the observation I heard the company with. Then he took an oath and was abusive.

Time went on. One night he behaved more cruel to her than ever, and she would n't give him the chilling, he broke the chain, which cost half-a-crown in his father's time, and as I warn't there, he went and pawned her work and sent her the duplicate. The shopman stared when I asked for it, for I was a lady of elegant clothes. She said three shillings would keep her until she drew her earnings, and I arranged, once more, matters all comfortable and happy.

When Mrs. Fanters heard he had 'listed, what did she do but sweep the very bed from under her. The shop in Fox Alley which bought 'em, stuck it on in the middle of, and would have none of 'em. The little black profile of her mother, which, when new, was only worth a shilling, was sold for two shillings per, a profit so very high I was quite fluxes. After I had paid for the broken glass she took the pictured lamp, and she also took the look of hair at the back, and I saw the fresh pounds in it. A very decent woman.

The first flurry—although very nice people, and well to do—got tired of letting her sleep on their sofa for such a long time. I was sorry for it, but I usual, I asked her to let me know how her business stood, and speak fair and free, and so see what could be done.

She only heard from him twice since he was shipped for India. He wrote very strong and hearty, and gradually improving. He wrote to know what sort of money she would require for a full, but I stopped that.

By the time Mr. Hextra said "Thank you" to the last installment of the last agent of my money more than thirty pounds. She never knew this, her eye is in black. I had the pleasure to see her gone off dreadful bad, and she took to flowers and bonnets at 4s. the dozen. I knew she had very little things, she said cook and a half, and that's but whenever I was by I never heard her grumble, but she'd give me a cup of tea, and always smoked would sing, "Mother, is the battle over?" and "Willie, we have missed you," as sweet as birds.

Ever since I had sent her my bed and furniture as a present I had been forced to go very near comfortable. I missed the chairs, too, and the kettle especially. My clothes were kept in an empty tea-chest, the mirrors I sacrificed to the spars. You see, her room, being entirely empty, was quite dreadful for dust. At last I got so disengaged at work, as I was, from six to six, furniture is only an extravagance. Besides, I am owning I was sick her. The moment you fall sick you might as well be in the blackest hole in Calcutta as in the handsomest room you can take in Pall Mall Lane. That's my philosophy; and it's as good as most of them that I've listened to.

Many weeks went on. I was three, and very glad to see her so comfortable. The moment she began her chaunt I was off, and I never let on that I knowing this—for she's remarkable quick in perceiving things—she never knew a thing grateful. I was surprised to find how well my furniture became her room, and how shed made the brass to shine and the copper to glimmer. The artificial flowers round the looking-glass were particularly handsome. I said how the portrait favored me the day I was when she peeped into it; but I never said any thing in that strain after that, for she was averse to compliments, and because very often she used to heard them, and ran the needle into herself a good deal if I said any thing pretty. So I left off that conversation as commonplace as I could to accommodate her state of mind, and every thing proceeded glossy all.

The man who let the rope slip said it was none his own clerk fault, but left the house on a Saturday and in less than five minutes was tying on my back, as insensible as a sheep's carcass. There were four of them carried out from the hospital, one died, and 3 shatter. Then two of me wanted to cut my arm off, and two wanted to shave my head, and I was put in on me now, and, except in wet weather, very handy.

So that spring, when the doctor had examined me, he says, "Bed 32, you'll soon be able to go about your business again." Then I had Port wine. After that they gave me meat. Then they said, "Next Friday," and I was agreeable.

It was very hard for me lying on my mattress, continually on one side, to prevent my bad shoulder being hurt. And so I got to think about my future to look at. When she first came to see me at my private lodgings (she came every day afterward, this was the first) I was in bed, and when she stared about her in amazement, for the place was no luxe and no fire, she thought I'd got a bad letter to do than that. She ventured to remark that if she had known it she would never have engaged the three trochilla that were sent to her place. I was very weak, and it pained me to see her cry. I told her to come to-day week, for there was no lion there—only lambs as gentle as herself.

The man that brought the furniture back said he was paid, and was ordered to leave it; even so, and if necessary on force. So I paid him the best, and sent him away very agreeable.

When she had arranged the room as it used once to be, she took to crying again. I refused to pardon her for returning them as cruel. I wouldn't allow her to call herself hard-hearted, or to permit her to be indulged so far as to style herself selfish. But I, with my quiet ways, was not. I said, said that as I couldn't bear of her room being torn when notice was crowded, and as she was of the same mind, why shouldn't one room do for the two of us?

Mrs. Golding (belonging to Golding the whitesmith) was kind enough to call us very sensible people, and promised to act like a mother to her, and to give her away whenever next might be. That fine woman said: "Call me up at midnight, and I'm ready." We had six cups each, and then retired to rest.

Mr. Merridew, who is a gentleman, and behaves as such to me as a gentleman, gave us a wedding present, and I'm there now, painting coats of arms for people dreadfully of late, the money most remarkable.

She said, with much feeling, "It's name shall be Lucy, for that was his name, and his father's name before him." So I let it be, and there he is James to this day, very fat and comfortable.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 22, 1859.

CITY AND COUNTY RESPONSIBILITIES.

THE County of Alleghany, Pennsylvania, is reported to be taking proceedings to contest the validity of the demand by the bankers of that State, condemning it to fulfill its written agreement. Simultaneously, we learn that the City of Keokuk, in Southern Iowa, has announces, by the organ of its Mayor, that its citizens are about to repudiate. Other towns and counties in the West are considering the advisability to follow this example; bills are already draughted for adoption by the State Legislatures of Illinois, and Southern cities the privilege of cleaning their creditors.

The persons and corporate bodies who thus propose to evade the consequences of their own acts, and to defraud those who have reposed faith in their integrity, should carefully examine of the principles of credit and of the ways of the world.

Various estimates have been made of the pecuniary injury inflicted on the United States by the repudiation of Mississippi, Arkansas, Florida and Illinois, and by the partial default of Pennsylvania and Texas in relation to their debts. Some authorities have stated that the loss of these States alone, and the entrance of large several hundred millions of dollars by discrediting its bonds abroad and shedding a blight upon the whole American security. However this may be, it is certain that the stocks of the repudiating States have never risen to any great extent, and that every citizen of Mississippi, nor Arkansas, nor Florida, nor Illinois have been able to borrow the money they have needed for internal improvements except at that to this day Pennsylvania and Texas stocks are open to suspicions which are never breathed against the securities of Virginia, Massachusetts, or New York. No misfortune ever befell the people of these States so lamentable as the enduring ill to their character and their portentous policy in reference to their State bonds.

It seems to be a question now whether counties and cities shall follow the bad example or not. If the County of Alleghany should succeed in evading the payment of its bonds, Pittsburgh and if the City of Keokuk should succeed in bullying its creditors into accepting a compromise of 40 or 50 per cent., the effect upon the prospects—the credit of cities and counties throughout the country will be gravely impaired. Capitalists will hesitate before they invest money even in the habit of lending their money to cities, as well as counties, throughout the North and West, on the faith of the municipal and county cans for integrity. Very few purchasers of a city bond take the trouble to inquire into the property subject to taxation for the interest thereon. They rely chiefly on their conviction that American citizens—whether poor or rich—will pay their debts. They rely on the sense of honor, that by ingenious quibbles of law many cities and counties might evade their debts if they were so inclined. In view of the evidence by the belief that, whatever the law may do, American citizens will act like honest men.

It now remains for the City of Keokuk to believe it well founded or no. The Pennsylvania Courts have theirs for given to encouragement to the repudiation of Alleghany. Meanwhile, nothing has yet transpired of the opinions of the Iowa Judiciary upon the City of Keokuk's proposal of Keokuk. It may be safely and that if either the one or the other are sustained by the Courts in the cases they are pursuing, we have seen the last of county and city loans.

The principle with regard to corporate indebtedness differs in no respect from that which governs individual debts. If a man can pay his debts, he is bound to do so to the uttermost cent of his property. If a city or county incurs debt, the property within the same is similarly bound. It is no excuse to say that the business of the county is depressed, or that the State considers a debt of five per cent. on the taxable property as much as any city or county should bear. When the debt has been incurred voluntarily, it is to be presumed that the debtor has benefited by it; and he is bound to pay it, whatever be his circumstances, and even though the debt be ninety-five per cent. of the taxable property. Any other principle would be fatal to the moral and material progress of the human race.

THE USURY LAWS.

Fresh efforts will be made this winter to induce the Legislature to repeal the absurd and pernicious usury laws. The trade of money, of course, must be regulated by the law of supply and demand; if the farmers suddenly and simultaneously require to borrow, it is sure to become rate of interest will rise; if, on the contrary, they follow the usual course of things, and borrow only as they require money for their improvements, the chances are that the rate would fall below the present legal figure, because there is always a large decrease of money in the hands of large cities seeking investment on real estate.

The injury inflicted on the farmers by the usury laws is this. When money is dear at the financial centres—as it always must be in prosperous times—they can borrow no at all; for no speculator will lend at 7 per cent. when he can readily obtain 9 and 10 per cent. This inconvenience would have been severely felt by many thousands of the farmers of this State in the year 1856. Whereas, if the usury laws were repealed, they would always obtain money, though at a price—that money was plentiful; at a dear rate, when money was scarce; but, so long as their security was adequate, they would always succeed in obtaining a loan at some rate or other.

These arguments may not carry conviction to the minds of the members from the agricultural districts. In other countries the farmers have insisted on being exempted from the effects of the fluctuations in the value of money. Even in this, for instance, loans on real estate are exempted from the operation of the Lows securing the bride in property; and the reason assigned is that, at the present time, when bankers, merchants, and brokers are borrowing as much as they want at six per cent., farmers cannot get it under ten per cent. per annum. If the rural districts like this plan, it would not be objected to by the bankers. Let the law be enacted, therefore, that in the case of loans on real estate, 7 per cent. shall be the legal rate of interest; but in all other cases, that money, like other commodities, shall be worth the price it will command, and no more. Such a plan would be quite satisfactory to this city. We should save a great deal of fraud and perjury; it would enable many men to lend their money more safely than they do now; it would relieve many from the fear that whenever they now pay to indemnify the lender against the chances of a plea of usury. If it ruins the rural districts, by all means let it become a law.

IS CHARLES DICKENS COMING TO THIS COUNTRY?

We presume that it is not generally understood that a gentleman has lately left this country for Europe, with the intention of inducing Mr. Charles Dickens to come here and read his writings to American audiences. Such is the fact; and as the matter has been which have been brought to bear, and the inducements which are likely to be held out to Mr. Dickens, it is safe to infer that the invitation will run a fair chance of being accepted. It is quite possible that Mr. Dickens may be among us within the next twelve months. Certain it is that he may read his works in all the large cities of the North before the hot weather sets in. It is a favorite question with the public, and, doubtedly, the general impression in the United States—derived in a great degree from Mr. Dickens's own last public letter—has been rather more favorable to the liberal side than to the pro-monarchical side of the question. The letter would add a wafe ago. People are already forgetting that there have been any dissensions in the Dickens household. Quarrels between husband and wife are not so rare here that people remember them for any length of time.

As to the other obstacle in the way of Mr. Dickens's reception here, viz., his ungracious reputal of the civilities shown him here on his former visit, it must be borne in mind that the persons who were most annoyed at Martin Chuzzlewit now belong to a past age. Many of them are tenants of a better world; others, still living, have ceased to take an active share in sublunary concerns. The rolling generation of this day were in pinafores and bibs when the Dickens ball was given. They know Dickens, not by Martin Chuzzlewit or Nicholas Nickleby, but by Bleak House, David Copperfield, and Little Dorrit. They know him not only as the most exuberantly sympathetic satirist of the age, but as a gallant champion of democracy in Great Britain, and as a man who has done yeoman service in the cause of social, political, legal, and industrial reform. His works are familiar to a larger section of the American people than any other writings of the present day. Dickens, then, in respect of popularity, not only far above the most popular of his contemporaries, but above Shakspeare and Byron.

If, therefore, it be allowable to reason from analogy on such a subject, we should say that, desire to see Dickens than could be gathered to listen to lectures by any other living man.

So far as the leaders of intellectual society are concerned, they are, one and all, prepared to extend to Charles Dickens a cordial and hearty welcome. Whatever faults he may have been, there is no question but he has been in his day and of his race the boldest and best friend of humanity, the truest champion of truth, and the honestest partisan of honesty. None have exposed the rottenness of old routine, or the fallacy of hereditary privilege as thoroughly and eloquently as he; none have used great powers of fascination to so useful advantage. The world is deeply grateful to Charles Dickens has unquestionably made the best use of his great gifts; nor can this age do itself justice without according to the illustrious man that is his due. The obligation devolves on us as well as upon the English; and if he comes here we will discharge it.

HOW NOT TO TEACH BOYS.

A MAN was, dying down East, his ancestors were in controversy by leaving the bulk of his fortune to Yale College, and cutting off his wife and children with nominal legacies. Some journals make short work of him, and call him a curmudgeon; others, owning to a private regard for the deceased, plead as a benefactor of learning and an honor to his species.

The question at issue lies in a very narrow compass. Could he do as he pleased as to the what he will with his own. Children possess no rights whatever upon the estate of their parents; while the latter have a natural craving from the pure bounty of their father or mother. A fortiori, if a man thinks (with good reason, as we deem) that the Yale College of his day is substantially more beneficial to a young man than a legacy of $100,000 or $250,000, he has a right to endow it. Nor can the moral principle of the disposition he chose to make of his property: nor has any stranger any good ground for gratuitously complaining in their behalf or as the widow's.

But when we come to examine the bequest of ever so many thousand dollars from the College, it becomes necessary, in order to judge of the propriety of that choice of the deceased's will, to inquire what New Yale College makes the money—whether it is really an institution demanding and deserving public support—and whether another College, or Law School, endowed and improving its grounds will really yield good fruit.

As to the first point, a distinction must be drawn. No compliment has been made of the high honors of Yale—and of it. It has never been made apparent that Yale, like the English universities, is a place from whence poor men's sons are successfully carried to fame. On the contrary, the prevailing impression is that the fees charged at Yale are so moderate that the great classes can afford to have their sons there educated there if they are so inclined. If this be so, then evidently Yale needs no fresh aid. Still, no man ever admits that he has more than he wants; nor, indeed, if he be rightly minded, can he ever be oppressed by an overplus of money. There are thousands of persons by which money can be laid out by individuals, and by colleges also. If Yale creates a certain number of first scholarships on the principle of the last windfall, it will divide the first query we have put in its own favor.

The second and third are less easily disposed of. The question whether Yale and the other old-fashioned colleges of the United States are really entitled to the munificent bequests by aids of some contrivers. There are many conflicting answers to this country who believe that there are monstrous humbugs; pale copies of fossil universities in England, without the learning and the classic elegances which give a gloss to the serene absurdities of Oxford and Cambridge, without the goodfriendly influences of these institutions, without the best pretension to educate young men for the real work of life, without any use in the economy of life, in short, except as nurseries for pedants who earn an easy living in their academic shades. No doubt these opinions are excessive; no doubt the professors at Yale and Harvard mean well by their pupils, and have and there, no doubt, a young man under their tuition lays the seeds of future acquirements which will do honor to himself and credit to his country. But it must be confessed that the general experience of students does not tend to strengthen the public prejudice in favor of the educational system pursued at these institutions. It has been said of them with too much truth that, in the language of the old liturgy, they do those things which they ought not to do, and they leave undone the things which they ought to do. They teach our boys Greek which is of no account with the money-getters, and Latin, the differential calculus, and moral philosophy, which however useful to one pupil out of a hundred is worse than useless to the other ninety-nine. But they do not teach, as they should, the modern languages; they take little pains to make pupils aware of the fundamental facts of the great sciences, chemistry, botany, physics, mechanics, medicine, law; many of them may be said to ignore the practical concerns of life for the chair of grammar, prosody, and elocution. None of them—in a country where two out of every three men are traders—undertake to explain the great principles of commerce, as evolved from geography, history, economy, and vital statistics. In a word, many a graduate of an American first-class university finds, when he leaves college, that of all the great fund of knowledge he has spent so much time and labor to acquire not a jot is of any practical use to him in the life struggle, while of the knowledge he really needs he possesses not an inkling.

On this ground, then, some exception may be taken to our plans with regard to old-fashioned academic institutions. If it be true that these universities teach what is valueless and do not teach what is useful, they were better abolished, and any bequest which may tend to strengthen them is ill bestowed. Otherwise, on other grounds, cavil at the will in question seems unwarranted.

BUTTER AND EGGS.

[FROM OUR COUNTRY CONTRIBUTOR.]

WE country people are a good deal beholden to your clever men of the town for much of our wisdom's entertainment. For instance, lecturers.

And having listened to them overmuch lately, will you allow me to put down a hint or two, which (if they smoke) they may put in their pipes (otherwise in their pannels) for immediate use.

And first: they shouldn't crowd us too much with facts. Facts are good, but if not set off with some plaisterment of fancy (like a fact with olives or chipped onions) they don't digest well. There must be intervals of light and shade.

Again: wit mustn't be drawn too fine. A great many of the very best things I hear get no other, simply because they happen to be mixed with medicine of a table-talk among good fellows, and keen ones, and not in the somewhat thick and grave-suggested air of "public hall." For instance, the loudest laugh which I have heard in all the winter, and the most unaffected applause of the man in a certain lecturer's enumeration of the contents of a little American citizen's lunch of luncheon—pickles, and doughnuts, and what not!

The lecture was a good one, but surely its goodness did not lie there. Here was delicious fun, but no wit. Is drollery, then, better than wit? in certain places, yes.

Again: your lecturers must have, for our common-sense people, some clean, clear point to drive at. I have been entirely amused not a few times with prodigious whiffs and spurts of eloquence; but have come away, like old Izaak's land of luncheon—pickles, and doughnuts, and what not!

The lecture was a good one, but surely its goodness did not lie there. Here was drollery, but no wit. Is drollery, then, better than wit? in certain places, yes.

Again: your lecturers must have, for our common-sense people, some clean, clear point to drive at. I have been entirely amused not a few times with prodigious whiffs and spurts of eloquence; but have come away, like old Izaak's land of luncheon—pickles, and doughnuts, and what not!

Now, though we listen to such, and give it a stamp or two, we don't applaud it when we get outside. If the lecturers want to keep their hold, they must aim at the "business of the age." I don't tickle vanity so much, but it lasts.

Again: don't let a lecturer be disheartened if in one course after the next, he sees a child idling going out from the back benches. This is our town style, we go in going through the course, and not in article about you and your lecture for to-morrow's paper.

You can buy it in the morning for two cents—probably will. It is much in a city's worth.

He will probably say that you remind one of Thackeray, though one of his strongest men or of Emerson (if you are not he), though none of his depth; or of Beecher (if you are not that Agonistes), though none of his wit or exuberance.

Don't be frigety at this. If you say any thing worth hearing or answering, you will have given a little pedestal of your own, though, as the flatteries of French book-seller said to the woman with a head, "we must make it green."

Don't try and impose upon us by saying extraordinary things; we get them in the newspapers; besides which, don't we get, now and then, a hearing of the spirit-rappings, and don't we read such poems as Bryant's?

Again: don't let your political heats boil up in the spitter of lectures—we get enough of that in our town daily. Of course we cultivated people have more or less of the Black practicities—more or less (God willing) of the humanities. But when you tell us that all who don't think precisely as you think are dastards, and weak-kneed, and bungle-headed, and dough-faced, and drivelers, why (notice if we hear that periodically in the Weekly Sewer, edited by an all-fired smart fellow), we know better.

We know that Squire Rattop, for instance, our neighbor, who has pretty daughters, doesn't think as you think, or as the Scourer thinks; but yet he is an honest, kindly, God-fearing man—not altogether up to our measure in intelligence, perhaps—not entertaining all our progressive views about manifest destiny and a social millennium—possibly believing, in his old-fashioned way, that if a man commits murder he should hang for it—possibly taking snuff and meeting over his head and ears that we are going to cheer you?

No, no. We want you to be but a slow man—we do. But is he not our neighbor?

Sha'n't we have our kindness—butter and eggs—if he wants?

THE LOUNGER.

SEPOY MEWS.

THE Lounger is in Rahad, January 15, 1859.

MR. LOUNGER,—I had the honor of addressing you on the 13th inst. from Bareilly, shortly after the destruction of the Quarantine buildings, stating what I thought might be urged in palliation of the fearful measures of the night of the 1st of September.

For the rest of the year, as you know, we remained under martial law. Several hundreds of our fellow-citizens of New York, in coats and trowsers of various fashions, with various long muskets upon their shoulders, marched about, up and down, in the open space surrounding the Quarantine ground—slept in tents—mounted guard against the enemy—chewed the noxious weed, and in due time left their homes for the front, after which their deserted families and languishing business-men were relieved of the pressure of the times existing in different colors—and were in general of great service in keeping the Sepoy children quiet and in training for their future duties as citizens of Rahad.

This is what is called martial law: and the uniformly peaceful character of the people of Rahad during the autumn is, gubernatorially viewed, a state of insurrection.

There is now another movement in the game, to which I call your attention, and, through you, the attention of many of our fellow-citizens in all parts of the country who are inclined to think that we are a turbulent and foolish set of fellows.

The late and present Governors of the State have declared that Sitten Island is not a fit site for the Quarantine. The legislature of Rahad decided for its immediate removal. The Commissioners appointed under the act have reported in favor of erecting a safe quarantine establishment in the Lower Bay, while the Governor himself has indirectly declared against Sitten Island. The final action, of course, rests with the Legislature.

The new movement to which I allude has been already described in the Sewer Journal, with its wonted careful consideration. I can state it more plainly perhaps, and allow me to say that I consider it vivâ voce to denigrate the party opposed to any removal of the Quarantine.

The cry, which the Sewer has thus: South-Street, having proved by experience that it can prevent the establishment of a Board of Health, and consequently in favor of the Governor's intimation of a fresh treaty for that spot: and so seems to yield to the general wish for the legal protection for the removal of the pest.

The object of the Legislature empowers the Governor to treat for Sandy Hook, or to appoint a new Commission to provide for the removal of the Quarantine. It is there and there to suggest that the interests which has hitherto thwarted the interests of the Metropolis and the adjacent wishes of the people will cease to thwart it?

But the Legislature having authorized a Commission to provide for the removal, that Sitten Commission having reported a feasible plan justly objectionable as one, there is no question that the report plan should be adopted, and the necessary means provided to give it effect. All good citizens, all who love a city, all who love the city and the interest of trade, which is annually alarmed by the pestilence, will, I am confident, cheerfully accept the offered solution of the difficulty.

Surely the people of the State of New York are not willing that the Sewer, with the pecuniary interest of a few rich men, scores of their honest, hard-working citizens shall continue to fall by the death without due course of law. That is the simple question. Shall it be a question for a month longer? We have not forgotten those that this recited in the Declaration of Independence?

If our fellow-citizens think that the Quarantine question is only one of disagreeability or pecuniary interest to the people of Staten Island, they are greatly in mistake. It is one that shall remain perfectly quiet until South-Street thinks fit to consider its interests touched by the removal. But if they will only remember that to the neighborhood it is a question of life and death, they may understand why the citizens of Rahad, South-Street, and our indignation that a mortal pest should be made permanent in the midst of our homes.

With you say so to them, Mr. Lounger, in the name of the Sepoy,

Truly yours, RICHMOND CLAM.

SOBLESSE OBLIGE.

THE English Duke of Beaufort was lately playing "Lord Dundreary" in the theatre in England—a game, the point of which is to knock a pipe out of the mouth of a figure by throwing sticks at it—and the brother of a gentleman who was in the suicide having hit his Grace's shoulder, and the gentleman, for some reason (probably from not knowing that the Graceful shoulder had been hit), not having asked the Duke's pardon, that person instantly treats the equestrian gentleman in the light of his "Aunt Sally," and as a lawyer in the case expresses it, "brings his bludgeon" with will he tumbles off his nobble. Then the Ducal honor was appeased. But the gentleman brought the Duke into court, and the Duke used the gentleman for some kind of—as the London gentleman was cast in a farthing and the Duke in a hundred pounds. Thereupon the London Times remarks:

"The Duke of Beaufort's name should never have been dragged before the public in a contemptible racecourse squabble about 'Aunt Sally.' Noblesse oblige?"

Undoubtedly it does, and whom does it oblige and at whose peril? The logic of the Times is that it obliges whom upon the vulgar in regard to the behavior of the Noblesse. But the modern reading of that phrase is, that nobility obliges noble conduct, or at least courteous decency, and not a tremendous publicity. That a foolish young Englishman should get drunk, or frequent the society of race-horses and jockeys, or indulge himself in thimble-rig or "Aunt Sally," is a matter of no moment except to the young gentleman and his parents. But that a Duke of Beaufort should do these things is a matter of importance, because his name is not his own but belongs to his country. No more compelled the young man to good behavior. That is the way in which noblesse oblige; and the penalty is not a bushing up of the fact, but a wide publicity of it, to the end that the world may know that true nobility does not reside in names and families but in character.

If the Duke of Beaufort behaves foolishly in a contemptible race-course squabble about "Aunt Sally," his name should be dragged before the public as widely as possible, that other young gentlemen born to titles may understand in what way noblesse oblige.

BURNS'S SISTER AND SCOTT'S GREAT-GRANDSON.

WE are reminded that we have been bound by living links to famous men and times, by learning that the daughter of Dr. Johnson's friend, Mr. Thrale, lately died in Wales, and that, just as the world is sitting down to the love-feast in memory of the hundredth birthday of Robert Burns, the youngest sister, Mrs. Begg, dies—lately almost incessantly with the aged sister of Burns, the grandson and heir of great Walter Scott. Walter Scott, bearing the same name, died at the age of only a year and a half. One little girl alone now remains to represent the family name of the Author of Waverley.

It is remarkable that, while the reputation of the canny Scotch makes them shrewd, thrifty, and earnest, but not especially genial, the two most personally famous Scotchmen in literature are Burns and Scott, both Scotchmen. Shakespeare is the only Englishman of equal fame, and he was. We can hardly grasp the individual Shakespeare; but the strong human personality of Burns and Scott compels every reader to say, Here lies a hearty, kindly, sympathetic elder brothers.

EVENING PREACHING.

FOR the first time since its erection, Trinity Church was opened on the evening of the Feast of the Epiphany, and brilliantly illuminated and densely crowded for an appropriate religious service. The Rev. Dr. Dyer officiated, and a choir of Music is opened and crowded for the same purpose, and the National Theatre in Chatham Street.

These services are simultaneous with those in London, where St. Paul's Cathedral has been opened for evening service. And the object in both cases is the same. It is to gather the people who can not buy pews in costly churches—the bulk, the blind, and the failing, whom the giver of the feast sent his servants into the highways and byways to bring in, that his house might be filled.

But they don't come—and, of course, the preachers and the preaching may be earnest and humble, but there is a want of personal sympathy which must precede the solemn preaching of the Word, and no power can fetter and fix the attention that they will feel it is a genuine love-feast at which they are invited to seat themselves. The great many of the people for whom these services are ideally intended find that society does not care for them. They are ignored, neglected, disregarded, and dying. What is the probability that they will join the bright crowd that throngs to the Opera-house—or even that they will have social or code have for the asking, a regular seat in some regular church?

No: John Wesley's way was the simple, natural way, and its success shows its wisdom. If you would preach the gospel—not substances as well as in spirit—you must go to them, and not expect them to come to you. The Rev. Henry Methodist preaching in the fields that for the multitude as they have not been fed since the days of the New Testament story. Methodism would not have grown if it had been planted in St. Paul's or Westminster Abbey. We must go and find the widows and fatherless, showing them that we practically believe what we preach—and then the widows and fatherless will come to hear the Word, having already seen it made life.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—B. F. H., Baltimore, is respectfully declined.

—ELEANOR J., New Orleans, describes a great many of the modern poets when she says, speaking of an author who was the great poet: "But he seems to have a mania for killing folks. Reading his books is like going to visit a graveyard, except once in a while I stroll and study in the house; when conversation is very charming, but constantly interrupted at intervals by an invitation to go and look at the corpse."

Eleanor J. sends a poem, too long, but not without beauty. It begins

"I have two wives—one, angel; and one, woman
Each mother of an angel—happy me!
I have four daughters, two of whom are human,
And two of angels whom we left to see:
All! one, though poor in every worldly sense
Rich in the heart's best treasure, still will be
Whose will compare the stores we take not hence
To my source in the sky?"

—SEROV, in reply to our "very excellent and ingenious correspondent, Mr. C. P. Coupin of Louisiana," begs to say that the difference in the number of palings in the two fences described by him (Weekly, January 8), and under the conditions set forth in his so called "problem," will be, now whatever —The extremely problematical whether "Mr. Coupin" has ever heard of that most troublesome question to young arithmeticians, "If a barrel and a half costs a penny and a half, what will twelve herrings cost?"

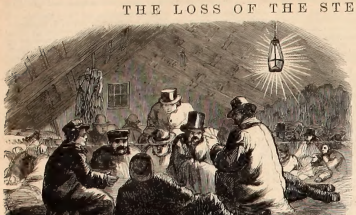
—Mr. A. New York, in answering the problem of Mr. Coupin, suggests that the same principle is involved in the question how much whisky shall can be mixed on a hilly acre of land than on an acre perfectly level, supposing both to be of the same quality of soil, and the same kind of seed to be planted in each.

The Lounger owes it to his correspondent in Louisiana to state that he has the start of his ingenious answerers, for the same note that contained the problem stated the solution. His therefore, possible that he may be able to answer both the herring puzzle and the agricultural problem.

—INDIAN thinks the Lounger wrong in his statement of the pronunciation of the name of Pic-colomini. He declares that

"Every Italian is pronounced will, if asked how the word in question is pronounced, give the very common and natural answer, Pee-ah-no-ah-no-ah-no

THE LOSS OF THE STEAMER "C. VANDERBILT."



THE PASSENGERS IN THE RELIEF HOUSE.

THE JOURNEY ACROSS THE ISLAND.

We herewith engrave four illustrations of the wreck of the C. Vanderbilt steamer, which, on her passage from New York to Stonington, on Monday, 3d of January, ran ashore on Fisher's Island, and is expected to prove a total loss. One of the passengers gave the following account of the disaster to the Herald:

"We left New York shortly after four o'clock P.M. on Monday last, with what might be called a fair prospect for good weather. A few hours subsequent, however, showed indications of a change, commencing with rain and a strong wind from the northeast. The wind increasing, and a snow-storm setting in, prevented our making any light beyond Saybrook. Steam was then at intervals shut off, and the lead hove, and our progress materially lessened, till our position was supposed to be nearly up with Bartlett's Reef Lights; but although our whistle was repeatedly blown, no response came from the Reef Light bell. Soundings being continued, showed that, from thirty fathoms, we were now in less than ten fathoms water. The anchor was then let go; but such was the force of the gale that it soon parted, and we shortly after brought up on the western extremity of Fisher's Island, within three hundred yards of Race Point, a much dreaded spot to Sound navigators in stormy weather. A hawser was at once sent ashore and made fast to a rock. Had we struck on the Point, not a doubt exists that the immediate loss of both boat and passengers would have ensued.

"The only apprehensions now felt was for her holding together, and each counted the minutes of the three hours' interval to daylight with intense anxiety. It came at last, and with it the cheering appearance of a house at the point of the reef, dimly seen through the driving storm.

"To send a man ashore was the work of a moment. He reported the building to be the Government relief house, within which was a stove. Wood was sent at once, a fire kindled, and then commenced the disembarking—beginning with the ladies and children, under the gentle care and supervision of the Captain.

"After frequent trips with the small boat all were placed ashore, no one sustaining as much as a scratch. This done, provisions, water, cooking utensils, mattresses, and blankets were liberally sent, and all made as comfortable as the crude nature of our accommodations would admit of.

"How were domiciled our seventy-one passengers, together with about twenty of the waiters and attendants of the boat, in a room 14 by 20 feet (with a cock-loft of corresponding size, only accessible by an upright ladder with one broken spoke), for one night and nearly two days.

"Night came, with its dreaded pall of dreariness and darkness. Lamps lighted, and arrangements for sleeping being concluded, hymns were sung, in which all joined with perfect unanimity, and never was 'Old Hundred' sung with more heartfelt earnestness than on that rock-bound beach, upon the night of January 4.

"A touching and beautiful prayer was offered up by Mr. Vincent Colyer, of New York, which was most gratefully appreciated by his fellow-passengers, and then the long night dragged its slow length along, the monotony being only broken by occasional admonitions concerning our fire, which had already once communicated to the roof.

"Day dawned at last, bringing picturesque emotions to all—for the storm king had abated his wrath.

"As we lassed from our shanty a casual observer would have set us down for a filibustering party, if not a band of brigands. Each man had round his shoulders a blanket, secured at the neck with bone made shepherd's pins, formed out of sticks; and thus apparelled, with the name of "C. Vanderbilt" encircling the back of each man, our appearance was ludicrous in the extreme.

"Our good Captain, however, had already started overland to West Harbor to charter a schooner for our conveyance to Stonington. This done, preparations were commenced for leaving. Two ox teams, with wagons, were sent by Captain Freese for the ladies and children, into which they were placed.

"Many gentlemen had already struck out for the schooner, the rest following with the ox teams. Arriving at the Mecca of all our hopes, we found our schooner aground at ebb tide. This unlooked-for calamity was balanced by finding two fishing smacks, into which we embarked, and ventured away for Stonington."

It is pleasant to know that no lives were lost, and that no one imputes the least blame to the captain or pilots of the ill-fated steamer.

PERILS OF TRAVEL IN INDIA.

MR. BESWELL, one of the artists of the London Illustrated News, has had some hair-breadth escapes in his recent tour through India. We give his account of them, together with the pictures illustrating the scene:

"I send you a sketch of an adventure which I met with while traveling by dawk. Before, however, I proceed to describe it, I will, with a view to render my narrative more intelligible to the English reader, make a few remarks upon dark-crowding when the horse-dark is not used; as the police gherry, or wheeled palanquin drawn by sentees a palanquin, or "palkee," as the word is here abbreviated: then see who carry it are called bearers, or palkee-wallas. A regular bearer-party consists of four to be near along the palkee with its occupant, the pose being about five miles an hour.

"As large parties of natives are kept constantly employed in repairing the main road, the line of which is called the Grand Trunk throughout the country, it is called the Grand Trunk Road. At some points, where the road is narrow, as on the dense jungles and hills, the trees have been thinned and cleared for a distance of a hundred yards on either side. In order to give travellers a chance of escape when attacked by tigers, the words in the neighborhood being infested with these animals. The tigers, however, being by the ravages committed by tigers in this portion of the Deccan road, were particularly among the herds and flocks of the jungle farmers; it had, however, never been my lot to meet with one of these deadly beasts, except on the occasion referred to, the circumstances connected with which I will now proceed to give to the reader.

"Arriving at the Topeekhole Dawk Bungalow about the evening of a certain day, I ordered my bearers, upon being the only refreshments, with a few exceptions, which I knew by former experience to be unfitted for food. The tea was supplied by myself, it being exceedingly fine flavored and of the best description, as I get them. This frugal repast being over, I lit my cigar and took my place in my palkee, and gave the word to start. The sun had not yet gone down on a recent fire a little distance from the bungalow, and I knew that I should reach the next dawk-bungalow before dark. At that station a fresh bearer would have been installed in the room of the old. This addition to the party I did not like, as the harsh being required to show the road, and also to be more sure of my safety from wild animals. I was also disposed to intrude their presence upon the passengers. I had no frequently passed over the road of the road without molestation that my thoughts were more occupied in memories of distant old England, than with the present, than in the dangers of the way, or the wild character of the country through which I was passing; and, having finished my smoke, I drew my light mat around me, as the evenings were chilly, and composed myself up as comfortably as circumstances allowed for a sleep. I always have a pistol in my possession, which I performed as well by night as by day, and I not unfrequently happens that several hours elapse between the time of this reflection that led my mind into a sort of dreamy pleasing speculation on the scenes and friends I had left in England, and how I should deal matters there some two years hence; except when these agreeable reflections were the monsieurs 'Ugh, ugh!' like, but of the hoarser, and like nothing effort of the animal. I was instantly roused to my dozing and then lively dressing, when suddenly, with electrical effect, I felt myself and palkee-party thrown violently to the ground. Then followed the most unearthly yells, and, among the din of these, I was able to clearly distinguish the words 'Marlo, sahib! marlo!' The meaning of these words I well knew to be 'Kill him, sahib! kill him!' was the full meaning. Aware of my great danger, I laid back one of the doors and looked out. I instantly beheld a large tiger, with his back to me, whose wounds preceded, and discovered that my bearers were in full flight toward the bungalow, and that the tiger was round with the utmost terror depicted in their countenances, while others were behind, urging on the tiger, and say where hat before them. I now hurried my head, with a feeling that came upon me, as well as on observation, and call to occasion all this bubbub and excitement. I was discovered. Almost at the moment that I was a small stone bright, spanning one of the innumerable little streams which intersect the road, and a large bramboad had sprung up several and partly in the arch: and from this perch of height, with much noise and with an animosity that was emerging. I felt at first undecided as to the particular course to take in this my present peculiar. Impulsively, however, I seized two large dooling pistols, which were my constant companions on my journey, and which I kept in two holster pipes, fixed conveniently in the front part of my palkee, and ready to hand for instant service. I had also a double-barreled fowling-piece lying under the cushion of the mattress, and this I remembered was also loaded; then hurriedly resolved I may be said that I had not much to fear had the tiger made an attack. But as it was, I apprehended that he had fallen suddenly would decide upon a different course. Slowly he ascended the bramboad, and, on reaching the position, his eye fixed intently upon me as I looked through the partly-opened door of the palkee, with my pistols and my fingers on the triggers. To my unspeakable relief he kept his course along the road, and, in a few minutes—with measured, even step—lowed a cover of bushes and trees on the left, and shook a long adieu to me.

"I gradually increased the distance between us I felt my breathing become easy, and the feeling of safety and heart more regular. I was now getting impatient for the arrival of my bearers, and myself at the bungalow, one of the pistols toward him, when, however, talking much me, my objections to his going on ceased, and I kept the noise would effect. Not so: he turned his head a little toward me, and, as I thought, with a look of fear, slowly moved away in the calm evening's end, as he slightly increased his pace, I began to think he was afraid. I began to regard of my safe to safety. Suddenly, however, I had not left well out of sight. The tigress from the grand their shouts of 'Marlo, sahib! marlo!'

"By this time I had well disappeared in the jungle, palkee returned to, and, to my great joy, I heard the bearers drawing nearer. I quickly put my eye and head leveled to the spot where I last saw the cause of the excited feelings of anguish to which I had been so recently and subjected.

"I considered it wise, under all the circumstances, to defer any controversy or practical arguments on the subject of the bearers' desertion in answering to my cries of danger; but intimated that, if they valued their lives, they would make all haste to the next station, about two miles ahead. They accordingly raised the palkee with a will, and with nervous but rapid steps marched a part of the road more open and free from low jungle."

His second adventure was in a journey by dawk from Calcutta to Benares, while suffering from a severe illness. He says:

"In a state of perfect helplessness from the debilitating effect of the fever, I arrived at the Dawk Bungalow, at Doomrie, about eleven o'clock P. M., where I hoped to get a warm cup of tea, which I had for the last two hours of my journey been longing for.

"After knocking at the door of the kitchen—a detached building some twenty yards in rear of the bungalow—for a considerable length of time, the sirdar, or head bearer, returned to the front and told me that he could not make no noise, and that it was his opinion that the two stationary servants had broken themselves for the night to the village, about a quarter of a mile distant.

"I told him to go and rouse them from their beds, and to take two of the bearers with him, leaving the rest with me, and that I would give them a rupee each when they returned. This they did, but with evident reluctance, and I became still more ill at ease, as strong, renegade-like odor, and the sniffing noises increased until I seemed surrounded by wild animals.

"I no longer to realize my position. Fastening the sliding doors, which were without bolts, and closing the windows in front, and discovered, to my great consternation, that the bearers, in addition to their other evidences of wealth, was beset by a pack of hyenas, wolves, and jackals. The fact was, I had no weapon of any kind, not stick in my hand, I might have cast the whole pack of cowardly brutes to the right about with a few well-directed pistol shots. The bearers, however, had left the setting portion required my utmost efforts, and to stand without contemptible cowardice. Besides, I had a fellow visitor seemed to be aware of, for their familiarities became more pressing. I had now finished my cup of tea, and now and then a concussion against the panels from the outside, accompanied by a scratching noise, convinced me that the rest showed that they were really in earnest. The night, notwithstanding the cold, was very dark and gloomy, the jackals amidst the howling of the jackals disappointed of their prey. An occasional knock with my feet against the door, to intimidate my four-footed visitors, the pack is renewed attempts to get at me; and I was beginning to feel that I was in a fix. Suddenly, however, recollected, a faint glimmer in the distance told me that near the bungalow. Upon this I opened the shutter of the monsoolies, who, with the whole party of bearers, presently came hurrying to the door. Upon threatening, by orders, been to enjoy a smoke in the village. As the light approached the animals retreated to a respectful distance. A brief, loud sort of long conclusion, during which I had not taken; and, though dismal enough, appealed to my ears as the most delightful music I had ever heard, which gave utterance to it. The next morning I reached it a civil station, where I obtained medical assistance and rest, which I badly needed, and in due course came on to Benares."

LITERARY

SYLVAN HOLT'S DAUGHTER is the title of Miss Meadow's (Helene Lee) new novel, published by Carter & Brothers. Like the former productions of her former stories, this one may be said to approach the works of Miss Bronté in many of its characteristics. It is written in the same style of the lady's creations. We say almost, with deference to the memory of the gifted author, that we prefer this to Jane Eyre for the female characters which the pen of the author has produced; but to speak frankly of the merits of the two books, we must say that we look has impressed us, we have not seen in the story of Jane Eyre the same high and consistent, well-studied and completed character than this of Margaret Holt. The story is a love story, the love of Percy Holt for his cousin Margaret, and the peculiarities of Margaret's disposition, growing out of her having been thrown by an accident by a misanthropic father, so that she has become rather Sylvan Holt's daughter than her own self.

She is loved by a young gentleman of her childhood, but she loves a man of the world when she meets him and who is not worthy of her love and her, after all, that is the question on which the story hangs. The incidents of the story are those of a quiet, domestic life, with nothing remarkable in anything forced, but much that will afford material for thought to the reader. We shall not say more about the material. Can a man love a wife when he is once loved another woman, who still lives, a man who is the husband of another woman, and yet his wife's bosom friend? With respect to the author we will say that we have nothing to object to, but he does love his wife, we don't believe that Colonel Fielding did care a straw for her in comparison with Margaret. Fielding was a villain, but he every one read the story—which is fascinating in its way—and see what they think of Fielding—and judge for herself. We say for herself, for we especially commend the book to ladies for their perusal.

WHAT WILL BE DO WITH IT? Why, of course, Percy; one will be done with it, and that is, publish. Whether he has read it in the Weekly or not. For it would be saying that is the greatest of novels, since we are of opinion that Mr. Lamar's has been written the greatest novel ever written, we may, nevertheless, say that it is the best novel of the early one novel in all the history of fiction. Harper & Brothers publish it in their Library of Select Novels, and also in covers. Readers of the Weekly will not expect from us an analysis of a story that has appeared in full in the columns of the Weekly.

PHILLIPS, SAMPSON, & Co., of Boston, publish OUR GRANDMA: a little book for little folks, from Mrs. Stowe's pen. Our Charlie seems to be a little folks of the same class as Mrs. Stowe's well-known series of stories that are now printed for other Charlies.

THOMAS & FIELDS have published Lectures and Addresses, on literary and social topics, by the late Rev. Frederick W. Robertson. We have before directed our readers' attention to the sermons of this eloquent and lamented clergyman. The volume before us shows him in another light, and not less favorably. Bold, frank, and practical, his mind seems to have had a grasp on general subjects no less than on those which he was trained to his theological labors. Whether talking about Parnel, Dickens, Wordsworth—however diverse are his themes—he was the same free-spoken, clear-thinking, and hearty man. No wonder they loved him so at Brighton, and so lamented him!

A. L. O. E. are initials that have become familiar to young persons on the title-pages of a large number of capital stories published by Carter & Brothers; and we have now two more of the series, forming Carter's Juvenile Library, EDDY ELLERSLIE and THE MINE. One of these we have read, and we find it a very readable story: and the other we take on trust, knowing that the initials are not likely to deceive our expectations.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE

POLITICAL

CONGRESS.

On Monday, 16th, in the Senate, after the presentation of petitions in favor of the Old Soldiers' Pension and the Homestead bills, the introduction of a bill abolishing the franking privilege, and a proposition to devote Friday and Saturday of each week to the consideration of private claims, the French Spoliation Bill was taken up. Mr. Bell addressed the Senate in favor of passage the bill, to which he was strongly opposed. The question was then put and the bill passed by a vote of 26 to 25. The bill for the relief of the widow and heirs of Major Heintzelman, officer for operations connected by the French grave by the 31st of July. The bill also passed, appropriating for the support of the Military Academy at West Point was then taken up. Messrs. Bigler, Bright, and Pugh, the only members and clerks of the House, brings mileage, Messrs. Bigler, Bright, Sugerman, Stuart, Pugh, Presidents, and ex-Vice-Presidents ex-Senators was then taken up. to be placed over the grave of a little child he had recently buried. Forthwith this worthy exemplar of Christianity spoke the Sheriff and instructed him to bury him in the street. That officer very properly remonstrated with such an barbarous and unchristian, but without avail. He was threatened with prosecution unless he performed this unpleasant duty, and the stone was accordingly carried and in the dead of night. There was no one mean enough to lift upon it but the coroner, and it was brought down to him on a wheelbarrow, and placed on the child, with the names of the parents, and their deceased offspring—for the poor man had buried two children, in an attitude of supplication. Above the stone was placed in the form of a cross. Above looked upon the stone and literally thanking that he who had done so base a thing against his fellow creature had no repose in this world or the next.

PERSONAL.

At the President's "Reception," on Tuesday evening, Dr. Blake presented the visitors to Miss Lane, who was stationed at the further end of the room. Among the number of Postmaster-General B'ayne's family was Miss Wickliffe, who was introduced to Miss Lane. A difficulty between Messrs. Wickliffe and Blayne, in relation to the latter's office, has been amicably adjusted. Mr. English expects to spend a few days in Washington next week among the many friends aforesaid as unwarranted by the circumstances.

The Rev. Theodore Parker has been granted leave of absence for a year, that he may recruit his health by removing ill-health compels him to seek a warmer climate, and he will visit the West Indies and Europe. His place is to be supplied, and his salary continued. He was attacked on Sunday by a severe hemorrhage.

We read in the Register, that Professor Agassiz was to have given one course of Medical and Zoological Lectures to the students of Harvard University, but that he has changed his mind, and will give two courses instead. The second course was announced on Friday evening. The Scapegoat was composed of the same materials as the Professor's speaking, ever composed in the city. There were gentlemen of wealth and influence, and men of letters, and Hard, Soft, mixed, young, old, neither young nor old, crude, cooked, antique, and modern. Even the editors of the Regular, People's, and Tammany Committees were represented with all the variety of their opinions. The Republicans between the shedding from Seward on, perhaps to the Constitutional Union men, and the Democrats, and forums to old-time comforts. The Scapegoat was to be sacrificed to the public weal, which hardly could be in these days full-natured enough to be satisfied with the sacrificial meeting, were like sagacity' rolls, few and far between. The Scapegoat was to be sacrificed to the public weal, and there was no danger to either. The State Senate and Assembly, Congress and the Senate, the Tombs and the Banks, all hob-nobbed together in the most harmonious manner. Mayor Wood was present, Governor Clark, Governor King, and distinguished Republicans and Americans, including Judge Daly, who seemed to be pitched out of the window as a vile insect, if not exactly check by jowl, and the Rev. Dr. Cheever, in the sanctuary, they were as kind and loving as kittens in the same basket.

A communication in the Boston Courier says that a gentleman of Boston has made an offer to the Corporation of Harvard University of $50,000 in gold, the income of which is to be used for the preservation and increase of Agassiz's collections in Natural History. The donor is here any part expended on a building or in salaries; and also reserves to himself the right to withdraw it, if at that provision is to order that the rest of the plan, which is absolutely essential, shall be carried out. The offer is renewed, say its carrier, from by others, perhaps by the donor.

General John A. Quitman, who died recently at his residence in Adams County, Mississippi, aged sixty-four years, was a native of Rockingham County, New York, and was by his own energy of manners, quiet demeanor, and gentlemanly deportment, was in front of Congress.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

SAFETY ON THE "MERSEY."

The new steamer Mersey, which sailed from Bremen for New York on the 4th of December, put into Queenstown, with her paddle-wheels disabled. Four of the buckets of the starboard wheel were broken. The engine-room was flooded, and after vigorous exertions on the part of those on board, the vessel was got up and the vessel succeeded in reaching Queenstown.

QUEEN VICTORIA AT OSBORNE.

Queen Victoria resides. In lieu of steps across the ice, each state is provided with a patent-leather boot. The Queen has a pair of these boots, and the Prince Consort the dog-cart, and the Princess Royal the sledge and ice. The state iron terminates in front in the appropriate and graceful form of a dog's head, and the rest is easily chosen. The cup that forms the receptacle for the boots is water-proof, and is made of the skin of a seal, or, if you please, of a walrus, and inside. The same design is embroidered in white silk on the back of the carriage, in which it forms a pleasing contrast. The size generally corresponds with that of the boots. Harness and whips mounted on them, 'tis said she looks exquisitely.

THE MANAGER OF THE "ADELPHI."

About five years ago, Mr. Mowbray Morris, manager of the London Times, engaged in the delicate employ of helping Mrs. Thomas William Capon to get rid of her husband, on the ground of incompatibility of temper. During relation between Mr. Morris and the ill-used lady is not known; moreover it is of no importance to the public. They were the necessary consequence of the refusals, but undoubtedly was the fact that Mrs. Capon was free from them an inference to the injury of either of the parties. Mr. Capon was a man of considerable literary attainments, and was the author of several dramatic pieces. Capon was in the course of time informed of their danger. He first had to wait upon Mr. Morris, but he was not walking with the new deceased Mrs. Morris. Mr. Capon brought his action against Mr. Morris for alienation of his wife's affections. Mr. Morris, and laid his case before the Court. Capon's case was lost, and Mr. Morris was to collect before the Court that there had been no collusion between Mr. Morris and the lady, and that the Court, upon his professional honor, that there had been none. So Mr. Capon's action was dismissed, Mr. Morris imprisoned three weeks, and put under bonds to keep the peace.

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR GOING TO MEDDLE WITH CENTRAL AMERICA.

The London Globe Paris correspondent gives this version:

I am able to state very confidently that the Court of the Tuileries, within the last two or three days, caused it to be officially intimated that it would feel itself compelled to consider the seizure of the steamer Cleopatra by the Honduranian police indicated in President Buchanan's Message, as not only upon the honor of the flag, but upon the utmost extent.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

M. DE MONTALEMBERT PARDONED AGAIN.

M. de Montalembert's case has gone before the Court of Appeal, and the three of the pleadings the judges received to deliberate. They remained in deliberation full two hours and a half, and then returned, headed by the president, M. Perret de Chezelles, delivered the judgment of the court, which reduced to three months, instead of six, the term of imprisonment to which the Count Falloux-court; maintained the three thousand francs fine but up the withdrawal of one of the counts in the indictment, completely fined M. de Montalembert from the effects of the law. The Count de Montalembert, under which, even after completing his punishment, he was liable to be sent to prison for a year, and fined in a sum to afterward the Emperor, in reserving his first decision, had the right to pardon the offender, and to remit the whole sentence. Such was the case with the Count de Montalembert. His Majesty also grants a pardon to M. Dupoty, editor of the Droit, and others.

MORPHY'S GAME WITH ANDERSSEN.

The Paris correspondent of the Times writes: "The great Chess encounter between Morphy and Andersen has drawn closed on Tuesday in favor of the American. The Prussian champion has lost the game by 7 to 5. The most contrary and good feeling reigned during the whole encounter, and the Parisian amateurs have given a most cordial welcome to the victor, which was shared by one of the other before commencing the game. It was played at the Café de la Regence, the historical rendezvous of which the English music on, and which centre a game was played by Philidor, Labourdonnais, and the Deschapelles not and agreed verbally that the winner of the first seven games should be declared victor. The first day should commence playing every day at twelve o'clock, and continue till six, with an hour's break (to serve all the preliminaries) and, as the result shows, it was found that the players were not at all too much disposed to this dose of Mathematics of Position, carry-ing on the game with the greatest spirit and vivacity. Mr. Morphy may now sit down and shut down at leisure, for he has won the victory fairly and honorably. The source of energy to him that he has not been able to silence the attacks of his opponent, but he has met all his onslaughts and re-enforcements; but the world will agree with us that Mr. Morphy has won the day by the combinations he is to be considered as Staunton's superior as long as he has not played a game with him. Mr. Staunton, when they Mr. Staunton, and give him a pawn and a move, but Mr. Morphy has not yet been asked to do so, and probably would accept such an offer. Mr. Morphy, however, is about to leave Paris for Spain, and it is not likely that he will offer, and he says it is doubtful that he is sure he can find time to play a match with Staunton.

HOW HABIO WAS MADE TO SING.

A Paris letter says: "The success of the opera of 'Pipe-dots' has been performed several times this week at the Théâtre Lyrique, and Habio, the tenor singing the Marie: but by to Sunday evening but a tenor of the name of Habio was announced. Habio, however, finding his respite diminishing, ordered Marie to be sent to him, and the latter, who is a very good-natured fellow, went to see his brother artist in his dressing-room. Habio immediately caused the obstinate tenor to be carried off to a neighboring café, and there, in spite of Marie, his hair neatly parted in the middle, declared, with more or less success, that he would sing. Habio, in the meantime, had sent to the Théâtre Lyrique to say that he would not sing. Marie's would-be successor, raised be comical, all the same, and, in spite of Habio's protestations, would kill the bewitching Marie; in short, the contract was signed, and Habio was obliged to sing, or be committed in a Christian land. This was very effectually done, and the tenor, who had been in the habit of this court being to exception, Habio was ordered to sing. He did so, and sang so well that he was re-engaged for the Théâtre Lyrique, and the opera of 'Pipe-dots' was saved. The injured Marie cried his tears, dragged his hat over his face, for there was a crowd in the room, and immediately set forth on the left side of his head the aforesaid bravery of Habio, and, in a moment, and resolved to sing. He sounded sang; he'd be ——— himself if he would!—that he would sing in spite of all the managers in the world. Leaving the classic Italian expression which was really employed, the manager, who had been Habio's friend, called the executioner Calcade. 'We shall see!' So a great deal was said, and in the end it was settled that Habio should throw a cloak on Sunday above on, as Marie's hotel, and Calcade should immediately engage him. Habio, however, was not to be found, and Calcade was furious. 'No! said he, and he said it so savagely, too, that the gentleman-like Habio was terrified somewhat, and did not venture to come back for full thirty minutes. He then announced his presence, and Calcade, who had been waiting to repeat the same question. Second refusal, second threat, and Habio was terrified somewhat, and, in the post four, dots, dots. Then at two, then at half past two, dots. Habio was in a state of consternation. He tortured time to the—pocket, he capitulated, and the engagement was signed. Habio was to sing, and Calcade fabulous dispatch. Before the rising of the curtain on Monday evening Habio was in a fever—but the part had been learned, and he sang it well. Habio was re-engaged for an instant that any thing had occurred to disturb his equanimity."

MARIO'S SALARY.

"This trial has let the public into the truth of one matter which has long been a subject of curiosity, but of which exists. The most absurd stories have been told, and the most absurd figures given. Mario, it is said, gets 1,000 francs a night, which is 40,000 francs a month, or 480,000 francs a year. One hundred and sixty-eight thousand pounds sterling! Why, between the Emperor of Russia and La Fontaine, four of France's most glorious sources, there is not that sum to be found. Mario is not the discoverer of steam. Four times as much as this counting-house of Rothschild's, and Rothschild's immense fortune was one, who governed France after the Revolution of July.

COOKERY TAUGHT IN BOARDING-SCHOOLS.

It is the fashion in France, as it is becoming in our not near fashion, in French Empire in the kitchen; and it is the fashion in France, as it is becoming in our benefactor of the human race—the life preserver; it not the life preserver, it is a good idea, a woman must be a good cook, a good artist, a good chemist. She must understand the nature of things, and the nature of the human head, and a little before her time. She must be a good cook, a good artist, a good chemist, and a good physiologist. Some boarding schools are young ladies, where they are taught to cook, and some schools are cooks, where before they are permitted to become wives. Pity we have not such schools in England. Many a husband, who is now when 'Miss' wishes to become 'Mrs' she first to examine the kitchen, and to ascertain if she can 'fry chicken,' 'mince,' 'mutton-chops,' 'roast beef,' or 'tinker' a bit. Many a husband, who is now a bachelor, and long-suffering has her work 'to do,' and it is pleasant to see the young ladies in their cooking dresses, with the cooked, setting them on the table, and then eating them. Many a husband, who is now a bachelor, but checks all reward and thanks, and is the best of all rewards, a good dinner, will be able to bet wait, but displaying, for all that, a handsome countenance and a good temper, and a good heart. In France, which may be that of a Baronne, or of some high-born lady, the whole family is taught to cook. Boarding schools is not taught, but it is only because there is little or nothing of good education in them. Cooking is not here being the order of the day, but the Misses are made to sew and knit in the old-fashioned way, and to sing every thing about them in order."

SHOP SKIRTS AND GIGOT SLEEVES.

"In society crinoline is disgraceful, and the corpses is greater than ever. The 'bustle,' however, is gone, and the hips are left natural, say, displayed, by having the skirt attached to the waist in very broad plaits. Sometimes, indeed, the skirts are gored at the waist, but the spreading effect is the same. Gigot sleeves are the ornament expansion which hides the waist, and hips of the dress. Of course, it is impossible to dress with any possible degree of taste unless the figure be in proper proportion. Those who are scattered more of beauty, buttons, flesh-bows, rocket of lace and ribbon, flagon, etc., etc., to that woman, below the waist, looks like an inverted pyramid, with various colored bow and ribbon's epiglottis all over her! The English gross, I see, in making desperate war upon this crinoline, as two or three bales of cook have been burned up to it; and the French have caught up the cry, and cried to it, because of a French lady of distinction that burned up at Paris—but the English—for Fashion just now has been taking on to the past, and now, more than ever, the confederation of the two countries is cemented. Gigot sleeves (that is the leg of mutton sleeves) have been introduced from England, and the French have taken to them with avidity. They are tight at the wrist, above the upper part of the arm, but not, mind, like the skirt at the hips, tight and large; and the sleeve is full, and loose, to cuffs to-go, the cuffs, or one thing else that is to say, the cuffs are similar to the sleeves, composed invariably of yards of lace puffing, as that woman, below the waist, can neither lift an arm nor stretch out a fist without danger of being loosed up. The gigot sleeves are worn with the 'bodice' of the dress of 'petting woman out' when on fire, and I have no idea that the Parisian ladies will long continue to wear the bodice (the petticoat) dresses, with exceedingly long, and voluminous trains. They are very inconvenient."

BEVERIDGE'S NEW OPERA, AND HOW HE RIDES IT.

"Dinorah' is the name of a new comic opera, by the illustrious Beveridge recently in production at the Opera Comique. The Parisians, who are incorrigible laughers at every thing, have nicknamed him 'the Lion among the weak points of the great composer.

The first night of the Opera Comique there is, they say, no less chest of formidable discussion. This is the first opera which has been produced since the death of these keys is carried by Meyerbeer; the other by Halévy. Beveridge has, therefore, to ride his opera between these men of 'discussion,' and has, in fact, made various sudden shift from Grace. Light quirks, aimed to the public, which, in spite of all its levity, can be as grave and a sight before the clock, with return to it upon any sign of a yawn. Then, when the public yawned, he was assailed to be. At most the company of the theatre was assembled—and the orchestra—and he gave them such particular pointing—himself before the rehearsal, and the public after the first night—that they were all delighted. After this necessary thing remains in the garment, and the public, which is the best of all critics, is pleased, and secretaries and the public, which is the best of all critics, is pleased, and secretaries and the public, which is the best of all critics, is pleased, and secretaries

THE PADRE OF MAZATLAN.

THE SEXTON OF MAZATLAN.

INCIDENTS OF TRAVEL ON THE TEHUANTEPEC ROUTE.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

[Second Article.]

SUMA, November, 1858.

FROM Tutahuicapa we made but one day's journey to Trinidad, eight leagues distant, where we arrived before night. We drove up to the Casa del Communidad as usual, and were welcomed by a dozen drunken natives and fifty dogs; the dozen drunken men were soon after joined by about twenty more, all in a beastly state of intoxication. Upon investigation I found that every man in the village was in the same state. Their excuse for getting drunk was that they had lost a fellow-townsman, and it was customary on such occasions to get up a "big drunk," as a testimonial of respect to their departed fellow citizens.

Our road now lay through groves of plantains, bananas, oranges, and sweet lemons—a fruit that I had never seen before, but which I found to be very palatable; they are perfect lemons, and very sweet. I procured some of the seed, which I intend to send to the States for the satisfaction of the curious. It had been decided, after a fruitless effort to follow the engineers' path, to turn into the mountains. By striking well to the south we would cross the head waters of all the large rivers in our path.

It appears that but few white men ever traveled the road indicated; it had never been surveyed nor explored, and consequently was an uncertainty. It was decided on, however, and B—— and Lenares proceeded to make a fresh bargain with the guide; but he had disappeared, carrying with him the two dollars we had given him on the performance of his office. We were sorely vexed, but there was no help for it. We engaged a fresh guide, and prepared to depart under his pilotage.

The word was given to mount, when B——, who had his foot in the stirrup, cried out to José to "take care of his mule;" while he, darting down the street, disappeared in a house near the Communidad. Judging from B——'s actions that something urgent was on hand, I followed at the top of my speed, and arrived in time to see B—— "shaking up" our identical renegade of a guide, who had pocketed his fee and then refused to comply with his agreement. The old villain was very profuse with his excuses, and answered that he had made a bargain to guide us to Algodonal; but we had changed the route, and were going to another place, therefore he concluded that we did not want his services any more, and had consequently retired to his house to enjoy his otium cum dignitate.

B—— was not to be cajoled; he demanded his dos pesos; the guide shook his head and prepared to argue the matter. B—— seized him, and, giving him a preemptory shake, declared that unless the money was refunded immediately he would shake his head off; and B——'s preemptory shake (which was terrific) had the desired effect. The guide's brother, who was present, turned down the blankets on the tambourine bed, and discovered our two identical dollars of small change that had been paid him the morning previous. B—— dropped the Indian, seized the money, and made his exit triumphantly from the house, declaring that he "never would allow these scambrels to cheat him any more—that if there was no law to be found that would bring them to justice, he would make a law that would answer all purposes."

The guide's family followed us to the door, filling the air with their expostulations and excuses, while the guide expressed his perfect willingness to show us to any town on the Isthmus; but having proved him to be a dishonest scoundrel, we dispensed with his services.

We hired a fresh guide and began our ascent of the mountains. At the bottom of the hill—the extreme limit of the "corporation"—stand three ancient-looking crosses, surmounting a large stone altar. These crosses are very common in this country, and are used as a sort of altar on which to deposit different articles of produce in the light of a sacrifice; for the natives, notwithstanding the introduction of Catholicism, are idolatrous to a degree.

The practice of polygamy is not tolerated here; but incest is of common occurrence. I have met several instances of the marriage of a brother and sister, and have seen one case of a father living with his own daughter. These things may sound strange to you, but they are not at all uncommon here.

From our camp ground on the top of the mountain we had a very wet and disagreeable time of it; it rained nearly without cessation for two days, in fact, until we arrived at the village of Ocotsocoro, by far the most interesting spot that I saw upon the journey. It is situated in a slope, on the summit of a tremendous mountain, up the sides of which we had been journeying for over two days. Three quarters of the year the place is enveloped with fog, and in the rainy season the cold is very intense. It contains some nine hundred inhabitants, every one of whom is troubled with some pulmonary complaint. Coughing and expectoration is quite the rage here, and no wonder! The natives here wear the same dress that they do in the valley—the thin white cotton shirt and pantaloons.

RELIGIOUS DANCE AT OCOTSOCONO.

We found a fire very acceptable. From the door of the Casa del Comunnidad you can look across the valley, which lies 3000 feet below you, to a corresponding mountain on the other side. The scenery is wild and grand to a degree beyond description. The vegetation partakes a little of the tropics. Plantains, bananas, and oranges grow here in spite of the cold.

The natives are all mountaineers, and carry a staff to help them up and down the tortuous paths of the mountains. A "Feast" was in operation when we arrived here (I believe that every day set aside as a holiday, or for religious observance, is called a "Feast-day." In the Mexican calendar there is one for every day in the year), and on Sunday I witnessed two very singular dances, morning and evening. In the morning eight men collected in front of the church, and executed a dance, which, from the singularity of the dress and dancers, completely took me by surprise; and it was enough to surprise any body, I think. The dancers were white shirts, Mexican pantaloons, bells around their ankles, castanets on their hands; while their faces were enveloped in hideous masks, carved of wood, and representing birds and beasts. They danced to the musical thumping of a drum and the loud blasts of a trumpet, which, from its size and shape, was identical with the instruments which were blown when Jericho's walls went down. I have endeavored to give you a representation of the principal figure in the dance. It was highly amusing, and furnished me with food for meditation all day.

In the afternoon, hearing the sound of the drum, I hastened to the church in the hopes of seeing the same sight, when, lo! the scene was changed. The dancers were, I presume, the same, but the dress was entirely changed. Now, they wore crowns of tinsel, surmounted by tall white feathers; bags of wool upon their heads, which looked like the wigs worn by the English judiciary; red jackets, trimmed with tufts of ribbons; and blue velvet pantaloons, trimmed with lace. (Where did they get these things?) In one hand they carried a red handkerchief; and in the other a symbol, representing products of some kind—sugar-cane, corn, cotton, etc. One, who appeared to be the leader, carried a large red flag (silk), while the one that danced opposite to him had a carved hobby-horse's head and body, such as is used by the clown in a circus on many occasions. He carried a knife and platter, and every few moments he would make a cut through the air with the knife, and then wipe it on the platter. It was altogether a singular affair, and looked very Mardigrassk. B—— and myself tried our best to find out the meaning of it, but could not succeed. All that we did discover was that the dance was a part of the religious festival.

We had some very dangerous places to go over; one, particularly, I will mention, which will give you some idea of the rest. Our path lay directly over the top of a very high mountain, one side of which was nearly perpendicular, and, of course, the trail must run on that side. I had not been obliged to dismount as yet, but when I got a glimpse of this place I was off in a twinkling, and so were the rest of the party. We were perfectly satisfied to lead our mules over this ground.

THE PADRE'S NIECE.

Our path was about a foot in width, and was cut in the side of the mountain. Down one side of the path you could look a sheer thousand feet without meeting any obstacle, until your eye rested upon the woodlands of the valley below, which crept up the side of the mountain until the ground became too steep to admit of support.

On the other side of the path you could look up fifty feet, and see nothing but a frowning ledge of rocks above you, up which the chamois would find it impossible to travel. As I said before, we led our mules around this point, and were extremely gratified to think that we had saved any of them; but the poor brutes seemed to realize the danger of making a false step, and passed over it bravely, and, with one exception, without trouble. One of them who occupied the middle of the line stopped mildway, and consequently stopped the rest behind him. He halted about a minute, during which we held our breath with anxiety. We dared not speak a word—not even a cheerful "gib up!"

After satisfying himself of the utter impossibility of battering his condition, he quietly walked around and commenced to crop the stunted grass as unconcerned as if he was on a level prairie.

When we reached Mazatlan we made a muster of our means, public and private, and found that we had just fifteen dollars among us. We had to make our way to San Luis Gonchicori. We bought provisions out of this sum, hired a guide, and prepared to start.

After breakfast, while the boys were packing up, I strolled over to the church, where I found another curiosity in church ornamentation. I attempted to enter the church, but was prevented by the sexton, who was so insulted that he could hardly stand. He attempted to apologize, and give me the reason why I could not enter. Not being able to understand him, and feeling somewhat disgusted with his company, I turned to go away, when he caught me by the arm, and rushing past in front of the procession, he pointed down the road, attempting, at the same time, to shed a genteel bow, but which was dog by the side of the church. The women each bore in their hands a small table candle, about which is placed a of a plantain leaf served for a shade to keep the wind from blowing it out. In the rear of the procession, on ground, the women approached it, and, kneeling down, kissed it. A small cross was erected, a little quantity of Castile soap was set on fire, the body placed in the grave, a few shovelfuls of earth was placed upon it, and the women, jumping into the grave, commenced to stamp it down, stopping every few moments to throw in a few more shovelfuls, which were stamped in in the same manner. I have since seen two natives with heavy crowbars stamping down the earth on a newly-filled grave. The women left the grave, and arranging themselves around the door of the church, placed their candles upon the steps and commenced a low, monotonous chant. When I returned to the house I found the boys in a high state of excitement. It seems that the guide had refused to perform his accustomed service in future. As we were poor, the Alcalde had been called in, and had commanded the refractory guide to depart with us; his recommendation consisted in snapping his fingers at the consequences, which in this country are rather severe. Julians who refuse to perform services are often refused employ. They are generally put in the stocks, and kept there long enough to consider their ways, when they can repeat the "misdemeanor." In the present instance, however, the Alcalde's chain did not avail at all law; during the journey upon the ground, he announced that he broke the contract, and that he would only go upon an increased consideration.

After some discussion Lenares, who, as I have mentioned before, is a boy of fifteen years, understands the Indian character pretty well, opened his pocket-book and took therefrom an old passport dated three years back, bearing the great seal of Mexico in red wax, unfolded it in a very pompous manner, and handing it up before the Alcalde, asked him if he observed that?

The Alcalde said that he did.

Quoth Lenares, "Read it."

The Alcalde excused himself by stating that that very important part of his education had been neglected (which Lenares knew).

"Then," said Lenares, "I'll read it to you. Listen!"

Whereat he commenced one of the most profound romances that I ever heard.

He commenced and read the document through—making it to be a general order from the Supreme Judge of Chihuahua to all the Alcaldes within his jurisdiction, commanding them to furnish the said Señor Lenares with such assistance as once he might need for the safe-conduct of his train, and for which the said Lenares was to pay the common market-price. I declare that I think to-day that this Lenares had the genius to succeed in this occasion), from curious ways of conducting business, and hardly any traveler goes without them; but we started in such a hurry that we forgot to obtain one. The Alcalde exclaimed that he had come down from the independent position that he had assumed and offered to go with us for a few days. Lenares went on to say that he should start immediately, and that if he met with loss or detention on the road he should look to the municipal officers at Mazatlan before the Judge and claim his damages. Then the Alcalde did weaken; rushed out, commanded a number of the crowd, he commanded him to go with us and show us the way. The boy picked up the money, and, before we were ready for a start two guides appeared with their walkers ready for our departure and escort.

It was now decided that four of us—I——, Lenares, Ysidal, and myself—should ride on mules, the best mules, saddle them, and start at daybreak with one of the guides, leaving the other to remain with the boys to look after the baggage (which would have provisions enough for three days), while we endeavored, by hard riding, to make San Juan Gichicovi in a day, from whence we would procure and send back provisions immediately to the boys and train. We carried the idea into execution. The next morning at daylight we were off, and, by not stopping more than a score moments, we succeeded in reaching San Juan Gechicovi by night fall. We had ridden sixty miles, and you may imagine whether we were sore or not.

San Juan Gechicovi is an inland town, and by far the largest in this section. It is said to contain some seven thousand inhabitants, and a curiosity, in the way of a church, said to have been commenced by Cortés. The legend respecting the church is somewhat profane, but is believed by all the natives in this section. It states that Cortés made a contract, or promise, with the long-tailed, eleven-footed Master of Darkness to build this church between the setting-in of one cock-crow, and the mornin ear was to have been mixed with the white of an egg (Cortés was only to have one egg or not dependent saith not). However, Cortés failed, only succeeding in getting it half up; and it is stated that nobody has had the temerity to attempt to finish what the great Cortés failed to accomplish—and there it stands in its present day black with damp, mould, and vegetation. As it stands now, it shows the genius of some masterbuilders. The walls are of immense thickness of masonry, while in front shows a perfect knowledge of architectural embellishment. Its proportions are grand, two hundred feet in length, and eighty feet in width. Its walls, as they start, are twenty feet in height and of the same thick. It is built of kilnburned brick, mixed with cobble-stones, and cemented with a mortar that shows the materials of the wet climate to destroy it.

The sacred images on the inside of the church are rather the worse for wear, and sit upon benches exposed to the weather. The inside of the church is filled with the tombstones of the dead, whenever the relatives of the deceased can raise the necessary funds (fifteen dollars) a stone is placed over the grave. The church-yard can be buried for the sum of one dollar.

The Alcalde, a Christian, was one of the Jon Bowers kind. At twelve o'clock every day he is too drunk to attend to any business. He is a gambler, keeps a monte-table at his own cane, and is always accompanied by his lieutenant and a staff of police. Long live the Alcalde of San Juan Gichicovi!

The dress of the female portion is somewhat different here, as they wear a short sack for a "basquina," and two or three yards of bleached cotton cloth wound around their waist and supported with a belt or sash, as they choose.

The young girls are very beautifully formed, and can be seen racing up and down the street like fawns.

There was a procession nearly every day, and the "Padre" (priest) was drunk every day, excepting no less than sixty dollars every time the church performances went out. Every day there is a charreada (horse-race and ugly; full of cranks and whims. His "sheep" think a great deal of him, and, when he is drunk, he generally is. A point beyond forbearance. He is a professed monte-player; and woe betide the unfortunate Julian that refuses him a game! He begs, begs to the Church party, and is inveterate against the Liberals. He is a Castilian, and rules his people with the iron arm of a despot. His house, however, is not the best in the village, but is a fine, well-informed, warm-hearted gentleman, and treated me in a manner—and that is a term in reconstructing the taking care of her pets—a monkey and a pheasant—and in studying English, which she is learning from a book—B. A. It is reported that she is to marry one of the Company's employés. Whoever he is I, for one, congratulate him.

Four days after our arrival the boys arrived with the train. They had a lively time with mules, who fell down a precipice and broke their necks; making, in all, eleven mules and two horses gone to the shades!—out of thirty, with which we started. The volumes were so fog gone as not to be able to obtain a price for transfer. We had occupied twenty-seven days on the trip, which was extraordinarily long. We had lost no money, but is a fine, well-informed, warm-hearted girl—monkey and a pheasant—and in studying English, which she is learning from a book—B. A. BY MARK LEMON.

PART I.

Our story may read like a fiction, but we are ready to make oath that there is more truth in it than is to be found in half the speeches made by Old Bailey barristers.

Jacob Sharp was more of a fool at forty than he ought to have been at twenty-five; which is saying a good deal. He was a soft-hearted man, and since five years old had been in love with some divinity or other; but being of a nervous temperament, with the potential vision of a large family and the work-house before his eyes, he had never dipped more than his feet into the troubled waters of love matrimonial, and then only to draw it back again. He could never make up his mind to take a plunge, and so, at forty, he had a museum of love letters and locks of hair, but was still without incumbrances.

Jacob had been jilted very early in life, and it had to do so. He had saved money, and was making money, and spent his days in the most personal enjoyments. His nephews and nieces began to show him great attention and respect, and seven small jiggles of sugar sprung up them on the subject of their respective expectations and the fastidious disposition of Jacob's "property." It almost suspect that some good-natured friend reported one of those mercenary squabbles to the primary cause of the discussion; and it was the conviction that completely he was looked upon as the great nestegg of the family which made him resolve to marry. When it became known that uncle Jacob, cousin Jacob, brother Jacob (according to the degree of consanguinity as he stood to the exspectant), was about to take to himself a wife, all sorts discoveries were forthcoming. A general council of war was held in Curzon Street, at the house of a married friend, when the most desperate details in the campaign of the meeting was adjourned to consider upon what grounds they should sue for justice in case Jacob took it all to a proceeding, and a certain row in the church when the betrothed couple were to be "asked" was the order of the day for the next meeting. The adjourned meeting never took place, as Mrs. Battery, for reasons all her own, chose to keep the intelligence to herself. When the invitations for the wedding-breakfast were received, no one of the astonished relatives would think of "accepting;" but a desire to see the bride and see spirited things to her—to have some Champagne drunk to her prosperity—ultimately prevailed, and a stranger to the real feelings of the party assembled in St. George's church would have thought that the man never chose upon a happier bridal.

Who was this Mrs. Battery? Where had Jacob met her? Who were her friends? On all these points Mrs. Sharp, née Battery, was as close as oysters, and, as for the eighteenth cousin, who was stoker on board a Gravesend steamer, and who had been taken notice of by the family until it was reported that he knew something of the first introduction of Jacob to his bride, was suddenly cut up. He boldly asserted (to use his own phraseology) that they tumbled over each other in love at first sight, and breaking the ice by offering the lady a bag of shrimps which he had carried on a hot summer's day from Billingsgate to Bow, Stratford, Jacob. However, the thing was done, Jacob had deceived his best friends and relations, and married a wife of whom he evidently thought herself worth the money. She was remarkably tall, high—too high—for a woman to be very pretty. Her complexion pink all over, gray piggy eyes, good teeth, and flexible tongue; Jacob was powerfully attracted from gratefeul, and this gave her a decided advantage over a lady who was under the standard (considered as to height) for feminine beauty and glory. Jacob was very proud of his wife long after their honeymoon was over; and, although he thought her parading her at all the public places to which he could obtain access, dressed in the costliest manner of the greatest order, that many a sudden light of uncertain age reglected in silence the calicoes or muslins of which they had consisted on their days the anxiety advances of little Jacob Sharp. However much Mrs. S. was envied by the single ladies of her acquaintance, there were few who possessed his blessing without any such feelings being entertained by the married ones. Jacob had no illusions of a most unchristlike nature were freely indulged in by many. It was hinted by some that Mrs. Jacob Sharp had been under only a dormer, and had drummed himself to death to avoid the tremendous expense of his wife's confinement that Mrs. Sharp's complexion was the result of a cosmetic taken freely many times a day, and particularly at the dinner table; but it was agreed that Jacob would soon "find it out," and what were they to do? Nothing, of course. One thing was certain: at the end of the year Jacob was losing form. His purple nose assumed a deeper hue, his general vitality a wrinkle his graceful and sleeping figure, exhibited several lines; his eyes seemed to "bag" in a manner, and his face, hitherto as round, hard, and smooth as a globe, now appeared impressible and eyptish of furrows. Jacob was in doubt of it. Jacob had survived a white sergeant, who was somewhat his senior, and had seen seven children born; and twelve months' domestic drill brought the one rank and file over whom she exercised undisputed sway to a state of discipline that rendered him less independent than an automaton. If Mrs. Sharp wished to go out, Jacob put on his hat and overcoat in a moment, tightened his umbrella mechanically, and stood on the door-mat with one arm akimbo, waiting to discharge his duty as a husband, thoroughly henpecked and obedient to orders. If Mrs. Sharp wished to stay at home, Jacob would have built to turn out to reconnoitre for invitations, and if none could be procured he would write to his friends to make up a little party at home. Although contrary, we believe, to the notice of whist, Mrs. Sharp would frequently take a hand at her partner; and the point was generally conceded, as the motive was known to proceed from no desire to obtain an unfair advantage over her adversaries, but to have a scape-goat for her own bad play, and an outlet for her mortification when the luck went against her.

"Jacob gone at whist!—that relare of middleaged ladies and gentlemen—was a thing unknown whenever Jacob and his wife were players. Sometimes Jacob looked like a martyr at the stake, but he was always playing wrong; and although Mrs. Sharp respected the rules of the game sufficiently not to reprove him in words, no one who saw the tide of Paradise in her turban erect itself like the crest of a cockatoo, and beheld the pink face deepen into maroon, could fail to understand the power of the reproof which was making Jacob's toes tingle in their pumps under the table.

At the finish of the rubber, when liberty of speech was permissible, it made the blood curdle or iced be the veins according to the temperament of the listener) to hear the whipping poor Jacob invariably received had the play gone against them. Mrs. Sharp declared that he ought to be shot, and every card he had not, and more especially those which ruled her own game, he was severely reproached Jacob became more depressed; and those who remembered the merry little bachelor of two or three years ago were startled at certain signs of age in the shoulders as they buttoned their coats in the hall, and quietly asked one another, "I wonder what Poor Jacob! There was no doubt of what the "it" was conjured, and for which it was foretold he would be sorry.

Mrs. Sharp was the embodiment of that demonstrative, persevering, and self-reliant style of face in our household; and, as all women are who assume to govern where they should obey, the cause of attack and defence was frequently changed.

Year after year passed on, and Jacob, with a long-dog look, and dull, drab, and slipt, and moved about at the bidding of his wife, whose tod temper became worse, growing with what it fed upon, and increase in volume with its nourishment—till the pink face was blotted and lined with vermilion, and the eyes were inflamed and sunk deeper. Even those relatives whose castle-building had come to an unpalatable end by Jacob's marriage sympathized with him. He would often meet a friend or another, endeavor to draw their afflicted friend from home by a quiet dinner at a chop-house, as the Dragon who guarded him never lost sight of him if she could help it.

Years and years more passed under this domestic tyranny lost for a blessing which had been bought into his house by it. Jacob had no child to assist upon this fefore, feeling reluctant to name one so good and innocent as Ellen Battery when narrating the defects of his wife, it will be impossible for the look into her sweet face, so fair and angel-like, and not love her. Jacob's brother was like much a likeness could have sprung from such a stem. It was Ellen, and she only, who seemed to evoke any response from the heart of her aunt's violent mother but toward her Mr. Sharp, even when most irritable by stress greatness, was tender and affectionate and loving. To Jacob the child was an adoration, and he stole away to the chamber set apart for her when she was absent, and prayed that he would be better disciplined—whenever he could, and scented to inspire him with a more humble and proper sense of endurance from the society of his little stepdaughter.

God bempers the wind to the shorn lamb; and so it was with Jacob, who, though stripped to the skin—his, poor fellow! played by Mrs. Sharp—was burning tongue of the mother—found the love created in his heart by the innocent child was enough to keep him from absolute despair. Ellen was the large residuum for the little creature who had come to sacrifice all for his tenderness.

Ellen was two years old when her mother married Jacob, and she had lost all recollection of her own father. Her infant mind had received any definite impression of his existence. Her natural elegance of manner and beauty of form and feature greatly favored her mother's representations of the position and character of her former husband, although it was not necessary after the abandonment by all his relatives and friends. That, however, was another matter. The child Ellen was eleven years old a sickness came upon her, so long and heavy that it was thought she would have died. The doctors ought were not permitted to obtain their sister then. A residence for some months in the south of France was considered necessary for her perfect recovery; and Jacob, with a heavy heart and strange forebodings of some coming evil, left London with the child and her mother.

The departure of Ellen was productive of the worst effects upon her mother. The child was evidently a check upon the grosser inclinations of Mrs. Sharp; but, now that the unknown influence was removed, and there was no protection, the home became the abode of ripe riot and uncontrolled, unbridled violence and unbounded license.

Half maddened by this state of things, he was seated alone one December afternoon close upon the ashes, almost in the dark. Recalling the time when he might have looked around in vain to find a happier man—when he revealed his heart to no man by sounds of the frantic dancing and singing of a wretched Bacchante overhead—then a woman, half intoxicated, came down the staircase and desired to speak alone with him. There was something unusual in the tone of Jacob's voice, and of any relief from his own thoughts, the woman was told to enter. As she closed the door behind her, she approached him with a confidential air of assurance, and, drawing a chair close to his, seated herself at the ceiling and smiled.

"At her old tricks," she murmured; and not waiting to be asked, seated herself close to Jacob, and, with a familiarity that was insulting, took woman's comfort and remark to rise from his chair.

"Don't go, Mrs. Sharp—please don't. There is short with me, and what I have to say must be said quickly. Are you tired of her?" pointing to the ceiling significantly.

Jacob started, as well he might, at such an inquiry, so abruptly made.

"I don't understand you," he replied, after a pause.

"And yet I thought I spoke plain enough," said the woman. "Are you tired of the one we hear singing and raving above us? Would you be free from her—legally free from her?"

Jacob rose up and grasped the arm of the speaker, his eyes dilated, and his mouth agape.

"You don't answer me; but I fancy you have time for a little reflection now," continued the woman, as the noise of something heavy falling upon the floor above satisfied both Jacob and his visitor that Mrs. Sharp's revels were at an end until sleep had restored her to something like consciousness.

"Now listen to me, Mr. Sharp. If I can not you free from the wretched and terrible life you are leading, will you pay me fifty pounds?"

Jacob bowed his head in assent.

"I will take that as your promise, and trust to it. When you married Mrs. Rattery you believed she was a widow—the father of an infant, I think, abroad?"

"Yes," said Jacob; it was all he could say, with his parched tongue and heaving bosom.

"You asked for no certificates, but took all for granted?" said her questioner, sharply.

"I did."

"And were deceived, duped, made a fool by the most artful and heartless creature that ever bore the name of woman?"

Jacob nod ed again; but now there was hope in his face.

"Her husband was a color-sergeant in the—th, but deserted, only on her account, for before he married her he was one of the noblest and bravest soldiers in the service. What she had been nobody knows, but poor dear Rattery married her."

"A sergeant!" gasped out Jacob, "and died! Where?"

"He's not dead," replied the woman; "and that information is worth fifty pounds, I take it."

"Five hundred!" Jacob would have said, but something like an ugly sneer upon the woman's face choked him.

"Daniel Rattery is living," continued the woman, to give Jacob time to recover himself, "and that woman knows it. It has cost her pounds upon pounds to keep the secret from you; but there was one she could not bribe—there was one!" and she struck herself upon the breast as she spoke. "Can you prove all I say, you have said, and did?"

Jacob, as soon as he could speak.

"There are the proofs," replied the woman, placing a bundle of papers on the table, "copies of originals which I have at home. She won't dispute the truth of them, for she knows I can transcho each other. In a few minutes, as we have said, the doctor returned with the child, and Jacob gazed at her in silence with scarcely power to stretch forth his arms to invite her to his embrace. Ellen looked at him for a few moments, as though doubting her right to approach; but when poor Jacob gasped out "Come to me!" the tears streaming down his face and dripping upon his black satin waistcoat, she sprang into his arms and clung about his neck, kissing his moist cheeks and mingling her own tears with his, both sobbing aloud, until Mr. Layton was compelled to leave the room for great vigor to avoid keeping them company.

Yes, there she was again, sitting on the dear stumpy knee which recently formed a resting-place for even her slender figure, while the fingers of her dear old friend played among her hair and patted her pale cheeks. Oh! how pale to what they were once on a time when she lived with that dear old fairy Mistress Polloney, alias Jacob Sharp, who felt at that moment how impossible it would be ever to part with her again, even though he had to bear with daily visits from the wicked mother who had made him so wretched.

But they could not sit there for more than an hour, crying and fondling each other until the advent of Christmas Day, and the clock told it would soon be there; so, drying each other's eyes and smoothing each other's hair, they yielded to Mr. Layton's request, and joined once more the group at the dining-room. Jacob turned his fingers again and again in his endeavors to obtain a hold; and succeeding at last, thrust the prize, blazing as it was, into the laughing mouth of his little pet.

Hark! the prison clock is striking the first beat of midnight. On it goes until the new day is born, and a merry chorus of happy voices is giving welcome to another Christmas. Where is Mr. Layton? Unperceived, he has gone away in obedience to a summons from the dreary prison, and is now sitting by a bedside, holding the clammy hand of a dying woman, who is blessing him with her eyes for the good tidings he has brought her, and which has assured her that the only one her depraved nature had loved was safe with him who would be a guide, a counsellor, and father all his life-long.

Our tale is ended, for the after years of Ellen's life were passed in peace beside the hearth of Jacob Sharp, who never failed to celebrate the anniversary of their reunion with a game of SNAPDRAGON.

OUR NEW MINISTER TO SPAIN.

COLONEL WILLIAM PRESTON, the new United States Minister to Spain, was born in Kentucky, in the year 1816. He was the son of Major William Preston, and belongs to a family which embraces among its members William C. Preston, of South Carolina, Vice-President John C. Breckinridge, Secretary Floyd, and other statesmen of eminence in our national politics. His mother, a Virginian lady, bearing the maiden name of Hancock, was a sister of Mrs. Clarke, wife of the Western explorer, who became acquainted with her on his return from the celebrated expedition commonly known as the Expedition of Lewis and Clarke.

Colonel Preston was educated for the bar at the Dane Law School, in Cambridge, Massachusetts; and after graduating there, formed a partnership for the practice of his profession with the Hon. William J. Graves, in Louisville; continuing his devotion to law until his entrance on political life. As a lawyer he was highly successful, and the ability and eloquence which he displayed in one noted trial—on the application of Miss Sally Ward for divorce from her husband, Mr. T. Bigelow Lawrence—gave him a wide and very extensive legal reputation.

At the breaking out of the Mexican War two regiments were raised in Kentucky, one of which was commanded by John C. Breckinridge, and the other by Mr. Preston, who received the title of Lieutenant-Colonel; and served with distinction, under General Scott, until the end of the war.

At the conclusion of the treaty of peace between Mexico and the United States Colonel Preston once more found himself invested into political life. He was elected on the same ticket with the Hon. James Guthrie, late Secretary of the Treasury, one of the members from Louisville, to the Convention called for the purpose of adopting a new Constitution for the State of Kentucky. After serving in that Convention Colonel Preston was elected a member of the Kentucky Legislature from the city of Louisville; and was subsequently returned to the State Senate.

In the Presidential struggle of 1852 Colonel Preston supported General Scott, with whose cause he was identified as much by long and close friendship as by an agreement of political principles. It may be remembered here as a mark of strong personal regard for that distinguished military chieftain was more effectively manifested a year or two afterward, in his efforts, as a member of Congress, to procure for him the rank of brevet Lieutenant-General which, with the unusual pay accompanying it, constituted a memorable and substantial proof of national gratitude and appreciation.

In 1852 Colonel Preston was also placed on the Scott ticket as an elector for the State at large, and embarked warmly in the canvass. Afterward, being nominated for Congress, he was elected in his district the same year by an unprecedented majority.

In Congress Mr. Preston proved himself a zealous and efficient representative, aiming rather at practical usefulness and the dispatch of public business than at display; and contributing much, by his liberal hospitality and the genial amenity of his manners, to the attractions of Washington society. During the two sessions in which he resided at the Federal Capital his hospitable mansion—the same house that had been so long occupied by Daniel Webster—was the scene of many brilliant social gatherings, where men of every shade of political opinion enjoyed a generous Kentucky welcome, and delighted to forget the animosities of Congressional strife.

The introduction of the Kansas-Nebraska Bill, which dissolved the Whig party, threw Colonel Preston (who had been an early and constant advocate of the measure) into the ranks of the Democracy, and he was soon after elected by a decisive majority to the Thirty-fourth Congress. In this Congress he was placed at the head of the Committee on Military Affairs, and was also appointed a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. In the former capacity he was the author of the bill for the increase of the army, which was passed by the House, but failed in the Senate. In the latter he was the author of the bill for the purchase of Cuba, which was also passed by the House, but failed in the Senate. In the Thirty-fifth Congress Mr. Preston was again returned to the House of Representatives, and was appointed chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which position he held during the whole session. He was also a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and was the author of the bill for the increase of the army, which was

At these words Waife understands all, and he has not an argument in reply; and he suffers Sophy to lead him toward the house. Yes, they will go hence—yes, there shall be no schemes of marriage! They had nearly reached the door when the door itself opened violently, and a man rushing forth caught Sophy in his arms, and kissed her forehead, her cheek, with a heartiness that it is well Lionel did not witness! Speechless and breathless with resentment, Sophy struggled, all in vain, from the embrace of the man by the collar, swung him away with a "How dare you, Sir?" that was quite worthy from the hillock's commanded Sir Isaac at full gallop from the lake—cursed Fairthorn back in her humiliation—and Mrs. Morley from her couch—and, smiting the ears of Lionel and Darrell, hurried them forward to the scene, to the spot from which that thunder-roll had pealed.

"How dare I?" said the man, resettling the flow of his disordered coat—"How dare I kiss my own niece?—even my sister's grandchild? Venerable Bandit. I have a much better right than you have. Oh my dear injured Sophy, to think that I was ashamed of your sweet cotton print—to think that to your pretty face I have been giving name and fortune—when you are wandering over the world—child of the sister of whose beauty I was so proud—of her for whom, alas in vain, I painted Watteau and Greuzes upon screens and fans! Again he clasped her to his breast; and Waife, his head stood mute, and Sophy passive—for the man's tears were raining upon her face, and washed away every black lie. Name to her! Was she hallowed.

"But where is my old friend William Loseby?—where is Wily?" said another voice, as a tall thin personage stepped out from the hall, and looked good-humoredly down in the face.

"Alban Morley!" faltered Wraie: "you are but little changed!"

The Colonel looked again, and in the elderly, tame, one-eyed, sandy-looking man, recognized the wild, jovial Wily, who had tamed the most unruly fillies, taken the highest leaps, and raced forth the blithest song—madcap, good fellow, frolicsome, childlike darling of gay and grave, young and old.

"Eben, Isgucci, Postume, Postume, Lobster!"

said the Colonel, insensibly imbibing one of those Horatian particles that were ever haunting in the classic memories of—his Darrell medicinal, to Fairthorn mutter.

"Years slide away, Wily, merely in skin thickness and wrinkle," when friend meets with friend after absence, each sees the print of their cares on the face of the other. But we are not too old yet, Wily, for many a meet—at the fireside! Nothing else in our power, we can only mount our cobbies; and through-bed hobbies contrive to be in at the death! But you are waiting to learn by what title and name this strange lass claim to so peerless a niece. Know then—Ah, here comes Darrell—Darrell, who has already had my will welcome the grandchild of Sidney Braithwaite, and Fairthorn should be a gentleman of as good blood as any in the land.

"None better," cried Fairthorn, who has wiled himself into the group; "I claim as kin to the Braithwaite genealogy, Sir, in your father's great work upon 'Monumental Brasses.'"

"Permit me to conclude, Mr. Fairthorn," resumed the Colonel; "Monumental Brasses are painful subjects. Know then, Wily, that this fair creature, whom Lady Montfort might well desire to adopt, is the daughter of Arthur Branthwaite, by marriage with the sister of Frank Vance, whose name I shrewdly suspect matters will prize, and whose worth you have not heard, when many a long genealogy, all blazoned in azure and or, will have left not a scrap for the scutcheon."

"Ah!" murmured Lionel, "was it not, Sophy, who taught me to love your mother's name? Do you not remember how, as we bent over his volume, he seemed to tremble at our own feelings?—so dear was nearer together? He was speaking to us from his grave."

Sophy made no answer; her face was hidden on the breast of the old man, to whom she still clung closer and closer.

"Is it so? Is it certain? Is there no doubt that she is the child of these honored parents?" asked Wafe, tremulously.

"None," answered Alban "we bring with us proofs that will clear up all my story."

The old man bowed his head over Sophy's fair locks for a moment; then raised it, serene and dignified: "Yet am mine for a moment yet, Sophy," said he.

"Yours as ever—more fondly, gratefully than ever," cried Sophy.

"There is but one man to whom I can willingly yield you. Lord Charles Hillingdon is not my treasure."

"I consent to that," cried Vance, "though I am put aside like a Remorseless Baron. And, Isoudo mio, if Frank Vance is a miser, so much the better for his niece."

"But," faltered Lionel.

Oh, father not. Cast into those eyes; read that blush now! She looks coy, not reluctant. The bonds before him—adorned as for love, by all her native graces—far sooner than those of her bloom. No more the Gutlaw-Child of Ingram-Hall, but the Starry Daughter of POETRY AND ART! Lo, where they glide away under the leafless, melancholy trees. Leaders and melancholy! No! Verdure and blossom and the smile of spring are upon every bough.

"I suppose," said Alban, "it will not now break Lionel's heart to learn that not an hour before I left London I heard from a friend at the Horse Guards that it has been resolved to substitute the ——— regiment for Lionel's; and it will be for some time yet, I suspect, that he must submit to be inglorionsly happy. Come this way, George; a word in your ear." And Alban, drawing his nephew aside, told him of Jasper's state, and of Arabella's request. "Not a word to-day on these mournful topics to poor Wily. To-day let nothing add to his pain to have lost a grandchild, or dim his remembrance in the happiness and security his Sophy gains in that loss. But to-morrow you will open the matter to him. Tell him that I will propose to father for the worst. I made a point of seeing Lord Ivor last night. He goes hence in a week. He compares him to a mountain, not nearly shattered by an earthquake, but burned out by its own inward fires."

"A few weeks only," sighed George, "will, alas, that unnatural calm last. I feel it has been an existence in the sight of God. To that old man I owe the power of speech to pray, to exhort, and to comfort; he was training us to guard by the death-bed of his son!"

"You know," said the Son of the World, "in the efficacy of a death-bed repentance, I have always been classed till the power of sinning be gone?"

"I believe," replied the Preacher, "that in death there is no power to sin, and that it is a death-bed repentance; I believe that on the death-bed it can not be made to repent!"

Alban looked thoughtful, and George turned to rejoin Wafe, to whom Vance was narrating the discovery of the miniature portrait of Mrs. Thorn, as he listened, drew his tiste from his pocket, and began to examine the miniature with an delicate music what he never could have set into words for his blundering, untunable tongue.

The Colonel and Darrell, and Alban and Wily, to fall more fully the story which Vance is repeating to Wafe.

Brief as it can, be the explanation due to the reader.

Vance's sister had died in child-birth. The poor young poet, unfitted to cope with penury, and to sensitive to endure it, and to whom nature could feebly resist the strain of exhausting emotions, disappointed in fame, despairing of fortune, dependent upon the kind but thriftless brother, and harassed by petty debts in a foreign land, had not been fast enough to secure before an affliction to which all the rest seemed as naught. With that affliction he broke down at once, and died a few days after the birth, leaving an infant not a week old. A French female nurse, of some skill in her profession, and making a provincial tour, was lodging in the same house as the young couple. She had just compassionately heard that the poor Englishman had prudence or very strict principle with the tithes which the young gossip must pay over the light, sparkling, false one. She had assisted the young couple, in their later days, with advice and kindly offices, and had attended at the birth of the infant—the death of the mother; and had therefore some claim to be heard as one who would take care of his child, until she could safely convey it to his wife's relations; while she wept over the dead, and with a woman's quick regard such a charge as a burden.

The singer—whose name Mrs. Vance of the death of her daughter and son-in-law, and the birth of the infant whom she undertook nearly to carry to England, "Sophy," by name, whom, meanwhile, she took to herself, got hold of her affectionately, and made quite her own. Children which makes so remarkable and almost uniform a characteristic of French women (if themselves childless) that it is a wonder that the nation class that separates them from the ordinary household of their children—as the very heart of women till womanhood itself be dead, the singer clung to the orphan little one to whom the sin of the mother seemed almost desires of a mother. She could not bear to part with it; she resolved to adopt it as her own. The knowledge of Mrs. Vance's circumstances—the idea that the orphan, to herself a blessing, would be an unwelcome encumbrance to her relations—removed every scruple from a mind unaccustomed to offer obligations and to stand in way of an impulse. She wrote word to Mrs. Vance that the child was dead. She trusted that her letter would be without doubt, and hence, to relations so poor, and who could have no suspicion of the truth, no cause for inquiry. Her trust was well founded. Mrs. Vance and the boy Frank, whose full confidence and gratitude the singer already secured by her correspondent for her kind offices to the young parents, accepted, without a demur or a question, the news that the infant was no more. The singer moved on to the next town at which she was professionally engaged. The letter announcing brought up by hand, became ailing. The medical attendant was a compassionate and natural food, and found, in a village close by, the nurse to whom, a little time before, Jasper Loseby had given his child to carry to Mrs. Vance's door; the nurse then removed to Paris, to resume with the singer, and with a handsome and lucrative appointment at one of the metropolitan theatres. In less than two years the singer herself died a victim to the climate which, while she had lived without thought of the morrow, her debts succeeded her creditors, and her property to the nurse, who had meanwhile become a widow, came for advice and refuge to her sister, the wife of Gabrielle Jacquard, a peasant by birth, a boy, looked into the statement which, by way of confession, the singer had drawn up, and signed, in a notary's presence, before she died; looked into the letters from Mrs. Vance, and the school-boy scrawls from Frank, both to the singer and to the child's parents, which the actress had carefully preserved; convinced herself of the poverty and obscurity of the lady to whom the infant was sent by her kin; and said to Jasper, who was just dissipating the fortune handed over to him as survivor of his wife and child, "There is what, if well managed, may contain your hold on a rich father-in-law, when all else has failed. You have but to say that this infant is his grandchild; the nurse we can easily bribe, or persuade to confirm the tale. I, whom he already knows as that respectable baroness, your Matilda's friend, can give to the story some probable touches. Besides, children man must rejoice to think that a child he left to die. The infant was a remarkably pretty; her face will plead for her. His heart will have the less need to quarrel with a step more rigorous in his investigations. Take the infant. Doubtless in your own country you can find one to nurse it at little or no expense, and in the time come for appeal to your father-in-law, when we have made all the preparations."

Jasper assented with the innocent docility by which he always acknowledged Gabrielle's superior intellect. He saw the sense: it was true that she had nothing to gain by taking the child to English relations so poor. They might refuse to believe her, and certainly could not reward. To rid herself of the infant, and obtain the means to return to her native village with a few hundred francs in her purse, there was no promise she was not ready to make. As to money she was too honest to tell, no paper she was too timid to sign. Jasper was going to London on some mysterious affair of his own. He took away—chiseled on Arabella's—the render known the child. Gabrielle's compassionate nurse, left to her care by the dying singer, drew his fate from his pocket, and looked upon the miniature with such an delicate music what he never could have set into words for his blundering, untunable tongue.

In less than two years the singer herself died a victim to the climate which, while she had lived without thought of the morrow; known its first happy dreams. But a few yards beyond was cross-threatened demesnes, on through those shadowy, serried groves, and she should steal, unperceived, in view of the house, the beloved lake—perhaps even once more catch a passing glimpse of the owner. She resolved, she glided on, came she pained the beech-grove, when, by the abrupt wind of the books, Darrell and Alban came suddenly on the very spot. The flutter of her robe, as she turned to retreat, caught the lover's eye; the sound of her footsteps was still why intent, conceived on pretends with what was doubtless acte-par absurd the moment, that unscrupulous acte-par absurd the words that drained her footsteps and then stung her on to self-disclosure. Trembling and blushing, she now stood before the startled man —he, startled out of every other sentiment and feeling than that of ineffable, exquisite delight to be once more in her presence; while after her first passionate outbursts, hastening on, in confused, broken words, to explain that she was there but by accident—by chance; confusion growing deeper and deeper—how explain the motive that had prompted her steps to the spot?

Suddenly from the opposite bank came the music of the magic flute, and her voice was suddenly stopped and failed her.

"Again — again," said Darrell, dreamily. "The same music! the same air! and this the same place on which we two stood together when I first dared to say I love!" Lucia, how can I order the very tree! Look, there is the date I carved on the bark when every word was new to you! Do you not remember something still?"

"Ay," he said with melancholy bitterness, "you deceive no longer now! You own that, when here we stood last, and exchanged our truth, you in the blossom, and I in the hope, of life—you own that it was no woman's love, deaf to all calumny, proof to all craft that could wrong the absent, no woman's love that was in the heart, undying as the soul, that you pledged me then."

Darrell, it was not—though then I thought it was."

"Ay, ay," he continued with a smile, ev if of triumph in his own pangs, "no liar truth in confessed as to the last. And when, some days you wrote to me the letter I returned, rent in fragments, to your hand—or when, forgiving my suspicion and fierce reproaches, you spoke to me so gently yonder, a few weeks since, in these lonely shades, was that woman's or not sentiments, your motives? Were they not those of a long-suppressed and kind remorse?—of a charity akin to which built hopes for the poor, boon happiness to suffering?—some memories of gratitude—some perhaps of childish affection?—all amiable, all generous, all steeped in that sweetness of nature to which I unconsciously owe the greatest debt in the regard I confess to losing you; but do not tell me that even then you were under the influence of woman's love."

"Darrell, I was not."

"You are not, and you suffer me to see you again! Triller and cruel one, is it but to crush the sense of your unsinnimidating power to deceive?"

"Alas, Darrell! alas! why am I here?—why so yearning, yet so afraid to come? Why did my heart fail when these trees rose in sight against it's joy? —why—why—why—I dream hither by the spell I could not resist? Alas, Darrell, but I am a woman nerves—and this is—" She lowered her head and trembled away; he lips could not utter the word, because the word was in reply, not remorse; but remembrance, not even affection; and the woman loved now too well to subject to the hazard of rejection—a last!

"Stay, oh stay!" cried Darrell. "Oh that I could dare to ask you to complete the sentence! I know—I know by the mysterious sympathy of my own soul, that you could never have been what you are—this to—" His lips falter too; but her hand is clasped in his; her bend is reclined upon his breast; her veil is withdrawn from the sweet downcast face; and softly on her ear steal the murmured words: "Again and again I love you—Oh, by this hallowing kiss, again—the Caroline of old!"

Fuller and fuller, spreading, wave after wave, throughout the air, till it seem interfused and commingled with the leaves and with the listened breathe, the flute's mellow gush streams along. The sun slopes in peace toward the west; not a cloud in those skies, clearer since the storm, but bough stripped of leaves, and rendering more vivid the everygreen of the arbute and laurel.

Lionel and Sophy are now seated on you moss-grown trunk; on either side the old greybirched man, so forgetting for a while to watch, forget each other, that they may make his feel how fondly he is remembered. Sophy has placed both her hands on the old man's shoulder, looking into his face, and murmuring in his ear with voice like the sound of a happy dove. Lionel, not, Sophy: As it happy too—he, who never thinks of himself. Look—the playful smile round his arch lips; look—now he is showing off Sir Isaac to Vance; with mutton solemnity the dog goes through his tricks; and Vance, with hand stroking his chin, is moralizing on all that might have befallen had he not come upon three pounds to that famous INVENTORY.

Behind that group, absorbed in their Thurstree, stands the FRASCHER, thoughtful and grave, forescing the grief that must come to the old man with the morrow, when he will learn that a guilty son nears his end, and will hasten to close their Casper's last days with pardon. But the Frascher looks not down to the deathcouch alone; on and high over death looks the Preacher! By what words heavenly mercy may lend to his lips shall he steal away, yet in time, to the soul of the dying, and justify murmurs of hope to the close of a life so dark with the shades of its past? And to him, to the Preacher, they who surround him look for consolation, and in their freshness of sorrow! He the old man? Nay to him there will be comfort. He says: Heaven's kindness had tempered to trials; and, alas! for that son, what could father hope more than a death free from shame, and a chance yet vouchsafed for repentance? But she, the grim, iron-grey woman? The Frascher's interest, I know, will soon centre on her:—And balm may yet fall on the wounds, thou poor, grim, iron-gray, lonely woman!

Lo! that traitor, the Flute-player, over whom all the deep grateful shade from the eaves of the roof-tree reprieved; though unconscious as yet of that happy change in the fate of his life, which, ere long, may complete (and haply for sons sprung in truth from the blood of the Darrell) with a union of the two families, that ends nobler far, the plan of a grand life imperfect—though as yet the musician not knowing or comprehending that his own unbroken treason to Sophy so little deserves; yet, as if by those finer perceptions of sense, impressions are they happen, by changes of pleasure and of pain, which Art so mysteriously gives to the dreamer from which nature is born, his airs, of themselves, float in joy: Like a bird at the coming of spring; it is plumage that makes him melodious.

And Alban Morley, seemingly intent upon the sketch which his amiable niece-in-law submits to his critical taste ere she ventures to show to Sir Vance, but with eyes under his brows toward the grove, out from which, towering over all its dark brethren, soon to fall by Lionel's beech-tree, and which he is saying, "Ten to one that the old House of Vipont now weather the Crisis; and a thousand to one that I shall at last my arm-chair at the hearth of my schoolfriend, Guy Darrell!"

And the lake is as smooth as glass; and the swans, hearkening the music, rest still, with white breasts against the dark of the margin; and the doe, where she stands, her fore-feet in the water, her head wistfully, with ears, trills disturbed, and wondering soft eyes that are missing the master. Now full on the beechtree the sunset glow, and the gold of that the gloomy beech-grove into the golden sunlight—they come, they come—Max and the Helepants, the latter refreshed—two souls reunited. Be it evermore! Amen.

WHITE.

White to play and win.

SOLUTION TO PROBLEM XI.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. Q Kt B 6	P to R S Queens (a)
2. Q to B 4 ch	K to K 4
3. Kt to B 7 checkmate

(a) If " P to Q S Queens," White plays 2. R takes P ch.

If " K takes P ch," 2. Kt takes B ch.

If " Kt to B 4," 2. R to K B 3 ch.

If " B to Q 4," 2. Q to Q 6 ch.

If " B takes P ch," 2. R takes B. In either case checkmating on the third move; and in any other event the Knight gives mate on the second.

SOLUTION TO PROBLEM XII.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. P to K 4 (ch)	K to Q 2 (a)
2. Q takes B (ch)	K takes Q
3. B to K B 3 ch	K to Q 3
4. P to K 5 ch	K to Q 2
5. P takes K P checkmate

(a) Should he take Pawn with King, White plays—2. R to Kt 6 (ch). 2. Q to Q 4 (ch); 4. Q to K R (ch); and on the fifth move gives checkmate with either Queen or Bishop. Rook's move leaves, throughout, forced.

PAUL MORPHY ABROAD.

Mr. Paul Morphy, the youthful champion of American chess play, has at length fulfilled his destiny as knight-errant and representative of his vis-d'Amande conferers. In the superintendence of the renowned player, Herr Anderssen, of Breslau, winner of the first prize at the great European Tournament of 1851, and Herr Löwenthal, of Pesth, Mr. M. has accomplished all that his best friends could have hoped, he has resulted in the victory over the one that his friends here have the full right to look for his early return.

We hear with regret that Mr. Morphy has expressed a determination to play, ere long, twenty simultaneous games, without sight of board or men. His intention is also, we believe, to somewhat increase the odds, and chance yet vouchsafed for repentance? But she, the grim, iron-grey woman? The Frascher's interest, I know, will soon centre on her:—And balm may yet fall on the wounds, thou poor, grim, iron-gray, lonely woman!

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY

NEW YORK, Saturday, Jan. 15, 1859.

The Wholesale Produce Markets have improved decidedly for the leading kinds of Breadstuffs, which have arrived sparingly, while they have been in active request for home use and on speculation. Cotton has been in good and a steady demand. Provisions have been in good demand, closing with an advancing tendency. Groceries and Teas, the latter entirely confined for at home use, and Coffee has been freely offered and purchased at rather easier rates. Hides, Naval Stores, Linseed Oil, Spices, and Whisky have been more sought after, and have advanced. Tallow, Hay, Hops, Rosin, Wool, Leather, and Metals have been lightly dealt in. Tobacco and Wool have been in pretty active demand, the strong symptoms of revival are noticeable in the Dry Goods line. Stocks are ample and the prices of Cotton are making their appearance in considerable amounts. Sterling exchange is dull and heavy, and the Bank Statement is ready also as gloomy. Bankers, expecting a very good Spring trade, are not unwilling to accept the rates offered for money. The value of the week's imports of Dry Goods here was $2,778,977 against $1,672,849 the same week last year. The imports since January 1 have been $3,458,136, against $1,503,404 same period last year. The movements in other commodities have not been prejudicial of any remarkable changes. ... Horrid.—ASPIRING YOUTH (to his Sister). "Now, girls, they want me to join the New Highland Regiment; will my calves do for the kilt?"

Married for Money.—The Honeymoon.—THE FAIR BRIDE.—"Now then, darling, put away your paper, and we'll have a nice long walk, and then come back to tea in our own little cottage, and be as happy as two little birds." THE BRIDEGROOM (aside) "Oh! bother!"

The Lovers' Quarrel.—FREDERICK. "But I assure you, dearest——"
EMILY. "Oh! nonsense, Frederick! don't tell me! I judge by deeds, not words, and I am sure you can not really love me, or you never would have given that horrid Miss Clapperton the wing of the chicken, and me the leg. Besides, you handed the strawberries first to Flora Giggles, and you know how I hate her!"

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.

EXTRACT FROM THE RECORDS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1857, by JOHN I. BROWN & SON, Chemists, Boston, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the Dist. of Mass.

☞ COUGHS.—The great and sudden changes of our climate are fruitful sources of Pulmonary and Bronchial affections. Experience having proved that simple remedies often act speedily and certainly when taken in the early stage of disease, recourse should at once be had to "Brown's Bronchial Troches," or Lozenges, let the Cough or Irritation of the Throat be ever so slight, as by this precaution a more serious attack may be effectually warded off.

Brown's Bronchial Troches,
☞ Cures Cough, Cold, Hoarseness, and Influenza. Cures any Irritation or Soreness of the Throat. Relieves the Hacking Cough in Consumption. Relieves Bronchitis, Asthma, and Catarrh. Clears and gives strength to the voice of SINGERS. Indispensable to PUBLIC SPEAKERS.

Brown's Bronchial Troches.
☞ [From Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, who has used Troches for years.] "I have never changed my mind respecting them from the first, except to think yet better of that which I knew to be among the best of all, my lecturing years. I put Troches into my carpet bag, when I start, and feel as much at home, when I find that to be first in or for as I have had an opportunity of comparison, your Troches are pre-eminently the best, and the first, of the great Lozenge School."

Brown's Bronchial Troches.
[From Rev. E. H. Chapin, D.D., New York.] "I consider your Lozenges an excellent article for their purpose, and recommend their use to Public Speakers."

Brown's Bronchial Troches.
[From Rev. C. S. Gardner, Principal of the Rutgers's Female Institute, New York.] "I have been afflicted with Bronchitis during the past winter, and found no relief until I found your Troches."

Brown's Bronchial Troches.
INCREDIBLE SOUND.—"Brown's Bronchial Troches are a valuable specific for administering, in combination, several medicinal substances, held as general axioms, among physicians, in the treatment of Bronchial affections."—Dr. G. F. Hopkins, Boston.

Brown's Bronchial Troches.
☞ For children laboring from Cough, Whooping Cough, or Hoarseness, are particularly adapted, on account of their soothing and demulcent properties. Assisting expectoration, and promoting an accumulation of phlegm.

REV. J. W. CUMMINGS, D.D.

UNTIL within the last few years the Catholic Church in this country had no distinctive organization. Its bishops, and even its ministers, were foreigners, sent here as missionaries from other lands to provide for the spiritual wants of the community.

But the rapid increase, from emigration and other sources, of those professing the Catholic faith—more particularly in the State of New York—gave rise to the necessity of remodeling and totally changing the system hitherto in force. Various modifications were adopted; and eventually Pius IX., in elevating New York to the dignity of a metropolitan see, proclaimed that the era of missionary dependence had ceased—that the Church was henceforth to march without leading-strings, relying upon its own resources and vitality; though still owning allegiance to Rome; but in this and similar respects on an equality with the other churches which, throughout the world, constitute the great body of the Catholic unity. To this end it was sought to recruit the sacred office of the ministry from among our American youth; and so wise and politic an effort was not long in being crowned with an unexpected measure of success.

Dr. Cummings is a representative man of this class. It is to such men as he that Rome must look for the permanent establishment, on a basis of national religious feeling, of her influence in the United States. So long ago as the early part of 1783, in the very heat and enthusiasm of Revolutionary patriotism, Dr. Cummings's family, who came from the North of Ireland, settled in the neighborhood now known as the District of Columbia, near the very spot where the City of Washington at present stands. Captain Worthy Stephenson, his maternal grand-uncle, was one of the initiatory founders of the city; his position and influence as the time causing him to be chosen Grand Marshal of the ceremonies on the day when General Washington laid the corner-stone of the Capitol. Captain Stephenson enjoyed the warm friendship and esteem of that great, good man; and all who knew him, either in his public or private relations, are said to have entertained for him the greatest affection and respect. He married Miss Triplet, of Virginia—his only child, who died in the Mediterranean, at an early age, being a lieutenant in the United States Navy. Dr. Cummings's mother was left by Captain Stephenson sole heiress to his large fortune, and numerous lawsuits were the ultimate consequence.

These, combined with the lady's conversion to Catholicism, which occurred very shortly afterward, caused much estrangement among the older members of the family, and the early years of Dr. Cummings, who was born in Washington City, District of Columbia, April 5, 1824, were thus necessarily passed almost entirely within the restricted limits of his mother's immediate sphere, to which fortuitous circumstance may, no doubt, be ascribed those habits of philosophical introspection and reflective study which have mainly contributed to develop the peculiar cast of intellect and purpose—a peculiarity that may be termed "progressive concentration"—for which the subject of our article is so preeminently distinguished. It is this that so thoroughly identifies him with the spirit of his age and country—that enables him to exercise an irresistible power over all with whom he happens to be brought in contact, either in the pursuits of his clerical function or in the walks of everyday social intercourse—and that, at no very distant period, must demand his elevation to offices of the highest trust and dignity in the service of his Church.

The preliminaries of domestic education over, at an early age, and a preparatory course of training, first in New York, and subsequently at a college near Nyack, on the Hudson River, having been accomplished, Dr. Cummings was sent to Rome—there to be fitted, under the auspices of the Propaganda, for the great work of the ministry to which his future life was destined to be devoted.

The College of the Propaganda is one of the most sumptuous and interesting of the countless religious institutions of the Eternal City. Within its walls are educated youths from all quarters of the world, every race finding there its representative. The voice of the tawny Chinese, of the stunted Laplander, the jetty Nubian, the fair Anglo-Saxon, the swarthy Hindoo, and the South Sea Islander may be heard in its marble saloons, on the feast of Pentecost, each telling the blessings of Christian civilization in his own tongue. Here are they prepared for the effective and faithful discharge of their future duty; and year by year, from its sculptured portals, they go forth with hopeful souls and dauntless hearts, to impart to their benighted brethren the tenets of that faith that they have received, many never to return; for often their earthly reward is the crown of martyrdom—their last work in this world a baptism of the faith they teach in their own blood.

The late Pope Gregory was fond of inviting parties of three youths to visit him at the palace of the Quirinal, where, hiding in the orange-groves and alleys of the garden, they awaited the approach of the Holy Father, as these occasions always accompanied by the Cardinal Mezzofanti, known as the most accomplished linguist of his time. At a preconcerted signal the youths would rush from their hiding-places and address the polyglot Cardinal, each in his own language—the Cardinal's ears and readiness in answering every one correctly and fluently being a source of never-failing enjoyment to the venerable Pontiff.

It was here that Dr. Cummings laid up that store of theological and practical erudition for which he is now so universally distinguished. His polemical abilities and powers of rhetoric have attracted attention from many learned controversialists and eloquent divines of both hemispheres. His lingual accomplishments are quite extensive; and, at the same time, he has not neglected the mastery of those lighter attainments which so charmingly relieve the tendency to bigotry and asceticism too often produced by exclusive application to the profound sciences. At the end of a residence of fourteen years, Dr. Cummings left the Propaganda College, having received the highest honor that could be bestowed upon a favorite pupil; and in 1847 he returned to his native country, with weapons polished and armor girded on, ready at all points to occupy a front rank in that great fight for the faith of which he was a soldier. He was stationed at St. Patrick's Cathedral, in Mulberry Street, from thence removed to a school-house, which he had built on Twenty-seventh Street and Madison Avenue, and afterward erected St. Stephen's Church, in Twenty-eighth Street, on the summit of the elevated spot known to old New-Yorkers as "Rose-hill Financiering."

This is his present post of ministerial duty, and it is here that crowds assemble to listen to the powerful reasoning, the eloquent appeals, and impressive teachings of his sermons. Whether at the altar, endowed with all his priestly functions; in the pulpit, laboring to guide the religious sentiment of his hearers; or as the pastor, tending to his flock with pious exhortation and the consolations of his creed, he is, every where and at all times, equally popular, looked-up to, and beloved. Even among members of other denominations his simplicity of manners and gentlemanlike amiability of bearing render him a general favorite, and opponents in argumentative discussion are compelled to acknowledge that the strength of his positions is only equaled by the persistent courtesy with which he maintains them.

Dr. Cummings is also well known as an attractive lecturer, more particularly by his discourse on slavery, which was extensively copied and commented on by the press throughout the country. He has also written many essays on various subjects for the better class of newspapers, magazines, and reviews, and is, we believe, at present engaged on Appleton's "New American Cyclopædia," in reviving subjects of Catholic interest that have to appear therein, to which responsible duty he was especially appointed by Archbishop Hughes.

An accomplished musician, Dr. Cummings has given much of his attention toward the improvement of ecclesiastical music, and in some of the churches of our city can the sublime harmonies of the Catholic ritual be heard to so much advantage as in that over which he presides. Mademoiselle Piccolomini and all the great opera-singers are regular attendants at Dr. Cummings's during their stay in the city. He surrounds the services of the altar with all the pomp and dignified ceremonial which his Church knows as well how to employ, and which is one of the most effectual weapons in maintaining an influence over her worshipers. Among the congregation who attend upon Dr. Cummings's ministry may be found the élite of Catholic fellow-citizens, as in fact, St. Stephen's is the Catholic Grace Church of New York.

In this connection it occurs to us to notice the great accessions of strength which the Catholic Church has of late years received from the new medium of con-fer, at the opponents of that religion would say, pot's vertus. Dr. Brownson, for instance, is perhaps one of the ablest champions of her doctrines and dogmas; Bishop Ives too; and, in England, Dr. Newman (probably the acute metaphysician and learned a man as that country can at present produce), Dr. Manning, Archdeacon Wilberforce, Mr. Lucas, and many others too numerous to mention. Dr. Cummings can scarcely be considered as Hall's a convert, yet he was only prevented from being brought up within the pale of Protestantism by the circumstance of his mother renouncing that creed at a time when he was too young as to be unable to direct the course of his future religious impressions and tendencies.

A FROST SONG.

TO THE TUNE OF A PAIR OF SKATES.

Drawn each step through the buskin tightly,
Blocks resolved to the dapper heel—
Away! on the iron skates so lightly
One scarce may the slippery surface feel!
Aha! for the wind, our gliding scorning,
With a joyous rush through the wholesome breeze,
Of which none yonder can form a notion,
Shivering under the snow-plumed trees.
Twittering, glittering—shod as with light,
Away! on our chirruping swallow flight.

With sudden twist on the back-turn flashing,
True to the metal as it governs,
Thrilling the mane of a throng oft clashing,
Curve we some name in elastic curves—
Some dear name cut on the granite waters
With the rapid gleam of a grinding edge,
Taking for one of Earth's rosy daughters,
A lover's knot as our Gordian pledge.
Twittering, glittering—shod as with light,
Away! on our chirruping swallow flight.

Driven by a force that like fury lashes,
As though we were charging with pike or lance,
Swift—right and left—in alternate dashes,
Then but together straight on we glance.
Till drifting by as in whirlwind eddy
We deftly skim round the Danger post,
We're slackening our pace, being merry ready
To halt, upon greeting hosts, by rote.
Twittering, glittering—shod as with light,
Away! on our chirruping swallow flight.

THE JURY SYSTEM.

AT the very time this journal was expressing its opinion upon the intrinsic merits of the jury system, events were occurring in England which most conclusively proved its worthlessness. In a case tried before Lord Chief-Justice Cockburn, in which the question at issue was whether a railroad company had been negligent or not, the plaintiff being a passenger who had been injured by a railroad accident, the Court charged the jury that the Company had been either negligent or not: if it had, it was liable for the full extent of the plaintiff's damage; if it had not, it was wholly blameless. On this charge the jury brought in a verdict for the plaintiff, with one farthing damages. This absurd verdict Lord Campbell very reasonably, but clearly illegally, refused to receive, and the jury were discharged.

Upon this the London press reason after their kind: some impugning the Chief-Justice; others abusing the jury; not one questioning the soundness of the jury system. Yet what so clear as this the verdict in this case proves the folly of the method?

It can never be too often repeated that the reason method of trial by jury was adopted at a period when the Crown or supreme authority was a party to almost every suit. At the period from which trial by jury dates the chief business of Courts was the decision of cases of forfeiture, confiscation, and criminal prosecution. Courts, therefore, were simply arenas. Even at a far later date, suits between man and man bore a comparatively small proportion to that which they bear to the business of justice indirectly concerned. It was then—let us say in the time of James the Second and his immediate predecessors and successor—that the value of trial by jury was ascertained. In those days the jury was the shield of the citizen's liberty against the encroachments of the privileged classes and the royal prerogative. Even then, however, in such cases, it could not be thoroughly relied on. Juries were subject to every popular frenzy; and often, under the terror created by panic prejudice or national spite, condemned honest men to undeserved punishment. The history not only of Great Britain, but of New England likewise, contains numerous instances in which the jury system served to do wrong under color of justice. Still, looking at the working of the jury system in the aggregate, it can not be denied that, on the whole, in those days, it worked better than any other system that could be devised to hold a fairer balance between the Crown and the subject than could have been had by any tribunal composed of men dependent on the Government for a livelihood.

But how different the state of things in our day and in this country! The supreme authority, Federal or State, is very seldom a party to any important suit. The suits chiefly before our Courts hardly ever concern the public at large. John Jones has a lawsuit with John Smith about the ownership of a field. The question hinges on the true intent and meaning of certain deeds and conveyances. Evidently, on the face of it, the only proper tribunal to form a judgment on such points are men who have been bred to the business of interpreting documents and verbal admissions. Yet what the controversy comes before our Courts, we submit its decision to a dozen laymen—grocers, tailors, watchmakers, butchers, and farmers, and so forth. We expect them, in the course of a few minutes, to form a decision at which the most experienced lawyer would arrive after without many hours of close study. They render their decision promptly, in many cases before supper at home, and John Jones or John Smith is beaten mainly in order that the twelve jurymen may escape the confinement of the jury-room.

Take another case. Robinson or Brown is indicted for murder. Witnesses swear that the prisoner was seen coming bloody from the scene where the deed was committed. Other witnesses testify, on the contrary, that he was elsewhere at the time. To decide between these two sets of contradictory witnesses we summon milkmen, grocers, shoemakers, bakers, farmers, and so forth. Very few of these jurymen are capable of telling a straightforward story of facts which no one disputes. As to weighing contradictory evidence, not one of them ever dreamed of such a thing. Of the well-known rules which guide the acute judge in determinate false from true testimony, no one of these men is cognizant. How could he be? He knows all about milk, or muslin, or pantaloons, or Mocha coffee, or boots, or baggage: but evidence is a thing which he never thought about upon to study, and about which, therefore, he knows nothing. The consequence is that, when the twelve worthies have assembled in their room together, they ballot for a verdict. Eight of them didn't like the prisoner's face; they vote "Guilty." Four are honestly disposed; they vote "Not guilty." Then they discuss together. The advocates of a verdict intimate that society requires examples, and that dinner hour approaches; their antagonists feebly reply that evidence is always subject to doubts, and that the State Prison and the halter are terrible things. Generally speaking, the whole twelve are swayed by one obstinate man. He declares his views, and intimates that he will stick to them; the other eleven, sharing the natural propensity of mankind to be led by the nose, follow him. A possible combination of, say, seven, come into his views, and render the verdict unanimous. He may be a fool—but jurymen have families and love their children.

Another failure of justice arises from the partisanship of juries. A few months ago, in Canada, a Roman Catholic became a Protestant. At the instigation of the parish priest a number of Roman Catholics set upon the unfortunate convert, and actually stamped him to death. The murderers were arrested; they have been tried half a dozen times; but each time the Papist jurors have refused to bring in a verdict of guilty. Protestants are quite as bigoted. If, at a time of religious excitement, outrages were committed on Roman Catholic institutions, it would be difficult to empanneu a jury that would find the guilty parties guilty. Just so with politics. When any political question agitates the public mind, juries can not be relied on to render verdicts according to the evidence. Each juryman will be swayed by his peculiar prejudices. All experience teaches that, in such cases, nothing like justice can be expected from the jury system. So far does the mischief extend that, even when parties feeling is quiescent, prejudice and party sympathy constantly interfere with the working of the jury system. Anglo-Saxons are to be trained to unbending truthfulness under ordinary circumstances, they will seldom attempt to screen a malefactor. But, in this city, Irish miscreants constantly escape from the punishment through the sympathies of Irish jurors. In a recent case, a villain, charged rightfully with rape, escaped by a mere technicality, was rescued from the halter by the fellow-feeling of two Irish Papists who happened to be on the jury.

Thus, what with ignorance on the one side, and national or sectarian prejudice on the other, the jury system, which was the best practicable, and, indeed, until lately, the only system worth considering, has become but mischief, in nine cases out of ten, at the opponents of that religion would say, pot's vertus. Dr. Brownson, for instance, is perhaps one of the ablest champions of her doctrines and dogmas; Bishop Ives too; and, in England, Dr. Newman (probably the acute metaphysician and learned a man as that country can at present produce), Dr. Manning, Archdeacon Wilberforce, Mr. Lucas, and many others too numerous to mention. Dr. Cummings can scarcely be considered as Hall's a convert, yet he was only prevented from being brought up within the pale of Protestantism by the circumstance of his mother renouncing that creed at a time when he was too young as to be unable to direct the course of his future religious impressions and tendencies.

EUROPEAN SYMPTOMS.

IN a recent number of this journal it was shown that the period at which a European convulsion was most rapidly approaching. According to the law of periodicity, the year 1859 ought to be marked by some upheaval of the volcanic element among the people of Europe. France has invariably set the example of revolutionary movement; and on France, therefore, all eyes have for some time been fixed.

Recent events appear to justify the apprehensions we expressed; and, as usual, the French capital is the first to show signs of the developments. On New-Year's Day, we are told, the Emperor of the French openly expressed to the Austrian ambassador his concern at the unfortunate condition of the relations between Austria and France. On the occasion such language is said to import unusual significance to the event. The Emperor of the French is the last man in the world to use grave words lightly. And the occasion must have been pressing indeed for him to inaugurate the new year with a public protest of ill feeling. Nor was this occasion was pressing. Throughout Italy men are in a ferment. At Milan, Venice, Verona, and all the towns of the Milanese, the people are ripe for insurrection. Never was the hatred name of Tedesco more profoundly execrated than it is at present. Never were the Italians more anxious to strike a blow for independence. Assuredly the time was ripe for fruitful words.

To those who have followed European politics for some years, the events which are occurring may seem to be the natural consequences of sciences previously given signs. At the close of the Russian war, every one remembers that France made certain private arrangements with Russia which terminated, in fact, in a secret treaty of alliance as against other European Powers. To most thinks the Government of Great Britain was unable to conclude a closer treaty than usual with Austria. The terms of these private arrangements were known to Napoleon; but their general tenor may safely be inferred. As the case stood after the conclusion of the British convention of 1855, the balance of power was fairly balanced: Russia and France on the one side were a match, and no more than a match, for England and Austria on the other. Austria, moreover, has added further strength to her side by a dynastic alliance with Prussia. The Emperor of Russia has long been found ready to succumb to the position of autocrey he may have sought when he allied himself with the Czar. It is possible that, by leaving the field of European politics, Napoleon may have decided to assail the rival alliance; having done so, he sought the weakest point, which, undoubtedly, was Italy.

To understand the Italian question, it must be borne in mind that Northern Italy, including the Papal States on the south, and from Piedmont on the west, is more or less directly under Austrian control. Many of the towns—as the principal ones—are actually garrisoned by Austrian troops, and are so thoroughly under Austrian military rule as the suburbs of Vienna. Other parts of this section of Italy—as Tuscany and Lucca—are nominally independent, but enjoy that independence under penalty, in case of insurrection, of being garrisoned by the Austrians. Austria is the mistress of all Italy—save only Piedmont, the Papal States, and the Two Sicilies.

The object of the Austrians in trampling Northern Italy is not aggrandizement. Austria draws no revenue from Italy. On the contrary, Italy is a perpetual drain on the Austrian finances. Austria has ever asserted even that Lombardy was part of the Austrian dominions. But the revolutionary tendencies of the Italians are so dangerous, and their example so contagious, that the Austrian Government has found that the peace and subserviency of its own people could only be secured by subjecting Italy. Therefore it is that Austrian soldiers have garrisoned the Milanese and established martial law throughout Northern Italy.

It is evident, however, that the tenure of Austrian rule in Italy is in the highest degree precarious. It depends on bayonets only. Every one knows that the bayonet will first bend, then fall. Even the Pope distrusts it, and Piedmont would eagerly seize an opportunity to overturn it.

By declaring himself in favor of the evacuation of Northern Italy by the Austrians, the Emperor of the French has dealt a fatal blow at the national alliance which is opposed to him. He holds in his hand the fate of Austria; he has but to say the word, and Italy will rise, irresistible, frantic, united. Russia will rejoice at the spectacle. The English people will not permit their Government to interpose in behalf of Austrian tyranny. Prussia will view the humiliation of her rival with complacency. Hungary will not be indifferent. Austria will thus stand alone—the Government against the people—without a friend or ally, and with the liberal sympathies of the world enlisted on the side of her opponents.

If the decision of the Emperor of the French has been to break up the alliance among his rivals—and it must be admitted that events justify the belief—he has done his part. He has—it must be admitted that he has acted with even more than his usual sagacity. An Italian uprising, countenanced by the French Empire, could hardly fail to be highly injurious, if not fatal, to Austria. It would be hailed with delight by the English, but by every enlightened people. And whatever the effect were on the financial markets of the commercial world, it can not be questioned that the political consequences would be fraught with advantage to the Emperor of the French.

THE PURCHASE OF CUBA.

SOME of the papers say, with more truth than is generally supposed, that the Administration believe that the judicious use of a certain amount of money might secure the sale of Cuba to the United States. This is probably what Mr. Buchanan has allowed himself to be deceived by some Spanish wags.

The Ostend manifesto may rest assured that the Spanish Government could no more sell Cuba to the United States than this country could sell Oregon to Great Britain. No Spanish statesman of any standing dare even propose a cession of Cuba to the United States. The retention of the island is a matter of pride among the Spaniards; and the advocacy of its sale would sign the political death-warrant of its author.

If Cuba is ever to become a part of the United States, it can only become such by the process of conquest. Spain will first be crushed, by the forcible seizure of the island as security for the reparation of some injury inflicted by the Spanish on our commerce or our shipping.

The closer the French and Spanish journals are studied the more clearer does it seem that the writers who are naturally in the confidence of the leading statesmen of their respective countries are preparing the public mind for the final purposes of the United States. The old Spanish and French monarchs annexed new territory by the simple process of conquest, and they taxed and despoiled the people of their conquests. The European publicists give the United States credit for equally selfish designs. They never seem to suspect that the interest of the Cubans would be as largely served as that of the country by the annexation of the island. They do not seem to imagine that the people of the United States would not derive one dollar from the plunder of Cuba. Perhaps it is doubtful whether any reasoning can convince them of their error.

A NEW ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

CERTAIN Dr. Kane's old companions offer to undertake a fresh Arctic voyage, in order to find the long-disputed Open Polar Sea. They are encouraged by strong assurances—based on scientific grounds—from Professor Agassiz and Bache, that there is every reason to believe that such a sea exists. It is time to Dr. Kane's friends—especially as his theory has been derided in some foreign countries—that the question should be set at rest.

We hope the Government will afford the necessary facilities to the explorers, and, in case they desire it, will grant them a ship. If the open Polar Sea be discovered, a new and very profitable field will be opened to whalers; and no small credit will be reflected upon the United States. Proper consideration for the memory of the illustrious Doctor Kane ought to suggest the furtherance of the proposed expedition by liberal aid from the Government and the public.

THE LONGER.

WANTED—A LITTLE CAPITAL.

THERE is a capital sketch by Gavarni, called the Bohemians, and representing a café in Paris, in the inner room of which the Bohemians live. Inmates—are playing billiards with the genie glish, Inmates—are playing billiards with the genie glish, knotty cue which they use in a game; while of men to whom life itself is only a game; while at a table in the foreground sits a disconsolate, square-headed, neatly individual, leaning his elbow upon the table, and his chin dolefully in his hand, with a glass of eau sucree before him, a short clay-pipe smoked up, a pack of cards, and the checkers-board—and, underneath, the legend, "Wanted—a person able to command a little capital."

Nothing wanting but the pipe, and the Bohemian would turn the great crank of the engine, and turn out his favorite complete.

He sits there as a poor fellow might sit upon the shores of the Persian Gulf, knowing perfectly well that there is a mine of wealth for somebody in the pearls that lie at the bottom of the water. Yes, and he knows that somebody—a man like himself, perhaps—will come along by-and-by, fish up the pearls, and be rich.

How many men there are, all the time, who look at the daily course of life in the same way—persuaded that the pearls are ready for the fishing, and are going to be made in the future; and which they could make as well as any body if they could only get the hang of it—if they could only think of the lucky way to turn. Wanted—only a little capital.

What acres of men in this country, when they saw the success of Jenny Lind, must have vexed themselves by demanding, "Why not I?" Why, in the name of conscience, didn't I think of that? "Twas as clear as the sun that money could be made there! And while they were wondering, somebody invented a pill, or a cough lozenge, or failed upon some other quack idea, and the Swedish lasses upon the table, and, having smoked his pipe quite up, perceives that only a little capital is wanted!

Mr. Albert Smith, of London, is one of the gentlemen who has hauled up a very rich pearl. He was a small litterateur—rather a farceur in letters —a dwindling cockney, when—were it not a prosaic courtier of Fortune, who had an entertainment called the Overland Mail. Suddenly a happy thought struck him—the glorious idea—a conception which he scampered away from England—climbed to the summit of Mont Blanc—and returned. The rest, my point, as plainly as possible—came rattling down again—posted back to London—arranged a hall like a Swiss chalet—engaged the services of the best anecdotes of travel and stories of national character he could command—wove a very slender but thread of traveling story—dashed the tale with the pluck of a Londoner who had to prepare for, now stood on the mount of Mont Blanc—and at the appropriate scenery—opened his door gayly to the public, who took the bait greedily—and he has acted in delighted, and six nights in every week remained and remains the chalet—listened to the animated descriptions—laughed at the droll imitations and anecdotes—until Mr. Albert Smith's purse became famous, and he himself a London institution.

Wanted—a little capital of invention, said Fate, in the general proposition. Wanted—a little capital forward, invested his capital of that kind, and the dividends are enormous.

He has just speculated further in the same general direction. He has been to China, and has returned to England with a cocoa-nut and a willow-pattern fan. It is not less successful; and night after night his hall—now converted from a Swiss chalet to a resemblance to a Chinese pagoda—swarms with laughing Londoners.

Only a little capital is required; but it must be capital. That is the despair of Gavarni's poor Bohemian. He has not a little capital. He could poli his ladder up after him as well as not if he could only find a place to rest his feet upon. Plenty of chances, well we can be not grasped by a single one of them? Simply because in that case—want's a hand.

Good friends, who are wondering why on earth you can't seize any share of the general good fortune—don't think that you are just as clever as those who do—consider that they have the capital. It may be skill, it may be luck, it may be genius, or audience, it may be intelligence; but whatever it is, it is something positive, and not negative; it is not a leaning of the chin in the hand, and indulging the doleful dumps over a pipe smoked out.

A MAN'S WILL.

IT used to be said that a woman's will was enough to set the world awry; but nowadays men's wills are getting troublesome.

A droll and unexpected result of the freedom of the press is, that every disposition of every sort of property is subjected to such scrutiny and criticism that, for fear of posthumous shame, many a posthumous injustice will remain unknown. The duty of a man to provide for his family, whom he has educated according to his fortune, is rigidly insisted upon by the public; and the same tribunal will have no unforgiving fathers, no stern "parents" after death.

And from means so simple and proper as the possible publication of a will, what an appalling retribution is prepared for passion or meanness! The verdict Hun in the world may will shrink in anticipation from the blast of execration which will howl over his grave and chill the comfort of his children if he endeavor to perpetuate malice and make hate immortal.

Recent cases have excited various opinions. The expression of the public journals has been harmoniously adverse; but in private it has sometimes been suggested that if a manly daughter eloped against his will she must expect evil consequences.

But the case is very simple: Suppose she runs off with a man who is a rascal, and makes her miserable, is the father therefore to add the pinch of poverty to the ruin of happiness, which she already endures, by the punishment of whatever offense she has committed? Or suppose she runs off with a man who is a good, honest fellow, but whom the father does not choose to like, is she then to be punished for having chosen warily?

If a man and his wife cannot live out to cut off with a shilling a poor, good-for-nothing, drunken son of a son, but ought to put some means in trust for him, to save him from the temptation of better things, rather than secure the certainty of his destruction, by some much more easy and possible for the rescue of a daughter from want, whose only offense is that she loved, not wrongly, but too well.

This fresh idea of the sacredness of social authority, exercised irresponsibly and unreasonably in the unhappiness it would be inspiring, is one of the swiftest away before the publishing of wills. The habit will have abuses, as every habit has. But it is not difficult to forestall its benefits.

CHRISTIAN COURTESY.

THE New York Christian Advocate says, or some of them—for it is to be hoped that Mozart Hall would not hold all—that "Americans are Democratic and with the ten, as was proper, toasts; and to the toasts, as it usual, speeches. It seems to have been a pleasant occasion, and the Governor and the Mayor and other worthy gentlemen made remarks which very creditable to their patriotism and loyalty.

But why should the social sympathy of the hour have been spoiled by personal insults to other human beings, not present to defend themselves?

One of the orators, according to the report, "pitched into the Democratic party, charging its leaders many as Bottomites; accused them of being on the verge of idolatry, and warned the Christian young men that they had better leave the Administration" by their singing, singing process would speedily transform them into their own shape—that of a wasp."

Now here was something neither Christian, humane, nor polite. If Mr. Bottom (or one speaking in New York), entertains different views from some Democrats, his views may be decidedly quite as intelligent, as moral, and as capable of forming and expressing opinions upon every subject as he is; and instead of insulting him he considers their views wrong or pernicious, he calls them names, and, as in the present instance, makes the performance inevitably leaves upon every sensible mind this impression: if the views of the Athenian are wrong, they are not shown to be so; they were merely denounced as disgraceful. The laugh therefore is with the wasp of good manners on the part of the speaker.

When Christian young men gives tea-parties, why not take a great deal more trouble? Tea plenty of sugar! Calling names should be confined to certain political meetings of a peculiarly low, indecency's sake, let us have common propriety served up with the toasts in Mozart Hall.

LECTURES AND LECTURERS.

A LECTURE upon this promising subject was lately delivered by a very intelligent gentleman, in which, among many good things, there were some which struck us as peculiarly wise and true. The most important of them was the statement that many of the best lectures had withdrawn, and withdrawn, therefore, from withdrawn, from the Lyceum, because they were put in competition with persons and of various grades, the better fine flowers of rhetoric, concealed transcendentalism, infidelity, and other wickedness, and who were altogether unworthy of the name.

Now what different views honest men may take of the same subject! The Lyceum is much interested in the study of the Lyceum and the lecture-system for some time, and the result of its ascended and successful experience is that the Lyceum has constantly grown in earnestness and freedom from objectionable discussion, and, consequently, the men who are noted for a generous humanity (which is often called "infidelity," as if those who loved and lived for man did not also reverence in the love of God), and for a fearless and eloquent expression of the views which they hold, are they men who are sought more and more by the Lyceums every year, and are sure to gather the largest crowds and now the most private, as well as public, houses.

While, on the other hand, the speakers who occasionally appear to grope in error and universal principles and the subjects that interest their audiences—who aim only to tickle the ear and excite a vulgar laugh—are constantly losing or logically convention are set against human progress and the cause of universal humanity, and are, nature, rolling themselves up in their prickly little dogmas, like porcupines in their quills—are steadily losing "prestige" and are left to the charity of the great popular heart and mind.

The fact is, however, not moral. A man may travel from Bangor to St. Louis between the 1st of November and the 1st of March, and in every town and village and city, on some evening in every week, may hear one or more lectures. Let him remember what he has heard, compare notes, and note why they are so; and then say whether it is because they are pretty fair, or because they say things that the popular conscience does not affront, and hears more eagerly because it has heard so seldom.

As for the best lecturers withdrawing, it would be a difficult thing for the ablest speaker in question to name a single public lecturer who has any claim at all to be considered among the best, who has left the Lyceum for the reason assigned. That many have left is true enough. But when the Lounger was lately engaged in studying the Lyceum in a certain large inland city, and asked a friend whether a late distinguished politician resident in that city had "withdrawn" from politics; his friend replied, "He certainly has nothing to do with them at present, but probably he him self would like amazingly to know whether he has withdrawn or been dropped!"

PLAIN SPEAKING.

A FAMOUS mathematician has made an accurate calculation of the chances of broken necks and limbs by railway travel in this country. People who travel much by rail are deeply interested in it—especially after they have completed the whole number of miles which, according to the calculation, require that a broken neck or limb must be. In fact, you may at any time find yourself comfortably rolling along by the side of a man who, to keep the statistics straight, ought to have been crushed to death six months before.

Such curious but terrible disagreeable chances would be greatly lessened, if railroads were more carefully built and guarded, every instance of remissness and carelessness would be brought to the most public notice. An accurate monthly report of accidents of every kind would be issued, and would be very useful, if not very amusing reading. If would greatly help the general security of travel.

The matter has been forcibly suggested by the Georgia accident, occasioned by the washing away of the embankment by heavy rains, and by a vigorous passage in the last number of the North American Review, in which, speaking of an English bridge, the reviewer remarks, "What a contrast to the tremulous and rotting cobwork which, not only on our railroads generally, but even on our railways, often spans rapid streams and precipitous ravines, and whose strength and superintendents enable us to conceive of the Hindoo Thug—murderers by profession—as a possible sect."

The Thug is a noble, in a word. "It has no strong language, in view of facts familiarly known to it was not a proper word." Although it appeared on the inquest upon the bodies of those recently murdered on the New York Central Railroad, that "Thugs" was the best description of the railway had for several days been fully aware of the dangerous and ruinous condition of the bridge whose failure was thus fatal.

Murder is the very word that describes such conduct, under such circumstances.

"ITALIA, O ITALIA!"

THE recent eminent and enthusiastic lectures upon Italy and Italian revolutions by Signora Mario have revived many a sympathy and bubbled afresh many a hope. Perhaps in the most universal of all is a sense of the inextricability of Italian questions. Let no Power try to be defended with the word. It is used in no reproachful, but in a regretful, sense.

Whoever is familiar with the details of the struggle as Rome against the French—the good order maintained by the Republican Government, the popular sympathy, and, though the word seems strange to describe such a man, the practical administrative sense of Mazzini—Pepe, in his correspondence with the French special envoy, Lesseps, both of whom had been his guests and enemies—will never be unjust to the Italian character, however skeptical he may be of their political regeneration.

But against these remonstrances he has to place the interminable party quarrels, the disheartened conduct, and the general shiftlessness of the Italian movement. The young men waste too much enthusiasm upon the color of a ribbon or the shape of a hat; and long before they are prepared to hoist a bottle flag every patriot has a pair of trousers that betrays the whole secret.

Just now we read that the city upon which the young men of Italy had intended to smuggled into the country from Turin, and is called Cucumber, has declared for the Prince of Piedmont, and there keep the enemy always watchful, and expend their own energies in trifles. They are like men stealing upon a foe, who, in those close approaches, get upon their not being discovered; but as they push along in advance of the main body of the army, creep, thrusts his arm out of the bushes, and shakes his fist at the enemy, who laugh silently and track their march from point to point.

The defense of Rome was heroic and noble. It was the last struggle of fame to immortalize by her. Every day the flower of the city went out to the field, and every day some brave defender fell. The spirit that fought at Bunker's and Quebec not might liberate Italy. But that spirit would not have been private, as now, a matter of shoestrings. When a man has time to stop and pick list of his coat-sleeve, he is not in a hurry.

THE FEAST OF NEW BOOKS.

THE flower the books published, the better they ought to be in point of quality, the richer they are. Certainly the books of the winter—Carlyle's strong, splendid, picturesque, grand historical portrait of Frederick the Great in the last volumes worth of a permanent and grave interest. Then we have more recently the first volume of Palfrey's History of New England—calm, clear, dignified, and full of interest, a fresh and final telling of the immensely fine and interesting story. And, partly in the same field, the first volume of Arnold's History of Rhode Island, which is also important and full of the reader will have the case of Roger Williams against the men of Massachusetts—the Bay state—fully presented on both sides than ever before.

Still another history, full of a vital, startling, human interest, Dr. Bacon's Genesis of the Story of Prostitution—a work for every grave man to read and ponder, and which will do for this day; and as a relief, Thorndale; or, the Conflict of Opinions—the record of a sensitive, thoughtful, poetic, and retired mind, musing upon all questions, and studying the thoughts and the results with a ripe and tender simplicity and beauty of expression which is no less peculiarly English than the rollicking, sparkling, amusing Yacht Voyage of the thousand Miles, by Lord Dufferin, who went to Spitzbergen "on a lark;" showing that Lords "may be genuine gentlemen, although the Duke of Beaufort is addicted to "Aunt Sally" and "propels bludgeons" at innocent equestrians who happen to hit his shoulder.

But from snow and ice, Dr. Thomson, who has lived for thirty years in the Land expounding the Book, leads us to the warm Eastern lands and authority that few travelers have possessed. The Land the Book is a work not only interesting to the general reader, but of peculiar value to the religious student, fascinating for Sunday-schools, and a substantial contribution to the illustration of the Holy Land.

Near the poets silent. Mrs. Kemble gathers her verses, old and new, into one of Tickner & Field's handsome volumes: and with a fine, racy flavor of the old literature with which her dramatic studies have made her familiar, sings the same feelings and passions that inspired them. Bennett is a rich tenderness in many of her poems, a pathetic dignity. Mr. Aldrich, too, clothes the Bolder Bell in a wonderful dress both of fantasticness: while the airy chime of his dainty songs make a music like the sound of colored sunset. Tuttle-Sweet, that comes from the hand that wrote Thorndyke Rossiter's Letters, is as hearty and earnest as that admirable book, and if in parts not ragged, is every where as racy as its native New England. Then there is Dr. Holland's Bay Path, a fine place among our authors: while the Autocrat has put Dr. Holmes's place of honor higher—so high that it will be vicinic to all the world as long as fancy, wit, humor, thought, grace, and pathos are dear to him or admired.

And while the sumptuous Poets and Poetry of Europe, edited by the American edition by Mr. Duyckinck, with selections and illustrations of our own poets, must always remain among the handsomest of the splendid books for parlor ornaments. Willis Winkle's Nursery Songs of Scotland, exquisitely illustrated by Darley, is, in all, it is more known to say nothing about the book."

So the Lounger becomes instantly mum.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"A CONSTANT READER," who wrote a few weeks since to thank us for the hint concerning the proper pronunciation of Proclivoni, and who asked how certain other words were pronounced, now accuses the Lounger of unkindness in remarking upon the spelling of the letter, and regrets that the "magnanimity" of the Lounger is "as nasty indeed." "A Constant Reader" has read this column with very much attention, and is aware that the very ridicule any correspondent except in good-humored selfdefense. The Lounger will naturally pay better with banter, but he will never allow his magnanimity to be rallied by any correspondent; and he begs to say, that the political words in the words originally mentioned by "A Constant Reader" are written as they are pronounced. In fact, they are pronounced first, and the writing is but an imitation of the sound.

—"DAMPHOOL" wishes to know whether the Lounger thinks that Milton is "dampool" or "dampool" are in his epics or in his minor poems; and whether the fact that the works of a poet come to be used as grammatical models is not a fair proof that they are dead, since anatomical students do not dissect live subjects? Who would think of parsing Tennyson?"

—"To come to a practical test. Reputation sola, avoid the unnecessary publishers of these letters, and, besides, cautiously advance the fashion now (A!D) said to have been paid for the copyright of the letters."

Probably not. Some of the most famous and successful works of our own day have gone begging for publishers, and in fact for lack of the publishers. They do not know works because they are full of good and original matter, but because they promise to be profitable. A merchant deals in molasses or in no hides according to the prospect of money-making, not upon any abstract grounds of superiority in the hide to the syrup. Publishers are not, generally, necessarily, scholars, nor philosophers, although they are often all three. As publishers, they are not scholastic; and if authors always remembered that fact they would not so often look upon publishers as their natural enemies.

—The problem of "C. P. Cooper," in No. 102 of the Herald, has elicited a number of satisfactory replies. This week, for instance, Jon writes from Baltimore County, Maryland, that the number required is 144 to "exactly the same." Another nameless correspondent takes Mr. Cooper to task for inaccuracy in the statement of his proposition, and adds:

"Permit me, Lounger, to suffix some problems not to be found in John Taylor's translation of Librarie's Socratic arithmetic, a work which Mackintosh recommended, and from which Longfellow quoted. If a man on a hill can see three miles, how far can six men see? Or, if it takes a man seven days to chop Cord, how far is it from Cape Ann to the Fourth of July?"

While still another and more practical correspondent wishes to know what the difference in the number of pales will be 304 $\frac{4}{5}$ $\frac{4}{5}$ $\frac{4}{5}$!!!

—Boz says that he is one of a society of young men who desire to study the forms of parliamentary debate, and wishes to know how they can procure a copy of the minutes of the United States Senate, etc. The society should subscribe to the Congressional Globe, and make itself familiar with the Parliamentary Manual of Jefferson, which will find included in the "Manual of the State of New York," published annually for the use of the Legislature at Albany.

ARTICLE III.

DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD'S HOOP SKIRT FACTORY.

WE illustrate herewith one of the largest manufacturing establishments of this . . Douglas & Sherwood's Hoop Skirt Factory; an establishment . . which 800 women are employed, and 2000 hoop skirts turned out daily.

Five years ago Messrs. Douglas & Sherwood began the manufacture of skirts. At that time haircloth and other heavy materials were the substances most used in the manufacture; but the weight of several such skirts, and the heat generated proving injurious to health, the attention of makers was directed toward the discovery of a substitute, and hoop skirts were invented. When hoops were first introduced, to turn out six skirts per day was considered a fair day's work; now the several factories engaged probably produce over 10,000. In 1855 Douglas & Sherwood removed to Broadway, and set up 200 sewing machines (Wheeler and Wilson's); in 1858 they found the premises too small, and hired three houses in White Street, where they continue the manufacture. They consume a ton of steel per day; of other materials they use, monthly, 150,000 yards muslin, 100,000 feet whalebone, 24,000 spools of cotton, 2,800,000 eyelets, slides, hooks and eyes, etc., 500,000 yards of tape, 225,000 yards of jute cord, and 10,000 yards of haircloth.

THE FINISHING ROOM.

We are happy to add that Messrs. Douglas & Sherwood have not been forgetful of the mental welfare of their employées. In a building on White Street, adjoining their factory, they have established a free library for the girls, containing 2000 volumes. This will prove a good investment, and is an example well worthy of being followed.

THE KNIGHT'S LEAP AT ALTENAHR.

"So the fosman has fired the gate, men of mine,
And the water is spent and done;
Then bring me a cup of the red Ahr-wine;
I never shall drink but this one.

"And fetch me my harness, and saddle my horse,
And lead him me round to the door;
He must take such a leap to-night perforce
As horse never took before."

He harness'd himself by the clear moonshine,
And he mounted his horse at the door,
And he took such a pull at the red Ahr-wine
As never man took before.

He spurred the old horse, and he held him tight,
And he leapt him out over the wall;
Out over the cliff, out into the night,
Three hundred feet of fall.

They found him next morning below in the glen,
And never a bone in him whole:
But Heaven may yet have more mercy than men
On such a bold rider's soul.

THE POPE BLESSING A ROMAN SEA-PORT—PAINTING ON THE CEILING OF HIS RAILWAY CAR.

THE POPE'S RAILWAY CAR.

THE accompanying illustrations represent a curious blending of old and new things, being nothing less than a state car on the Rome and Naples Railway, intended for the accommodation of the Pope. That a Pope should travel in a railway seems, on the face of it, as preposterous as if one should fancy Achilles smoking a cigar, or Clytemnestra in hoop skirts; but wherever the fault lies, whether the railway has come too soon or the Pope lasted too long, there they are side by side, in actual existence.

We are told by the devout person to whom the description of the Pope's railway car was intrusted that eight months were occupied by the architects and builders in its construction. After much doubt and discussion, they at length decided in favor of a car divided into three compartments — an ante-chamber, a bedroom, and a salon with a papal chair in it for audiences. The exterior of all these is covered with metal plates, which, in the opinion of the devout person aforesaid, imparts to the whole structure "a severe and noble aspect." Upon and between the plates are bronze bas-reliefs representing the Apostles, Faith, Martyrdom and Truth, the Eucharist, etc., etc.

The interior of the car is said to be extremely grand. Silk, velvet, ivory, ebony, and works of art of the greatest value, meet the eye on every side. The engraving which we give above represents one of the many paintings which cover the ceiling of the ante-chamber: it is the benediction of a new Port by the Pope. All is in keeping. The Reception Car contains no seat-but the Pope's; but on one corner stands a table, on which rests a magnificently-bound copy of the Bull of the Immaculate Conception. The bedroom is exquisitely luxurious, though "severely chaste and simple." The bed is inlaid with ivory and ebony; so is the prie-dieu. Both are said to be admirably adapted to their respective uses.

So now our readers know how the Pope travels in a railway. We gave them the other day some pictures of the state railway carriage of the Emperor of the French—his salon, his ante-chamber, his bedroom, the Empress's bedroom, and the car for the ladies-in-waiting and the aid-de-camps. They are now enabled to draw a contrast between the traveling styles of these potentates and that which is adopted by the President of the United States.

THE RECEPTION CAR.

LITERARY.

DR. GUTHRIE is one of the noblest of the modern Scotch divines. We welcome every new book from his pen which Carter & Brothers, from time to time, publish. CHRIST AND THE LOVERS-CURE OF THE SAINTS is the latest of these: a collection of discourses on such passages as touch the glories to which Christ makes his people heirs. Thus the first is on "The Inheritance of the Saints in Light," the second on "Who hath delivered us from the Power of Darkness," the next on the translation "into the kingdom of His dear Son;" and then follow, "Redemption through His Blood," and kindred subjects. The learned Doctor, hydrocwise, takes occasion, in passing, to hit the subject of Slavery and give us Americans a rap on the institution. But this is only a page, and affords an opportunity for a fine outburst of his peculiar power of eloquence.

THE BALLAD OF BABIE BELL, and other poems, by Thomas Bailey Aldrich, is a volume very beautifully printed, and published by Rudd & Carleton. Mr. Aldrich is already well known to the literary world by the exquisite poem which gives title to the volume, as well as by many others which we are glad to see preserved in these pages. We mention in particular BARBARA, a poem which originally appeared in our columns, entitled "The Duke's Jealousy," and which, with "Babie Bell," are sufficient foundation to sustain any author's claim to be a poet. Mr. Aldrich is, indeed a poet of no ordinary power. His perception of the beautiful in thought is so keen and delicate, his idealism so perfect, that his pen seems to make every thing that he writes overflow with beauty. We can every him the power which is displayed in such lines as these, under the well-known word INVELOPMENT:

THE POPE'S STATE RAILWAY CARRIAGE.

And while the moonlight wrought its miracles,
Drenching the world with silent silver rain,
He spoke of life, and its tumultuous ills—
He told me of his pain.

He said his life was like the troubled sea
With autumn brooding over it; and then
Spoke of his hopes—of what he yearned to be,
And what he might have been.

"I hope," said Lyddon, "for peace at last;
I only ask for peace! My god is Love!
May after days atone the heedless heretofore!
Breaks all my image!"

This last verse deserves a golden frame. In looking through his small collection we find other lines that we would willingly extract; but the reader will be better satisfied with the volume itself, and to that we refer him. It is a rare pleasure, in our days, to chronicle so worthy an addition to American literature. But within a few weeks we have been especially favored in this respect; first by Longfellow's "Courtship of Miles Standish," then by Holland's "Bitter-Sweet," and now Mr. Aldrich's "Babie Bell."

From Mr. J. K. Curtis, 83 Bleecker Street, we have received (1) his PRICED CATALOGUE OF COINS, MEDALS, AND NUMISMATIC BOOKS for sale; and (2) Mr. John H. Hickcox's excellent work on AMERICAN COINAGE. The attention which has been directed to the subject of coin-collecting in this country during the past six months justifies special notice of both these lists, and we regret that our want of space forbids a more full description. Mr. Hickcox has furnished us with a very complete history of American Colonial and Federal coinage; while Mr. Curtis's catalogue gives us an idea of the present value of many of the rarer specimens. For example, we find in Mr. Hickcox's book that one Samuel Higbley, at Granby, Connecticut, about 1737, made several coppers from the metal obtained in mines near his house. They bore the device, "I am good," on the reverse, "Value me as you please;" and, on the other side, "I am good copper—1737;" and other inscriptions of a similar character. These coins are now so rare that we find Mr. Curtis has one of them in his collection marked 25 dollars. And, again, Mr. Curtis describes the Chalmers coins of Annapolis, Maryland, of 1783; and Mr. Curtis's offer of one of these Chalmers shillings is 25 dollars. These, of course, are rare and costly specimens; and no novice in collecting must imagine that there is any such limitation to the expense of other old and rare coins at Mr. Curtis's store. On the contrary, a very extensive collection of excellent coins may be made from this catalogue at a reasonable price; nor is there any means more pleasant, or one likely to lead to a more desirable historical information, than this of coin collecting. Each coin is a page or a volume of history for years, and then step into the store where the will use coins of Greece, Rome, Europe in the Middle Ages, the modern nations of the world, and test his knowledge by them veritable relics, and he will find that his history will be as coherent for practical use. But let him collect coins, and he will pick up history with them that he will never forget; and whether he reads it in Ancient, in American, or extend it to foreign and ancient coins, he will find every page a new and delightful discovery. In this respect we regard Mr. Curtis's store as a place worth visiting; and this, the only American catalogue of the kind we have seen, affords an excellent commencement of the Numismatic catalogue of the country.

THE MASTER, by B. F. Prenbury (published, in Boston, by Shepard, Clark, & Brown), is the story of a false system in the North Carolina "Old Dominion;" an attempt at reception, under the Fugitive Law; and many kindred topics which, though not very probable, but serve to elucidate the author's idea that the institution of Slavery is essentially fierce and vicious, and that it is the source of nearly all the true of most human relations.

Country Cousins; or, the Varieties of Love, by Theodore Hartman (published, in New York, by John W. Norton), is a very English novelette without any particular merit, and which finally falls into the profession of little Charity Green, a child whom various other circumstances have spirited away from England, and hidden—now down on Long Island, now up at Toronto—now in Charleston. All sorts of people and all kinds of adventures form the staple of the story, which is not badly conceived, but not well executed. There are not many authors who would risk such an incident as a lover driving two rival candidates from the field—motive of an express train, and causing a general smash-up, for the sake of stopping the abductors of his lady love.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, January 17, in the Senate, Senator Bell presented a memorial from the citizens of Tennessee, and character of the American vessels engaged in the trade with Africa. Senator Bell made some remarks, and the Senate adopted, a resolution requiring into the propriety of expelling the territory of Kansas. Senator Sherman was appointed Senior Flag Officer of the Navy, by 37 to 14. A resolution was introduced by Senator Johnson, of Tennessee, to limit the expenditure of the appropriation for the Capitol to the sum of one million of dollars. Senator Bigler's amendment was put to the vote and carried, and discussion was participated in by Senators Bell, Green, Davis, and Hunter.——In the House, upon motion of Mr. Sherman, a select committee was appointed to inquire into the alleged abuses in the Navy. The bill to codify the revenue laws was then taken up, and, on motion of Mr. Letcher, was passed over and stricken out. The House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's Message, and a speech on various topics was delivered by Mr. Clay. The Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill having been taken up, a speech was made by Mr. Hickman, and the House adjourned.

On Wednesday, 19th, in the Senate, Senator Pugh moved for a return of the trade with Cuba for the past five years. Senator Hale moved that the President be authorized to restore "dropped" officers to the Navy, referred. The Pacific Railroad Bill was then taken up, and Senator Gwin spoke in favor of it. The bill was finally negatived by 28 to 23. Senator Bigler's resolution was passed by Senators Pugh, Benjamin, Simmons, and Davis, and Mr. Bigler spoke. It took reporters' notes of a speech of Mr. Douglas, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the evening session speeches were delivered by various members, and the business was transacted.

On Thursday, 20th, in the Senate, Senator Benjamin moved a substitute to Senator Hale's resolution, which was adopted, to restore the Army and Navy of the United States to the condition they were in before being reduced. Speech of the United States being reduced in Congress, and Senator Davis's amendment was discussed by Senators Davis, Bigler, Hunter, and Douglas.——In the House, the bill to amend the pre-emption laws of 1841 was taken up, and discussed by Mr. Phelps. Speeches on the President's Message, and speeches were made by Messrs. Pugh, Montgomery, Bocock, and Cockerill.

On Friday, 21st, in the Senate, various memorials were presented, and Senator Bigler's resolution was discussed. Notice on from Pennsylvania and Senator Douglas. Senator Bigler's resolution was passed. The bill to grant certain quantities of lands for railroad purposes was taken up. The bill to authorize the sale of naval officers, etc., etc. Several private claims were passed. Senator Bigler's bill to provide for the issue of loans to enhance a resolution directing the Committee on Foreign Relations to inquire into the expediency of issuing the British Provinces; objected to. The private calendar was taken up.

On Saturday, 22d, in the House, which was the only session worth noting, the bill to codify the revenue laws from Friday to Monday.——Resolutions of the Pennsylvania Legislature, in favor of the passage of a law to prevent the sale of arms to the Indians, were presented and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The bill to indemnify citizens of Alabama for losses by Indians was passed. The Homestead Bill was rejected.——Bills having passed of a third of a million to the Indians, and the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation bill had consumed the afternoon.

SPEECHES IN THE SENATE.

The Herald correspondent telegraphs: "In Executive session of the Senate to-day, there was a very spirited discussion arose between Judge Douglas and Senator Bigler, in relation to the course of the latter in having had to a deal. The debate occurred on the question of confirming Mr. Bigler's son-in-law, Governor Cumming. Mr. Pugh opposed Porter's nomination, as the man disgraced the Navy service. Mr. Bigler said he would not be put on a par with him (Pugh) he was ready for it. He denounced Pugh's conduct in the Cuba affair. Douglas said he was not in (Pugh's) friend to vote against it. Douglas responded that he (Bigler) had been the friend of Walker, and that he then intended to be his friend. Appointments. He then touched on the Kansas question, and Douglas, Bigler, Pugh, Hunter, and Green participated. Douglas said that Bigler's statement was not true. Douglas again reiterated what he had said. Fitch and Douglas continued the debate. Fitch replied to Douglas and Douglas replied, and this made a remark for Fitch to prize any thing coming from that quarter. Cries of order were heard, and Douglas and Fitch were called to order. Motions were then made that Douglas be called to order. Mr. Bigler, Mr. Douglas replied to, and said, turning to Douglas, he had dressed with personal remarks. Douglas said he was not the man to say any thing personal. Mr. Bigler said he was not the man to make a motion was made and the Senate adjourned. The debate will be resumed to-day. The private secretary remarks made."

SOCIAL LIFE AT WASHINGTON.

A correspondent of the Philadelphia Press writes: "Mr. and Mrs. Senator Douglas were never before so much the centre of attraction as they have been during the reception of the fair lady and gentlemen of Washington. Their house is crowded with genuine admirers. Mrs. Douglas is a most accomplished lady, and her agreeable citizen and his family—the stranger from other sections of the country, are loud in praise of the welcome properly presented. The Republicans have a good deal to say about the Democratic party, but the exception from the West End by paying attention to each other's guests, and by the kindness of the host and hostess of their fare when enabled to reciprocate.

The Cuban Minister's reception on Wednesday fell. Headed by glorious Critenden, and inspired by Mrs. Senator Douglas, Mrs. Gen. Cass, Mrs. Gen. Scott, Mrs. Gen. Thomas, and Mrs. Gen. Harney, and a host of others, the ball was many a round rotten, and cause many a kick, and the Cuban Minister and his lady, as well as all the Administration dole out their good things, will be happy to know that the ball is over, and that it deserve it for being so severe in your paper, others can, and may and do, receive recognition and reward. Mr. and Mrs. Nickles are universal favorites; nowhere is there a more refined or hospitable couple in the country as Pennsylvanians so glad to rally. Among the celebrity of the evening was Mr. Bayard Taylor, who received a gratifying. Here you have a correspondent, a poet, a traveler, a lecturer, a secretary, a contempt for more wealth, and a number of talents you may well envy. Mr. Marshal Hoover is a host in more respects than one, and he kind, gentlemanly reception was the more flattered than when making others happy. Then we have Mr. Quinn, with his usual attractive manner, at his private library, his agreeable decisions, when you will often meet such celebrities as Mr. Clay, Mr. Bennett, Mr. Forney, the artist; Gaylord Clark, of the Knickerbocker; Pike, of Arkansas; Governor Wise, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Secretary Cass, Gales and Seaton, and when they are busy with the Congressional Library, you will find Mr. Quinn tête-à-tête with Mr. Bancroft, the historian; Mr. Sparks; F. P. Blair, of Silver Spring, outside of the town; and the most distinguished men of the country, and the readiest to see their friends, and even to meet their opponents, at his private library."

WHAT THE "WANDERER" IS LIKE.

A correspondent of the Philadelphia Press writes from Savannah:

"Captain Haines has returned from the coast of Africa. He says such silver in the stream opposite to our city, with his vessel, the Wanderer, lying in the river. The J. C. Dobbin, I was enabled to visit this new ten thousand ton, the Wanderer. She is a splendid vessel. A schooner of two hundred and twenty-five tons, very much like the Wanderer, was captured by the Dobbin not long since, and she does it. The lieutenant in charge of the prize crew of the schooner was sent by the vessel from Brunswick she sailed right away from the Dobbin.

"The Wanderer is well known in New York. She came here before, belonged to the yacht club, and was owned by a certain Johnson. That gentleman was to be, head of her at the regatta at Brunswick, Georgia, which, you may say, I saw the flag of the New York Yacht Club on board of her this afternoon. She is fitted up in yachting, generally, very elegantly. The cabin and the captain's state-rooms are even luxurious. Mirrors, sofas, and every convenience for comfort and elegance. She is a splendid sailer, and, with her great steam engines, Brunels carpets, a library of books, and a piano, she is a floating palace. Captain Haines looks quite attractive for a pirate."

whose human beings were packed 'spoon fashion,' muskets, pistols, boarding-pikes, large water-tanks, all betokening the piratical and horrible nature of the last voyage of the 'slaver.'"

THE CORPT GALLERY.

A writer in the Press thus describes the female portion of Brady's Washington Gallery:

"The best portion of the gallery is that which contains the ladies, and it is in that part where the eighteen most do congregate. At the head of a goodly array of beauty has perched all of Mrs. Brady's accomplice, tall, elegant woman, with a sweet, intellectual face, and expressive eyes. Next to her is Mrs. Gen. Scott, a rather French than American; and the expression of her face is not unlike that of Mrs. Gen. Cass, though the former possesses much the effect of more delicacy and refinement. She is very pleasant, affable, and without that stiffness which is so common in the wives of public officers, and which marks most miserable taste. A bracelet of her husband's hair is the only trace of pride in her dress. The hair, too, is worn in simple flowing bands, which are much worthier of imitation than the present style. To which we have seen the original to less advantage than she appears at her husband's side.

"Next in order comes Mrs. Crittenden; a matronly face, with a pleasant, kindly expression, and a dress which is the result of the mark of age as to enable you to imagine the original beauty which has long since fled.

"Mrs. Gen. Lane, wife of Senator Lane, of Oregon, is next, with an imperious rather than a winning, a handsome face, and a commanding figure. In succession, is next to Mrs. Critenden on the one side, and, on the other, to Madame La Vega, the lady-wife, somewhat, and plainer. Spirit of Southern society. Her face is more French than American, and her dress is quite peculiar. Her features is decidedly American, and still more decidedly Southern. Her dress is a perfect model of plain but elegant expression than of striking beauty.

Mrs. Gen. Thomas, wife of Adjutant-General.

"Miss Hale, the daughter of Senator Hale, is next to that of her father, and is a beautiful young woman of beauty; but the observer who permits himself to imagine, from the face of the father, that the face of the daughter also must have been twenty years ago, would be apt to be very much mistaken. Miss Hale is a beauty, and one that now occupied by her daughter. The portrait of Mrs. Senator Douglas is next to that of her husband, and is then an effective on the weak-minded person at the head of the gallery, and is a beautiful face, and a picture of very striking face, in child peculiarly adapted to the style of Mrs. Brady's art. On the other side of the husband is that of Mrs. Senator Bigler, and is a picture of a happy, mirthful little woman, with just a little Dutch cast to her face. Next to Mrs. Douglas's is the face is more of the Yankee cast than of that which we have been accustomed to see in Southern associations. Mrs. Conrad's is one of the handsomest portraits in the gallery, and the expression of intelligence of manner is the figure, while the expression of the features does not do justice to the strong mind which this lady is famous. Mrs. Postmaster-General Brown is next to that of Mrs. Conrad, and presents a most pleasing face in the collection."

TRIAL OF THE WINANS STEAMER.

On Thursday last the new iron steamer built by the Messrs. Winans, at Baltimore, for the Russian government, four or five hours, with a small party on board. The performance of the vessel was highly satisfactory. The Baltimore papers as having been entirely satisfactory. They are built of the model known as the Winans cigar vessels, and made twelve to fourteen miles an hour.

THE CUBAN MINISTER AND THE PRESIDENT.

We read in the Troy Times: "Mr. John La Montaine, the newspaper, is in this city, where he arrived on Monday a few days. He has made arrangements for the construction of a line of steamers from this port to Europe, to make an attempt to cross the Atlantic next summer. The money is to be furnished by a wealthy capitalist of the modern Athens, who has sufficient confidence in Mr. La Montaine's skill to put a hundred thousand in it. The balloon is to be of silk, with an successive power which will enable it to overcome the force of the strongest gales or provisions, and four passengers. The power is to be applied by a propeller, which is to be worked by steam. The car is to be protected by a water-tight compartment, which is to be sealed, and found to operate satisfactorily. Before the expense of fastening the screw, it is proposed to make three long voyages, starting from Western cities, for the purpose of fastening the screw, and testing the balloon. The effect of the employment of machinery. Mr. Wm. the editor of Baltimore, is to accompany Mr. La Montaine, in connection with Mr. La Montaine, approves of his plan in every respect, and has made a number of very valuable scientific experience in suggestions as to the manner of carrying it out."

A BADLY LABELED DRIED APPLES.

Among the amusements of the session on Saturday morning at the Hudson River Railroad Depot was an object to see from Albany, and a number of gentlemen from some of the railroad employés thought the box rather heavy, and, supposing it contained dried apples, thought when they discovered that it contained a coffin, carefully packed in ice and labeled "dried apples," and properly consigned, the Crowner was promptly notified; the box was opened, and the contents found to be as represented. The box was then repacked, and the train proceeded. On opening the box, when Colonel Zadock Pratt entered the car, he was greeted with a hearty welcome. Colonel Pratt was his grand-daughter, and a daughter of Colonel Ingersoll, of Albany. Colonel Pratt is one of the largest capitalist at his residence at Prattsville, and while there died, and he was returning to Albany to attend the body to its interment. The box was purposely marked erroneously to avoid the annoyance of delay in transportation. Mr. Pratt's statement, which was corroborated by other parties, was made to the Coroner, and the Coroner made a letter official at once gave permission for the removal of the body to the interment.

PERSONAL.

General Scott had a grand reception in New Orleans on the 6th instant. He was welcomed by Mayor Stith, and the citizens of the city turned out in force to do honor to the hero. He was received in New Orleans, having been, when a boy, apprenticed to a barber, and was a barber to that city. The party then proceeded to breakfast at the St. Charles Hotel, and, descending from the boat, leaped off from the engine, grasped the General's hand, and said, "General, I am glad to see you. I am glad to see you looking so well." The General returned, and signed kindly after his health. "I voted once for you for President, General, you know." "But it did not good," said a by-stander. "It did not good. I am very glad to see you, General," replied the engineer, in a way which showed his heart was in the speech.

At the procession in the evening, the carriage provided for the Eighth in New Orleans, and the carriage containing the General was very grand a sight as the city can be. At Charles Hotel, the crowd filled the streets and greeted him with cheers. He was called out on the balcony, and the General bowed to the people. Mayor Stith, with a few well chosen sentences stepped up to him, and, with the people, he was very grand a sight as the city can be. At General, permit me to take your coat." Unconsciously the General handed his coat to the Mayor, receiving his coat, entered the hotel; but the gentleman with the coat failed to get it, and the people in the streets cheered. Some think that his admiration for the old veteran was the cause of his forgetfulness in the midst of the meeting, and a memento of the great captain.

ARISTOCRATIC PAPER PAR.

We read in the Times: "The family of one of the standard-bearers of the Liberal party—a man of wealth and fat gloss, in consequence of an accession brought about by circumstances of a very romantic kind that shot of playing fates at cards. The pleched details have been the theme of much gossip in the clubs for some month as the change having been made against the honorable and gallant gentleman by a brother officer in the Guards, with whom he was engaged at play when the transaction occurred, at a country house in Hertfordshire. His father was for many years a county member and thoroughgoing adherent of the conservative Whig party. He is connected by blood and marriage with the highest names in England, and not very long ago he was himself created a peer. He succeeded to the title on the death of his master up; but I am told that the second was very popular with his neighbors, and that he was considered a very hearing their bitter fruit. SUDDEN DEATH OF A BRIDEGROOM.

On Sunday, the 25th, a most melancholy event occurred in Cambridgeshire. A young man was married on Thursday, by twelve o'clock was the hour for the meeting of the parties before the church could be opened, but the hour did not come till. The clock had struck twelve when a stage arrived that brought the bridegroom, who had left within a few yards of the house where he was expected. It appeared that, proceeding on the time, young Mr. Ireland dressed in his wedding suit, had arrived within a door or two of his intended father-in-law's residence, and came to a place of convenience. Neighbors who saw him enter the place were surprised that he did not come out, and that he did not make his appearance at the house. Search was made, and the door found quite dead upon the floor; the internal hemorrhage had been caused by the bursting of a blood vessel, and the unfortunate gentleman had to be put in his coffin instead of between the seat and the door, and thus was suffocated. The ring was found in his pocket.

A STRUGGLE FOR LIFE.

An accident of a singular character occurred a few days ago, on the Midland Railway in Derbyshire. There is a coal wharf beside the line at the crossing, near the Clement, where a youth named John Gregory was employed, with a man, in unloading a truck of coals. The man was standing on the top of the coals, and Gregory, beating a truck with a shovel, thought he was in the way. In truck he threw the shovel, but he got his right foot on the bottom the points. The train was rapidly approaching, and the poor lad made a desperate struggle, every effort to liberate his foot. His efforts and cries were unavailing, and with great presence of mind he threw himself on the ground to take his body out of the way. The train rushed on, the wheels passing over and severing his right foot. He was conveyed to the infirmary, and in the course of the day he had died of exhaustion about the ankle.

FRANCE.

THE PROSPECT OF WAR.

By the arrival of the Europa we have news from Europe to 8th inst. Napoleon's remarks to the Austrian Minister still excite the most depressing influence, notwithstanding a soothing paragraph in the Moniteur. Accounts from Italy indicate that the Austrians are very close. The Paris Bourse had at one time declined 7½ per cents since New Year's.

BARON HEURTER INJURED BY THE EMPEROR.

The usual levee was held at the Tuileries on New Year's Day. The diplomatic corps and all the great functionaries were in attendance, and during the ceremonial an event occurred which occasioned quite a panic in the Paris Bourse, and a great deal of talk in both London and elsewhere.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times, writing on the evening of the 1st inst., says:

"I have just learned that during the levee to-day, the Emperor told the Austrian Minister (Hubner) that he regretted their relations were not more cordial, but that his personal sentiments for the Emperor of Austria were of the most friendly nature. He then made some remarks, but for the truth of which I will not vouch, to the Russian Valluet, Minister of War, went up subsequently to Hubner and said to him, 'I suppose I must shake hands with hand after that.'"

The same correspondent, writing on the following day, says:

"The few words addressed by the Emperor to M. Hubner, the Austrian Minister, during the reception of yesterday, and which I communicated to you yesterday, are, I feel, literally correct. They were spoken with a more ungracious tone of voice and unbiassed gesture by the Emperor generally employs, and reminded some of the by-standers of a scene which occurred during the New Year's Day festivities of that day previous to the rupture of the war in Austria."

POLITICAL PRISONERS PARDONED.

The Moniteur of the 5th of November announces that the Emperor has granted a full pardon or commutation of sentence to 154 political prisoners, two of whom had been condemned to death.

NO RESIGNATION IN THE FRENCH ARMY.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily News, writing on Monday evening, says: "You will remember I mentioned two or three months ago there was great talk of a large reduction in the French army. The reduction was then already sanctified that many people believed it. A particular day, which was that of several days after, was assumed, affirmed that the extent of the reduction would be to less than 100,000 men. It was understood that part of the reduction would be effected gradually, by calling out fewer conscripts than usual. Well, it looks now as if the Government calls under arms every man that it can lay hands on. The Minister of War has declared that he will not be reduced by [illegible] below a certain number at any time of peace. It is already said that the ranges of infantry for 1859 will be increased, and that a army of 10,000 men near the Italian frontier is spoken of."

DEATH OF A CELEBRITY.

The Express announces that Count Merlin of Paris has just died from the effects of a carriage accident. He was a celebrity, and a very remarkable man. During the wars of the First Empire he was the commissioner of this strange person, who possessed the most extraordinary influence over Napoleon. He was a travelling gourmand, and was known as Grand Gil Blas. In early life he had tried many expedients to gain a subsistence, and had gone to the South America, where he remained in a few years a hundred and twenty millions of francs, or six millions of pounds sterling. After having bought property in Prussia, England, and Italy, he finally settled in France, and died at the age of 70. There he lately died. We read of ancient gourmands; but we never have heard of a French one. Merlin was a man of a year and a day in advance. Baron Delmar only sold his estate to him for the sum of 1,000 francs when with reversion to the purchaser, and he had given out thousand francs for the green peas served up at a dinner in the month of March; and not dear at that, he said, when it was taken into consideration that an English lady of great beauty was to be one of the guests. One of the most frequent visitors at his table was his friend, Admiral Sidney Smith, one of the heroes of Trafalgar. The Baron used to compliment the old Admiral upon handling the best knife and fork in Europe.

"Delmar was always very much liked in Paris for his sunshiny equilibrium and hearty heart. Every evening that he had risen from nothing, he delighted in telling all who were worthy of making the story their own. The man was in favor of a good cook, then a musician, then a novelist. By his orders copies of all the new books which appeared were purchased, no matter what their character. 'I shall get time,' he used to say, 'by sending them which are badly written to the trunk-maker.'

HOW HE BORE HIS BLINDNESS.

"Many anecdotes are told of this singular man. One more and I have done. In the midst of a grand ball which he was giving in honor of the birthday of Napoleon, in the old nobility and people of fashion, he was blind to utter a loud cry, which at once attracted attention to him. Some persons of his household had given out warning derived him of sight. It was, of course, imagined that he was seized with a sudden attack of the gayety of any man. It did not thus seem to affect Delmar. Perceiving that the object was, that he had been having showered all her favors upon me, she has at last found a husband worthy of her. I am, then, indeed, during the troubles of '48, he remarked to his friends who were about him, 'glad that I have understood to enjoy life as a galaxy by it. I was nothing of what is called dandy, but I was a man of the world, and I have lived a good deal.'

WHY MORPHY DIDN'T TAKE THE KNIGHT.

The Paris correspondent of the National Intelligencer says: The Telegraph has announced to you, in substance, the philosophy of chess, a game which excites the most extraordinary interest in Paris, and requiring the exertion of every originating faculty of the mind. The Emperor is a great player, and has frequently engaged and, sometimes, a score at a time, and has pretty much surprise among the by-standers. He had declined to play against Morphy, which, although regarded as a piece of knights, would have resulted, it was thought, overwhelmingly in his favor. The Emperor could not play, without verbal comment, and was rapidly won by Mr. Morphy. Several pieces to be moved, and the position of one of the most intense lookers-on, breathless with pent-up expectation, cried out, 'For the love of heaven, sir, tell why you did not take the knight?' 'Because,' said Mr. Morphy, 'I saw that I should be mated in seven moves.' 'It was a deep-laid plot. In a few moves I should lose my queen, and then the game.' 'Ah, monsieur,' said the Emperor, 'you are a great player, and you have taught me by saying, he replaced the pieces as they had been at the moment when the fatal announcement was made, a series of moves which would have been inevitable had the knight been taken. 'Now,' said Mr. Morphy, 'you see.' Precisely,' ejaculated the bewildered gentleman, think I understand it.' And he left the room to make room for a share in the conception of the young stranger."

THE EMPEROR AND THE EMPRESS AT THE OPERA.

The correspondent of the Express writes: "I have an opera to-night, and I am told that the Emperor has the same purpose of amusing all, and giving many of your readers a superb treat. The Empress is to be present, and as the taste is cod liver oil, in any disguise whatever. Its extreme purity and the extensively used and well established, and grown people therefore manage to swallow it, with little or no nausea. Many of the worst cases of cough to induce a child to take a second dose of cod liver oil! Its taste is perfectly disguised in Dr. Locock's pulmonic wafers, of exquisitely delicate flavor, a Parisian mother, who is the incarnation of caprice and self-will, like the Empress herself, is to be the star of the evening. At nine ago, although thousands of tickets had been sold and administered to the boy every evening. The mother knew that if she withheld the accustomed dose for but a few days, it would be one only, unless force were employed, and this would be resisted by the child. Under the influence of this pressure, described in glowing terms a step from the Bois de Boulogne, to the Opera House, and the child, that little could be obtained by expectation until lately. Dr. Locock's pulmonic wafers are to be had in boxes, at one shilling and one shilling and sixpence each.

THE SPANISH QUESTION.

All this of course only tended to increase the child's appetite for the nauseous dose. Madame Rosenberg, to yield to his entreaties, promised that perhaps a spoonful would be given to him. Immediately the nauseous medicine bottle were brought forth, and while the countenance of the child was expressive of the greatest disgust, Mrs. Alfred gulped down a good dose of cod liver oil. Instantly the child's face lit up with pleasure, and he begged for a spoonful for himself. Mrs. Alfred gave it to him, and he bade him to imitate them. No one asked him how he liked it, and after a moment's pause he begged for more, and again carefully put away. The next evening, the same performance was repeated, and the next day the cry of the child's vanity being always excited to the requisite pitch by the sight of Madame Rosenberg taking her pieces play out the comedy, that to this day, whenever little Alfred sees the nauseous bottle, he begs for more or fretful, all his mother need say is, 'if you are not a good boy, you shall not have any cod liver oil.' And the menace works like a charm!"

THE LAST WORDS OF LOUIS NAPOLEON.

The Times correspondent writes: "A picture was introduced into the Exhibition of the Fine Arts, which is on the subject was a Cuirassier charging the enemy, and bearing down with his horse a standard bearer, with the prince Bonaparte. This picture, of no admirable execution, was purchased by the Emperor, and for a while was painted in the prison of Ham, and given, by its new possessor to the Museum of Versailles, where it now hangs. A gentleman passing closely by it, and observing the figure of the standard bearer, seeing the prize, was told five minutes before his death, 'Ah, monsieur, that was the man, who was an attaché of the Imperial Museum, and he directed my attention to the picture known as the Museum of the Sovereign.'

PARIS AND NEW YORK.

The Herald correspondent says: "This is the season when strangers really desirous of seeing Paris to advantage should visit the capital of France. The most attractive spectacle is the New Year's Day. The most attractive spectacle is the New Year's Day. The most attractive spectacle is the New Year's Day

STREET IN HAVANA.

NOTES ON CUBA.

HAVANA, December, 1858.

THIS is the season at which Cuba is truly enjoyable. Though the yellow fever prevails without interruption throughout the year on the coast, the weather inland is heavenly, and thoroughly salubrious. The thermometer stands at about 70° Fahrenheit, and there is a balmy freshness in the air which prompts people to live as much as possible out-of-doors.

Nor should I fail to add that the planters of the Island of Cuba are, without doubt, among the noblest fellows in the world. Our own Southern planters are delightful people. Many of them are rich; all are hospitable; some are intelligent, appreciative, and refined. But they do not excel the best Cubans either in refinement, or in intelligence, or in wealth. As to riches, it may be doubted whether the world contains men wealthier than some of the most opulent Cuban planters. This is not a commercial country, and planters, of all men in the world, are not in the habit of making inventories of their assets, or "taking stock." If they did, more than one Cuban planter might show an estate yielding perhaps little less than a million of dollars a year. What becomes of this wealth? you will ask. A great portion of it is squandered in the lotteries, at the gambling-table, in the fashionable societies of Europe, where the youth of Cuba now cut so conspicuous a figure. Many planters buy land and slaves with every dollar they save, and thus add to their income every year, but run the risk of losing all by a political revolution or a servile rebellion. As to hospitality, the Cubans are the soul of that virtue. You may go to a wealthy and good-natured Cuban planter's early in December, and stay till March, without even seeming to encroach upon his domestic habits. On the contrary, if you are a decently well-bred man, and can make yourself moderately agreeable, you are doing him a favor by using his house, his horses, and all that belongs to him. His wife and daughters are glad of your society; his servants are glad to wait upon you; the neighbors welcome you. You must be a very disagreeable curmudgeon indeed if you are not happy in such surroundings. And if, at the close of the day, when the paquete suberete, with an olive skin and sparkling eyes, lights you to your room, you do not openly express a desire to be out of Cuba, you must be hard to please.

Cuba is but little less in size than England, and has a population about equal to that of Virginia. Nearly one-third of its people are colored. Every body knows that it is the garden of the West Indies; and that, under proper laws and a wise administration, its population might readily be doubled, and its productions enormously increased. Small as its population is, however, and gravely as import and export duties militate against the development of its commerce, its trade with the United States is more important than that of the United States with France. Last year we took from Cuba some $50,000,000 of produce, and sent thither goods and produce worth $20,000,000. Every box of sugar exported from Cuba paid the Government of Spain $7½ cents before leaving its shores; every barrel of flour imported from the United States paid $10 75; and every barrel of pork and beef $5 per cent.

The annual revenue of Cuba has been estimated at $13,000,000, derived from import and export duties, direct taxes, lotteries, confiscations, etc. To this must be added, according to Mr. Thrasher, about $3,000,000 for fees extorted from the people by various public functionaries. Of this sum about $13,250,000 are expended in Cuba, leaving $2,750,000 for the Spanish Government, the Queen-Mother, etc., etc. Of the thirteen millions and a quarter spent in Cuba a very large proportion is embezzled by the officials. It is well known that high office in Cuba is even more profitable than municipal office in the city of New York.

No one needs to be told that the principal industry of Cuba is the growth and manufacture of sugar. During the year 1857, when sugar was unusually high throughout the world, almost all the Cuban planters made fortunes; and even this season they are doing uncommonly well.

A sugar plantation on the inland well repays the fatigue of a visit, and most of the wealthy planters are glad to show off their property and their methods to strangers. The plantation may be of any size, of course, from 1000 to 5000 acres; but it is commonly considered that the planter should have one field hand to every fifteen acres. In former times, before the introduction of machinery, the number of negroes employed was greater, and, in consequence of the short space of time allowed for the manufacture of sugar, the mortality among the laborers was excessive. Ten per cent. per annum used to be a common average of deaths on plantations managed by reckless and unwise agents; in such cases the negroes worked twenty hours out of the twenty-four during the season. Since the introduction of steam the negro mortality has been much less, and the number of hands employed has been largely diminished. A force of a hundred field hands will now suffice to work a very large plantation. Experience has also shown the mischief of overworking the men. Mr. Drake, of Havana, long since proved that by allowing his negroes a fair amount of sleep and nutritious food, they could not only perform far more work than the hands of his neighbors, but could still yearly, by natural increase, a large sum to his estate. On many estates in Cuba, it is known, though the female slaves are quite numerous, the natural increase is comparatively nothing.

The sugar season lasts from November till May; and during that period it must be admitted that, even on the best managed estates, the negroes work pretty hard—quite as hard as farm servants do in the North during the brief harvest of cereals. The first operation performed is cutting the cane. This is done with a heavy sharp hatchet (or machete); one blow severs the cane near the ground, the other cuts off the leaves near the top. The latter serve for fodder for cattle, and are much liked by them. The leaves removed, the stalks are carted to the mill, and passed through rollers, which squeeze all the juice out of them. The juice passes into the purifying reservoir, in which it is cleansed of dirt, etc., by the application of a moderate amount of heat; the stalks are gathered and left to dry for fuel. From the purifying reservoir the juice passes into the boiling caldron, where it is boiled until it consists of granulated sugar and molasses. The latter is then drained off, and the sugar ready for market. Very fine white sugar is still further purified by passing water through it to carry off every particle of molasses, and by various other processes which need not be described here.

Such is a brief outline of one of the ways in which sugar is made in Cuba. There are many other processes as well. On many estates very elaborate machinery has been adopted, at great cost, for saving labor and producing a fine quality of sugar. All the large estates use steam in their mills. The cost, in land and negroes, of an estate which will yield the owner $40,000 a year is about $120,000, and the annual outlay $20,000 at least; so that, except in times when sugar is very high, the returns do not appear excessive when compared with those of agricultural industry in other countries.

The importance of the sugar manufacture is so well appreciated by the Government of Cuba that the law confers peculiar privileges on the planter. His slaves are placed on the same footing as the tools of a mechanic in the Northern States; they can not be seized for debt. Indeed the law works practically in such a manner that the only resource of a creditor of a planter is to endeavor, as best he can, to sequester the revenue of the estate to his profit—a difficult business if the planter be wealthy and a friend to the Captain-General, the Judges, or the powers that be.

Allusion has already been made to the vast wealth of many of the Cuban landholders. Debt is, however, by no means unknown among them. Gambling, lotteries, and cock-fighting consume the yield of many a harvest even before it is grown. The last-mentioned pastime is as popular in Cuba as in Mexico or in Manilla. Sunday at noon is the time for the sport in the interior villages of the island. Time was when the padre, after saying mass, used to wind up—we are told—with the characteristic remark, delivered in a very different tone from the drawling prayer and sermon:

"And now, friends, let us go over to the cock-pit!"

If the padres abstain in our day, their congregations do not follow the example. The cock-pit, on the Sunday afternoon, is the only place which can vie with the Italian Opera in the mind of a Cuban pleasure-seeker. A late traveler in Cuba has so faithfully described the scene that we can not do better than extract what he says:

CUBAN PLANTER.

"It was already past twelve, the hour at which the sport commences, and as I passed through the gate, where stood a man collecting the entrance-money, I saw his ticket covered by the swords of those who had entered, the carrying any weapon into the pit being prohibited.

"Surrounding this, standing or seated on the amphitheatre of benches, a crowd of whites, mulattoes, and blacks were assembled; all dressed in clean attire, and intermingled without distinction of color. In a box not three judges, as dignified as if about to try one of their own species for life or death; while on the faces of the rest each passing emotion of the mind was freely shown. Indeed, although I had visited all the hells of Paris—the gilded and licensed, as well as the obscure ones in which the lowest did congregate—I had nowhere seen the inmost workings of the gambler's soul more fully exposed than in the features of these spectators. Here the warm sons of the South conceal none of the excitement the game produces; it is only modified by the temperament and education of each individual. The native of old Spain, his heart filled with the most perfect contempt of his Creole neighbors, amidst his dignified conquest, shows by his gestures the interest he feels in the scene before him. The latter, with no such restraint, expresses his feelings as they rise, in varied gesticulations and vociferations; while Africa's dusky son, perhaps but recently brought out of his native forests, with all his untamed passions rife within, under the terrible feelings of the gambler, counts the perfect maniac.

"Two birds were brought in, and having been weighed, their owners carried them around, bantering the spectators for bets, and occasionally permitting them to peck at each other. The sight of them, with the suddenness of an electric shock, seemed to rouse the latent passion in each breast, and the place was immediately filled with tumultuous voices. Cries of offered bets resounded on all sides: 'Una onza on the black, una onza,' a shake of the finger from one opposite, and the bet was accepted, without a word having been exchanged. 'Tres onzas por la plata,' 'Mi' dos onzas,' answers one who had only two doubloons; 'Tres onzas, make it up among yourfriends;' and some adding eighths, some quarters, the sum was completed, and a nod informed the better that his offer was accepted. 'Cinco pesos, cinco pesos por la plata'—five dollars on the silver feather—enter a stout Dane, his body bent over the railing, his eyes protruded, and arm extended, shaking his fore finger at each person, to find one to accept his offer; 'cinco pesos, cinco pesos,' he vociferates, in gestures and motion a perfect madman. Close by his side, another energy, intent on the same object, and anxious lest his rival should monopolize all the bets, with both arms extended, strives for the market by the force of his voice. Opposing hands from the bosoms of the other bird, in brief motion, are also heard, and the mingled voices in a continued din strike on the palsied ear. Ons is surprised how accounts are kept, for no money is ever staked, and no witnesses called. A nod or a shake of the finger is the only pledge given, yet disputes never arise about it.

"The bets are now taken, the two birds are pitted, and all but their owners retire without the lattermen. They commence fighting as soon as placed on the ground, and the new skins crowd, with outstretched necks, gaze intently on them. Not a sound is heard but the blows given by the wings of the birds; but a lucky grab from the spur of one sets all voices again going, and odds are freely asked and taken. This was repeated several times, whenever one seemed to gain a decided advantage, until no doubt remained of the victor. The bottom then looked on listlessly, as the triumphant bird followed closely his defeated adversary, which, now retreating, now attempting to ward off the blows, faintly and more faintly returned them, until, completely exhausted, he sank down, and unresistingly received the continued attacks of the other, until life was extinct. The victor now exulted in loud crowings over the dead foe, but he was not permitted long to enjoy his triumph; for the owner, with his mouth filled with aguardiente, squirted the smarting fluid into his eyes and throat, and on all his wounds, sucking the whole bleeding head repeatedly. The combat lasted nearly half an hour. The spectators were not used; but no signs of impatience were exhibited, and but little interest was taken in the fate of the birds themselves, independent of that of the bets connected with them."

Monde's, probably, still the most popular of the gambling games; though rouge et noir, bouillotte, and all the other games of hazard, are not lost, are freely practiced. A favorite scheme of the Havana gamblers is to select a flourishing village of the interior, near the residence of some wealthy planters, and to give a public ball there. All the Creole families are invited to the house rake of the ball. All the young men follow the example, not only because the ladies go, but because the ball is a pleasant affair and costs them nothing, the entire expense being borne by the gamblers; and the latter must be very unfortunate, if, while the fair Creoles are enjoying themselves outside, a few wealthy planters are not beguiled to the monte table in the little inner room. To one who has seen enough of life to avoid the fascinations of the gambling-table these balls are very attractive. Though a few of the Cuban ladies are beautiful nearly all are pleasing, and very few are devoid of singular charms of figure. Nature has been unusually bountiful in this respect to the Creoles; if the sculptor would study models for a Venus, he should go to Cuba.

Some one has described a Creole belle as being "dressed in a fan." He did not mean that the lady was absolutely provided with no more clothing than that elegant and useful implement. He merely intended to convey the idea that, whereas the toilet of a northern or a European lady presents many points worthy of notice, the artistic observer of Creole belles will find his whole attention arrested by their fans. It has been called "her wing;" assuredly she flies with it from heart to heart; nestles under it; flutters it in terror; claps it in joy; and when coy reserve demands a safe retreat, hides under it as if it were a stone wall. Some Northern ladies, at balls and operas, fancy they know how to use the fan—and, of course, as an instrument to produce a stream of cool air, but as a weapon of offense and defense in amorous warfare if they saw a true Creole belle flirting her fan, they would soon discover that their manipulation was no more intelligent and refined than the play of an Irishman with a hod. And this much must be added: whatever immoralities or improprieties may exist among the Creoles—and where is he who shall cast the first stone?—there is none of the grossness or ill behavior even at their most erotic balls which may occasionally be seen at similar entertainments in northern latitudes.—The very peasantry, as male and female, conduct themselves with a delicate propriety which might well be imitated by more fashionables even in Fifth Avenue.

It is well known that nothing like democratic equality is known or dreamed of in Cuba. No European nation more thoroughly than the Creoles appreciates the importance of social or caste distinctions. Cuba contains perhaps sixty noblemen; some of them old grandees of Castile, others noblemen—marquises or counts—of later creation, and sneeringly known as "sugar nobles." Among these the Northern Know Nothing will meet with amusement ennobled O'Reillys and titled O'Farrells. The Hacendados (or planters) rank immediately below the nobles proper, and above all other classes. Then comes the Empleados (or public functionaries), who, like the old French officials of the Monarchy, are perpetually striving to force their way into the classes above, and to trample down the classes below them. Under them come merchants; next shop's next shop-keepers; and, last of all, Gallegos (or common laborers). All of these classes keep aloof from each other, and steadily resist any attempt to amalgamate with the classes beneath them. No one but a foreigner can hope to associate freely with more than one of the social grades, and even he can not do so without much circumspection.

As was the case in France under the old régime, and as the case is still in many parts of Germany, titles of nobility can be purchased in Cuba. The price is said to vary from $10,000 to $50,000—trifling sums when sugar is worth a shilling a pound. But there is one thing which the "sugar noble" can not buy, and that is the respect, or even the tolerance, of the Castilian fresh from Spain. He regards the Creole as his natural inferior, and he can not be brought to consider a title as raising him from that condition of inferiority. He knows that no native of Cuba can aspire to any post of high trust on the island, and he knows that all Creoles hold their property and liberties at the will of their Spanish masters. He, therefore, despises and eschews him. He makes but little difference between the wealthy and honest, if simpleminded, planter who owns five hundred slaves, and the mere lawyer, who may be bought for a few doubloons, or the barber-surgeon, who will shave, bleed, or purge according to the desire of his patient.

The mention of lawyers recalls one of the peculiarities of Cuban customs which may find place in that luxury collection of memorials. It is as dangerous in Cuba to have any thing to do with a dead body or a wounded man as it is in Russia. To be wounded one's self is terribly expensive. A queer story is told of a poor fellow who left an inn in a country village to walk a few miles with an acquaintance. By the way the two fellow-travelers quarreled, and one of them, drawing a knife, stabbed his companion repeatedly, and left him for dead. By good luck his purpose was not completely achieved. The wounded man recovered consciousness, but could not move. When day broke he found himself on a frequented part of the public highway; and very soon passers-by discovered him. He besought them piteously to give him a drink of water, and to convey him to some house where he could be treated for his wounds. They, being Cubans, shuddered at the sight of him; and, fearful of being compromised, one and all ran away and left him. Some one more courageous than the rest ventured to acquaint the police magistrate with the circumstance; but the man had lain twenty-four hours where he was struck down before the magistrate came. He was then taken to hospital, and, being of a robust constitution, recovered. But he no sooner got well than his case was taken up by the courts. He was imprisoned—perhaps as a necessary witness; and was only released at last on payment of all the expenses incurred in the vain and clumsy attempts of the police to detect the man who had stabbed him.

A late traveler in Cuba tells us that a practicing physician having come to the conclusion to commit suicide, traveled many miles in order to do so in a place where the expenses which he knew would be incurred on the discovery of his body might be levied on no one. He chose the most desolate spot on the island; and sent word to a friend, a week before, to tell him of his intention. The bare receipt of the letter so terrified the friend that—though by no contrivance could he have been implicated in the deed, as he was many miles distant—he lost his reason in consequence.

FARM SCENE NEAR HAVANA.

NEGRO DANCE ON A CUBAN PLANTATION.

THE MURDEROUS ISCHVOSTCHIK:

A STORY OF THE CZAR NICHOLAS.

BY GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.

YOU will imagine, if you please, that this is the very depth of winter in St. Petersburg, and that the following incidents occurred during the reign of the late Emperor Nicholas. Every thing is frozen—water, milk, wine, brandy, meat, poultry, game, and fish; the tears in the eyes, the breath in the nostrils, the words issuing from the hyperborean lips. The sentinels take only twenty-five minutes to relieve guard, and are mildly warned that they will be "warmed" to the extent of five hundred blows with a stick if they go to sleep. Better to sleep in the bed of death. Wherever halts are given, wherever the theatres are open, before the palaces and before the great hotels, there are huge circular furnaces, with an iron copola above, supported on pillars, round which the coachmen and steady-drivers gather to warm themselves; otherwise they would be frozen on their boxes. Troikas drive down the Nova by Cronstadt and the carriage roads on the frozen river are bordered with evergreens. The bridges are taken away and the ice is ordinary. The statues in the Summer Garden are swathed in haybands, for fear their marble noses and ears should be frostbitten. You no longer see bosman being in the street; you see instead, huge bales made up of fur pelisses, swaddling through the snow, and through whose folds you can discern neither sex nor age. Ivan, the mongik, has only his sheepskin tunic on, and has turned the woolly side in, and is warm. The wild beasts in the great forests in the environs of St. Petersburg are beginning to have bad times of it. Several bears have ventured into the very suburbs of the city, and have been shot therein, preferring a warm bellyful of powder and ball to stacking their purrs in the chilly cold; and as for the wolves, the wolves on the outskirts of some marches in Finland, has been heard to remark, is the severest that he does not remember to have had a winter since the invasion of 1812.

There is a grand masked ball to-night at the Bolschoi Theatre. We have paid our five rubles for a ticket; but all our friends cannot afford as much. Into a fifty-kopeck piece to refresh himself with "vodka," while we join in the mazy dance, leave our pelisse (for we are wealthy enough to possess one) in the vestiaire, don a plain black domino as much as all silver we possess, and fall-looking servant in the imperial livery to conduct us into the salle de danse. Sub! we are in the thick of it.

Wondrous thing for Russia, we do not catch a glimpse of one single military uniform in all the brilliant theatre. Where are the plumed casques, the gleaming epaulettes and aiguillettes, the embroidered tunics, the long, graceful swords, the spurs? They must be somewhere here; and as we thread our way through the dancers, we look for a bear, from time to time, the cloak of a pair of spurs and the clatter of a subreache, unmistakably denoting that beneath some of these dominos are concealed generals-adjutant and aides-de-camp de l'Empereur. There is a touch of mystery in fancy dresses, not the fault transpery to which you have been accustomed in England and France, but glimpses of uniform, with silks and velvet about their shoes, lace and embroidery dazzle you. But it is not among the poly crowds of ordinary ballet dancers of stockfishes and polkas that we seek the real object of the evening. We are in search of mystery, of social intrigue, of puzzling equivoques, of inscrutable qui pro quos and, if we will seek and diligently observantly for them, we shall be able to reap a rich harvest wherewith to satisfy our curiosity.

Ever flitting, and glimmering, and pullulating among the votaries of Terpsichore (oh! thrice-beknaved plagiarist of a will-o'-the-wisp!) are the dominoes. Pink dominoes, cherry-colored dominoes, mulberry dominoes, sample-colored dominoes, black dominoes, and these last in far greater profusion than those of gayer hues. Grand disguises are these mantle-cloaks—simple hoods, like all the mysteries of love or hatred, or more harmless wit and satire. They have cord and tassels to the foot, praying timorously, mouse-like, from beneath the heavy drapery, or a breath of hot wind stirring the black lace mustache of the mask, and, moreover, a white rounded chin beneath, will tell the secret that the wearer supposes to be unknown. These dominoes speak in no shrill, discordant gibberish, as do their effrontées sisters in Paris or London. They whisper discreet volumnes in your ear—so much you silently with keen little diggers of witty lunsemble; they let you pluck a moment at their bouquet, and straightway you are aware that the secret of your heart is hearts is known to some one. They gloved hands come from their cloaks, fling silte billets into your waistcoat pocket, and disappear behind the jealous curtain. Assignations are made, reconciliations effected, the preliminaries of duels settled, ways of passionate exchanged, all in a noiseless chuchoteur. The whole scene is one huge Hasnium organ of secretiveness, but with the ear loose on the top.

Stalking majestically through the dense mass of revelers and mystified is a tall, stout, portly male figure, draped from head to foot in a black domino and cloud mask. If you happen to have a friend in the ball-room, he is sure to come and clutch your arm, and, in a murmur, half-amused, half-terrified, whisper, "That is the Czar!" and his Majesty is amusing himself. Let us get out of his way." But if you stroll behind the orchestra, where makers are sipping lemonade and tasting ices (for the heat of the crowd and the stoves reader both most acceptable luxuries), it is far from improbable that you will meet another tall, stalwart figure, accosted in a precisely similar manner, and stalking along as stately (albeit he does have a saucy little black satin domino on his arm as his prototype in the ballroom), and you will, by chance to one, if you ramble into the brilliant foyer, you will find tall black domino number three, lounging on one of the numerous velvet-covered settees. Go further yet into the great refreshment-saloon, tall black domino number four is seated at a marble table, treating an amber-satin-domino to Champagne and macaroon. Further, and still further, right up into the dress circle, and still further, over the balcony, moodily contemplating the mad scene of gayety beneath, is tall black domino number five.

"Incidement," says Mademoiselle Amelaide Zizine, of the Grand Opera, "mais c'est tres drole, mon ombrette, famous for the ease and impudence with which she "chaffs" the Emperor at masquerades, "incidement," Mademoiselle Amelaide (in cherry-colored silk) to Lolotte, her camarade and femme-de-chambre (in pink), "mais c'est drole, but alas will not be here to-night. I have spoken to at least half a dozen tall black dominoes and I am sure that not one of them answered me in Russ. As if my body ever understood Russ—une science de cocher!

"But perhaps the Emperor wouldn't speak French, and answered you in Russ to mystify you, Mademoiselle Zizine."

"Tiens! Can he speak Russ, the Père Nicolas?" exclaimed Mademoiselle Amelaide, in great wonderment. "I thought he could only speak French, the Emperor. But then, my dear Mademoiselle! I never can stretch by his limp—I'll go and say something to make him smart." And off trips Mademoiselle Amelaide, the pet of the Imperial Theatre.

Now, the initiated in the ways of the Winter Palace and the secrets of the back stairs know that the Emperor has occasionally found his colossal height, dimensions and figure to be not easily recognizable at masquerades; and that immediately recognition has occasionally embarrassed him. To imperial schemes of nocturnal amusement. To obviate this annoying contretemps, his Majesty has of late years taken to dressing himself among his aide-de-camp certain noble Russians of his exact height and figure, and has each appointed his own as closely as possible, who are instructed to personinate the out-room and to speak French or Russ, or English, as the case may be, while they dictate, or as the furtherance of the Imperial plans may require. Of these Personnels, one, and he the stock of tall side-de-camp has not been, the Asteroat has been compelled to resort to the Corps of the Imperial Guards, and to the Imperial Guards, and to the biggest and handsomest of the grenadiers, Ivan Ivanoff or two. The importance of these having six Imperial Redsmods or Ramanoffs in the ball-room and of one such as is visible to the naked comprehension; and those versed in such matters say that to conduct the Imperial Personnel in a safe manner, found to be the most serviceable; for those honest fellows, being well supplied with Champagne and good cheer, would rather punch a la Russe without, and being totally unused to such a costume as a domino, and much embarrassed thereby, gutteral exclamations of astonishment in their native Sclavonic, whereas the aide-de-camp were sufficiently accustomed enough to pass themselves off for the veritable Emperor, and to poach upon the Imperial domino in the most unconcerned manner.

Let it be supposed, however, that the tall black dominoes are the only sons of Anak in these halls of dazzling light. The Russians, gentle and polished race that they are, are for the most part, run large; and there are scores of stalwart forms here to-night, both in black and party-colored dominoes, and in full dress. See, here is one, a fine-looking fellow, six feet and more in his shoes, broad-shouldered and muscular as Hercules—I like the Enemy of mankind. He wears a dreadful black mask, with horns and a goat's beard and whiskers he turns. He has a shiny-scaly body, claws, an admirably constructed cloven-foot, a tail of indescribable dimensions, and a pair of wings. He swaggers along, brandishing that terror to sinners, his pitchforked trident. "Who is that, mamma, in the petite Tchort! Gospodin Tchort!" (Lord Lucifer!) I am afraid that in France or England this diabolical costume would be the signal for hisses, which he equally tabooed with those of clown, harlequin, and punchinello. Not so in the land of the knout and institution. He is the real old theologico-Gothic Lucifer, with horns, with hoofs, and a tail, who will sweep with it the floor of the ball-room as commanding as before. "Police major, you are an ostrich—an ass. Behold!" He waves the soldiers imperatively back. He removes his mask, only for an instant, and replaces it. The police major starts back as he meets the stern gaze of a pair of full gray eyes, as his orbs of vision dwell upon a magnificent countenance, somewhat full in flesh, with a lofty brow, a rounded chin, and a finely-chiseled mouth; a twisted mustache, dark curly hair, growing somewhat bald toward the crown, and a short, crisp whisker investing the cheek. He starts back, and, upon my word, if Count Tchort had not caught him by the arm, I think he would have fallen on his knees before him.

"Let the man's body be opened," the Gospodin says. "He must have been suffering from some internal disease for about to attack him so suddenly. And now get me another sledge, and let me go home. I will visit you more in the daylight, anon. Let the horse be sent to the fire brigade, and see that the sledge is ready for me at the Winter Palace."

The major's private sledge is brought out; his best horse harnessed to it; his costliest furs laid on the seat. Gospodin Tchort takes off his mask and puts on his undress cap again; but he entirely conceals his features behind the collar of his pelisse.

"You will drive me to the monolith of Alexander, opposite the Isla Millionnaia," he says to the coachman. "Make haste, and gallop." He jumps in; in the error cracks his whip, and they are gone.

"Peter Nicolaivitch," says the major of police, very sternly, when the strange visitor has departed, "Peter Nicolaivitch, you of all men! I declare me that you did not pay sufficient attention or respect to under well-connected. The honored lord Corporal of the night, you will take care that Peter Nicolaivitch has eighty blows of the stick at eight o'clock, for want of proper respect to his superiors." And the police major, yawning, lighted his cigarette, and goes to bed.

By-and-by, just as the unhappy Fedor is beginning to howl for his breach of etiquette, the prosecutor, who has driven Gospodin Tchort to his destination, comes back to the police-station.

"He must be a great lord—perhaps an aid-de-camp of the Gossudar, the Emperor," he says. "He gave me a 'ruble' (a five-ruble note), and I watched him go safely into the Winter Palaces. With thou drink with me, Michel Prosporovitch? Ah! and so our brother Fedor is eating of the stick —is he?"

The autopsy of the body of the murderous Ivanovitch is made by the surgeon to the police, and it is found that the unhappy man had been for a long time suffering under acute disease of the heart. Far gone as he was in that dreadful malady, any sudden shock or excitement was sufficient to cause death; and it was consequently stated that the revulsion of feeling caused by that which he believed to be his appearance in the Evil One himself should end fatally. A lengthened report of the circumstances is drawn up by the major of police, and is sent to the Winter Palace. Two weeks afterward that functionary receives a minister, set in gold, representing a group of the twelve apostles of the Chevalier Guards, with a star on his breast, and the red ribbon of St. Andrew en sautoir. The officer's face is stern, but handsome—admirably handsome. He has full gray eyes, a lofty brow, a rounded chin, a finely-chiseled mouth, a twisted mustache, dark curly hair, somewhat inclining to baldness toward the crown, and a short, crisp whisker investing the cheek. And of course the minister is the initial N.

I forgot to state that the story of the Murdered Ischvostchik does not get into the St. Petersburg newspapers. We manage those things better in Russia.

A LITTLE STORY.

ONE glorious sultry summer eve,
Beneath the acacia-bough,
I stood where drooping branches weave,
And waited on the sly.
'Twas on the spot, many a night,
I met my Lizzie love,
Shut in from all disturbing sight,
And out from mine above.

For I was young, and so was she,
Each pure and free from guile,
And like two barks on tranquil sea
We floated on the smile.
That night our first great sorrow came:
'Twas Fortune's stern decree
That I should seek a manly name
Upon life's troubled sea.

That night we met beneath the boughs,
My Lizzie love and I,
To gauge our estimated vows
With many a heaving sigh.
We've sat by the stars above,
And all the starts above,
And then I went away and fought
Life's battle in the crowd;
The wealth of Fortune's favors sought,
And to the goddess bowed.
A twelvemonth passed, and sped away,
And still she scouted me,
And so I thought, next summer's day,
I'd let the jade go free.

I'd leave the town and all its strife
For streamus and waving trees,
With Lizzie love I'd spend my life
In calm and glorious ease.
With all my store of love and pride,
I flew on wings of song
To reach that darling Lizzie's side
For whom my fond heart pined.

The year had made a glorious change,
She had no handsome grown;
But something struck my heart as strange
When we were left alone
She smiled not as I used to
Her smile in days of old,
And every word she spoke to me
I shivered as with cold.

She heaved a little sigh, and spoke
"The weather's awful nice!"
The words my heart had nearly broke,
And so—she said them twice.
She said, "The crop is mighty fine,"
And then she hummed a tune;
And then, "You'd better stay and dine,
For John is coming soon."

"John" Who was "John?" I thought, in gloom,
While she would only smile;
And softly fitted round the room,
And played with Fido's tail.
And then she spoke one dreadful word
That time wears not away;
Name that will my heart afford,
And wiped my love away.

She stopped, and down the duster laid,
Then turning, looked at me;
And speaking, though I thought I said,
"You baby you must see."
"The baby" now the John I see;
And faithless Lizzie's own
A "Baby" or a "John."

ESTHER.

CHAPTER I.

JACOB ALLEN, captain of a lumber-sloop which lay at he wharf far up on the North River side of the city, one day, after the close of business, summers age, on the deck of his Lady Franklin, "Tim Gaily," as he familiarly called her, was his own, from keel to streamer; and he liked better to "stay at home," in her cabin or on her deck, than to find lodgings elsewhere. The ship was high at the stillest hour, not long before dawn; and there was a broad gangway and rudder easy at pleasant; and Jacob lay wide awake—it happened so—that night at the stars. Far off, on the Jersey shore, he heard the whistle of the cars, and the low rumble blocks and blocks away, comes the dull rattling of a cart, with a distinct sound soon to hear, although too curious of faint, indefinite murmurs in the air.

Splash!

"What's that? A rat, I guess; or a loose stone from a wharf?"

Splash!

"Murder! Murder! Murder!"

Up starts Jacob Allen. The dire words, distinct to the last drowned syllable, take possession of him like spirits. He is a man of strong nerve, by profession, he listens; but there is nothing more. So now he looks around.

"That was a woman's voice. And it came from up stream. If some poor creature has been shoved overboard, and she had that sharp cry! Tide's turned by this time. The boat!—quick!"

He has stood out, under the star-light, over the black river; and there he stands, waiting, eyebrows contracted, fingers parted, leaning forward, piercing, at last, the dark with his vision.

"There! No! Yes! There is something! Here it comes. Ha!"

He clutches at it, on his knees, leaning over the gunwale of the tipping boat; he struggles with the black tide and with the thing like him, and lifts it—it.

"What is it? Who is it? A woman, by the dress; a girl, it's so slight and small. Any life in—if—her? Touch her hands. Why, man, what are you? Life! Is there any life in that? Heart! that's the first thing to do. We've floated down stream a very little way. The Lady's opened over there. Daylight's coming. Thunder! wish I knew somethin' what to do for'er, when I get 'er aboard."

An hour later. What has been done somewhile you may guess. "Tim" looking at the groups in Lady Franklin's deck. A pale girl, lying on a blanket-covered mattress, her head in the lap of a Bridget. The girl has her feet and hands have come together to her. A doctor; a policeman; Jacob Allen. Strange them—picturesquely, of course—as you please.

By-and-by she finds voice to answer their questions. "I was drowned," she whispers, all at present. But after a while, to their great disappointment, they find that she speaks German well. All they can gather, by the few words of English in common and by signs, is, that her name is Esther, and that she was put into a little shoe on the temple—there's the mark—which thrust her off into the water, and left her she thought. Murder! Murder!" Well for her that she had happened to learn that word, and that she had happened to use it! "Happened!" "I believe so, God, the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth."

Poor Esther! Men was pitiless! She was fair in fair, even beautiful. Slight; gracefully formed; her pale face oval; her white lips thin, yet full; her hair black, and shining with moisture, though Bridget has tried to wipe it dry with her apron; her eyes—what you can see of them under the thin falling lids and long lashes—black and clear.

Jacob thinks her beautiful, and he glories—to himself—over his winnings. Leaning against the mast, arms folded, he looks steadily at her. He wonders who could have been mean enough, unmanly enough, to think of creating her so!

When the policeman comes with a cartiage to take her to the hospital, Jacob finds, somewhat to his surprise, that he doesn't want to give her up, to lose his fair waif. He has his own low fears when her from the gray night and the black river? His he not some claim on that fair face for a smile, on those lithe limbs for a look of recognition and gratitude? He can hardly bear to let her go; at least not yet. He makes. But all the while he is helping to place her in the carriage, devoting to her use that huge grey shawl, which, with its tenants shall soon have established a right of pride ashore at Kinderhook last winter. If he were not a "lonely man" because of his tenderness he would go with her to the hospital.

By what treasonous signs women communicate the wishes they may not know! but wondrous Bridget has told Esther that Jacob is the rescuer. Has the latter been able to understand, discovered Jacob's secret? Perhaps so; and if so, he has to thank her for that which he has waited for, longer for—both the thanks, and a faint pressure of hands, and something in German, low and tender. And Jacob and the doctor drive away.

"Well! I always thought, before, that Dutch was a bulch, jaw-breaking kind of a language; but she spoke it pretty well, though I don't know if I understood the lingo a little."

Jacob comes downstairs all day; Jacob's rough hands doing rough work, but Jacob's soft heart——

"In love, I think girl (To himself, hog, "But she's so blamed pretty and sweet). I don't care! Who's got any thing to say ag'inst it, say 'how?' Do ye? As I'm a sin' to, I guess!"

CHAPTER II.

ESTHER at the hospital: has a German nurse; tells the story of her wrongs: it is an attempt to murder—and worse: a policeman sent for, a German disciple of Captain Walling's, forces from whom the following:

Esther Hartman is a dressm, from Bufweis, Bohemia. Her father died when he left for his widow money enough for the starting of a little shop, and two daughters. The elder has married, and gone with her husband to "America;" letters, at long intervals, tell of their humble success.

Esther lives with her mother there. The mother dies suddenly, and Esther is alone. The first year of vow, she sells out her little inheritance, determined to join her sister in America. Depositing part in safe hands, quitting the rest into her mother's, for the benefit of remaining at the old home, and good-bys to all the Budweisers, she sails for New York. Across the sea high as the stillest hour, not long before dawn; and there was a gangway and a rudder easy at pleasant; and Jacob lay wide awake—it happened so—that night at the stars. Far off, on the Jersey shore, he heard the whistle of the cars, and the low rumble blocks and blocks away, comes the dull rattling of a cart, with a distinct sound soon to hear, although too curious of faint, indefinite murmurs in the air.

Splash!

"What's that? A rat, I guess; or a loose stone from a wharf?"

Splash!

"Murder! Murder! Murder!"

Up starts Jacob Allen. The dire words, distinct to the last drowned syllable, take possession of him like spirits. He is a man of strong nerve, by profession, he listens; but there is nothing more. So now he looks around.

"That was a woman's voice. And it came from up stream. If some poor creature has been shoved overboard, and she had that sharp cry! Tide's turned by this time. The boat!—quick!"

He has stood out, under the star-light, over the black river; and there he stands, waiting, eyebrows contracted, fingers parted, leaning forward, piercing, at last, the dark with his vision.

"There! No! Yes! There is something! Here it comes. Ha!"

He clutches at it, on his knees, leaning over the gunwale of the tipping boat; he struggles with the black tide and with the thing like him, and lifts it—it.

"What is it? Who is it? A woman, by the dress; a girl, it's so slight and small. Any life in—if—her? Touch her hands. Why, man, what are you? Life! Is there any life in that? Heart! that's the first thing to do. We've floated down stream a very little way. The Lady's opened over there. Daylight's coming. Thunder! wish I knew somethin' what to do for'er, when I get 'er aboard."

An hour later. What has been done somewhile you may guess. "Tim" looking at the groups in Lady Franklin's deck. A pale girl, lying on a blanket-covered mattress, her head in the lap of a Bridget. The girl has her feet and hands have come together to her. A doctor; a policeman; Jacob Allen. Strange them—picturesquely, of course—as you please.

By-and-by she finds voice to answer their questions. "I was drowned," she whispers, all at present. But after a while, to their great disappointment, they find that she speaks German well. All they can gather, by the few words of English in common and by signs, is, that her name is Esther, and that she was put into a little shoe on the temple—there's the mark—which thrust her off into the water, and left her she thought. Murder! Murder!" Well for her that she had happened to learn that word, and that she had happened to use it! "Happened!" "I believe so, God, the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth."

Poor Esther! Men was pitiless! She was fair in fair, even beautiful. Slight; gracefully formed; her pale face oval; her white lips thin, yet full; her hair black, and shining with moisture, though Bridget has tried to wipe it dry with her apron; her eyes—what you can see of them under the thin falling lids and long lashes—black and clear.

Jacob thinks her beautiful, and he glories—to himself—over his winnings. Leaning against the mast, arms folded, he looks steadily at her. He wonders who could have been mean enough, unmanly enough, to think of creating her so!

When the policeman comes with a carriage to take her to the hospital, Jacob finds, somewhat to his surprise, that he doesn't want to give her up, to lose his fair waif. He has his own low fears! how her from the gray night and the black river? His he not some claim on that fair face for a smile, on those lithe limbs for a look of recognition and gratitude? He can hardly bear to let her go; at least not yet. He makes. But all the while he is helping to place her in the carriage, devoting to her use that huge grey shawl, which, with its tenants shall soon have established a right of pride ashore at Kinderhook last winter. If he were not a "lonely man" because of his tenderness he would go with her to the hospital.

By what treasonous signs women communicate the wishes they may not know! but wondrous Bridget has told Esther that Jacob is the rescuer. Has the latter been able to understand, discovered Jacob's secret? Perhaps so; and if so, he has to thank her for that which he has waited for, longer for—both the thanks, and a faint pressure of hands, and something in German, low and tender. And Jacob and the doctor drive away.

"Well! I always thought, before, that Dutch was a bulch, jaw-breaking kind of a language; but she spoke it pretty well, though I don't know if I understood the lingo a little."

Jacob comes downstairs all day; Jacob's rough hands doing rough work, but Jacob's soft heart——

In love, I think girl (To himself, hog, "But she's so blamed pretty and sweet). I don't care! Who's got any thing to say ag'inst it, say 'how?' Do ye? As I'm a sin' to, I guess!"

CHAPTER II.

ESTHER at the hospital: has a German nurse; tells the story of her wrongs: it is an attempt to murder—and worse: a policeman sent for, a German disciple of Captain Walling's, forces from whom the following:

Esther Hartman is a dressm, from Bufweis, Bohemia. Her father died when he left for his widow money enough for the starting of a little shop, and two daughters. The elder has married, and gone with her husband to "America;" letters, at long intervals, tell of their humble success.

Esther lives with her mother there. The mother dies suddenly, and Esther is alone. The first year of vow, she sells out her little inheritance, determined to join her sister in America. Depositing part in safe hands, quitting the rest into her mother's, for the benefit of remaining at the old home, and good-bys to all the Budweisers, she sails for New York. Across the sea high as the gayly takes her way, Juhs, Jubes, following the river, road (Moldau, k), to Prague; then to Dresden. Here she finds a countryman who is in want of help on a boat, with "lifts" in occasional Jahrgeschaften. He makes himself merry to Esther, and by seventeenth birth-day, with four hundred countrymen, women, children, chests, potato-bags, black bread loaves, she sails out of Hamburg, and sails up into the North Sea. [A blank, which a letter may attempted description of such a voyage as the Helvetia made in March.] Esther makes friends on the ship—no one-married Hamburg couple, a man of which has been in New York before; so, under his guard, Esther gets by many dangers, and finds a boarding-house. But nowhere can she find her sister. Piece by piece the gold is pinched from her bodice, week by week from her way, but Sophia Lederer, born Hartman, is not to be found. So at last Esther goes to work at a sewing-machine, yet at work for her living. A good chance sends her to the kitchen of a well-do German family in Brooklyn, where she remains until a wealthy family break-up and departure for the West throws her, without warning, into the street (there's a chance now to the city to inquire for employment, and meets, at her old boarding-place, a pleasant-faced countryman, from Prague, whose name like a talisman, comes coming from so near home. He is a farmer (ahem), living up the river, and Esther, after consultation, Esther shall stay with his sister until he is ready, in a few days, to go back to his farm. He brings her trunk from Brooklyn, and then escorts her to the sister's, a lager-beer boarding-house somewhere down town. The sister (there's a mistake) says the farmer is attentive; marriage is talked of (Esther, by the way, has grown into handsome. Details, now, of evening walks by the water-side, where there are seats under trees (the Battery), and of visits to a museum and a concert in which ears run (the Bowery). Max, the farmer, is kind, handsome, earnest, and Esther yields: they are to be married. [Blanks are sometimes convenient, often wise.] But though their plans are as solid as they are kind, Esther's conscience are too strong for Max and his (ahem) sister.

One evening Max meets her by appointment by night; this man will carry the trunk. Come, Esther! A parting glass of beer Esther must drink with the farmer, or he will be angry, to let the boat for the boat. A long, long walk: Esther gets very tired, and complains. Max is very attentive, and proposes a carriage. "The boat's gone!" exclaims Max; and the pier is deserted. Max is disappointed, but says he can only turn around, go back, and try again to-morrow. "Let's rest a while before we start," and Esther is soon thinking of Max, and strangely tired, poor Esther, and sleepy.—(Dragged her!) ——— [Now blanks again, for Esther remembers no more.] That she slept—a dream, and dreamed a horrid dream: fought with a fiend, who flinks, which struck her, and she screamed "Murder!" and fell into a black lake. The rest we know.

CHAPTER III.

MAX—if that be the name—is a villain, a fiend, not of a dream only, but of a reality, and the detective undertakes to find him, his duty becoming a kind of pleasure. It is to avenge a countrywoman rather than to earn his policeman's pay. But he starts vaguely. Esther is so much of a stranger that she can not tell him where to look for that boarding-house, and as she has been out from it only in the evening, she can not describe the vicinity distinctly. It was not far thence to the Battery; so much. She remembered crossing railroad tracks on her way thence to the theatres to much more. The officer at length concludes to go down to the Battery and question the owner of the city southward from the Astor House. At his request Esther tries to describe the interior of the place, but it differs in nothing from fifties of such places thereabouts, except rather hills than the average, pleased to be, all in such a place, there was a large black cat. With these facts, and a thorough description of Max and sister, and Jacob Allen's address, the officer leaves.

After days' industry, adroitness, patience, and the kindness of the police agents in the oldest legs, delighted with bits of Schweitzer, and says to him: this is the place—par-ce-ci—that is the sister, drawing of beer—par-ce-là—par-ce-là—you'll watch the door for a day or two, Max will be in. Moreover he will not see you and once I owe him a grudge! Officer Tieman feels pretty much that he has found the right place, but to make certain the fact he brings Esther to the hospital —she has been very sick, poor girl—and she, looking in at the door from the outside through a transom, her vail, answers him of his discovery.

If officer Tieman had known that Max was sick, half-save down, bound to Bremen, he would not have waited so long or watched for him so long at the Black Cat. If officer Tieman had watched and waited so long Esther would not have hoped from the roof of the house, and, far away, nobody could tell where, before he came. And another contingency—Jacob Allen would not have sailed—that cruel ship, through and through him when, inquiring at the hospital door for Esther, he was told of her strange disappearance.

Now we are all in a muddle. Max escaped. Esther—where? Officer Tieman and Jacob get together and look into each other's faces, asking, "Where?" Jacob, with his ship, is ready to sail; the ship is out of dock, cost him seven dollars Imagine the boy sitting in the cheerful (?) parlor of the Detective Office—the door of the Rooms, underground, meditating. Poor Jacob! Lost his Esther! Lost! Not returning her to Germany as he put that shawl, leaning back in the carriage, smiling good-by and kissing his own hand, with a kindness, politeness adding so tenderly to her foreign beauty. Now—gone, shawl and all, like a dream. Gone—and he has not even a "last-sight" of her, not his gleam of a snug little cottage, not far from a bridge, a mill-pond landing by and overlooking the river? Sunk, Jacob? Poor Jacob!

Officer Tieman! Why have you been sitting so long without a step? Why have you been thinking, thinking, clicking in the next room, and haven't you something to say? Have you been trying to look out for an Esther, a Jewess, a German, black eyed, run away from Bellevue?

Officer Tieman had warning in flashing all over —north, east, west, south. In another. "Here is she!" Here is a station for you to watch. Officer Tieman and Jacob are out and away, Jacob in advance. "Going after your skaut, Captain Allen?"

They find her, but crazy, alas! wild with intelligible flight. Jacob, recognizing her, thinks she thinks him a friend, fancies him somebody else, and gives him an old name familiar to Jacob's. Jacob she knows, and they hug him "Max" in shivering whisper. She wraps the shawl around her, and gathers herself away from him with a wild scowl. So they put poor Jacob out of her sight, and then coax and carry her away back to the hospital. Jacob is dismissed that, after the search in the house of the Black Cat—she seemed quite well enough to go—Esther was taken away from one who had probably gone wild, and had spirited herself off. She herself afterward said that Max had caused her to be taken to the house of the Black Cat as it seemed to her.

Days go by: the captain of the sloop Lady Franklin! How much lies between him and the fruition of his hope! Lies? Is not he himself to be in love (yet love is cat-behpidish), with a wide survey of verbs, nutsmatives, and adjectives, vanquished with words, words—conversational oratorical battalions fighting against him. Why he can't even say, "I'll ride down to-day." I love thee—I love—But there is an ocular language—and that he relies on —more liquid than la belle langue itself: he will speak that to Esther, and is sure that he can understand the black, if she'll see it. But she is crazy, and there is no hope. Yes, there is hope, he says; and having scuttled and sunk these difficulties, he goes back to the smile and the pressure of hands, and then—and then—comes the one huge hand—the one which clutched her out from the flood—and hope.

Esther gets well. Max stays where he fled to. Esther's sister never is heard from. Nurse at the hospital—delighted with the German Bohemian—becomes an interpreter, and so begins the German chamber of confessions and advice. In the which he makes slow progress; but Esther, with Bohemian spirines, learns English rapidly—in the which branch, soon, she outstrips that of the ocular—and-by, with volumn joy, a touch of the labial discipline—her quarter to sit sufficiently well for the hospital to the church, thence by sloop to a certain landing, and a welcome from old Mother Allen.

Now, the Lady having been sold, Jacob is captain of the schooner Esther.

Who of the reefers is "smart" enough, unfeelingly enough to spoil the ending of my story by saying, "Ah! but how could she marry him? She was a Jewess!" I won't answer you other than in this: You being Jacob, Sir; you being Esther, ma'am, couldn't you have managed it somehow?

ARREST OF THE MEMBERS OF THE IRISH PHŒNIX SOCIETY.

THE accompanying illustration, from a photograph by Dr. Corry, represents the tavern in Belfast, Ireland, in which the members of the Phœnix Society were arrested. We have heretofore given, in the news department, the account of the arrest of these foolish persons. Their design is understood to have been treasonable; they perhaps believed what they said when they promised their friends that the Sixty-ninth Regiment New York State Militia was coming over to relieve Ireland from the British yoke, and that the Green Isle would soon rise, Phœnix-like, from its ashes. They were, as usual, betrayed by one of their number, and without difficulty all safely lodged in jail.

STRANGE RELIGIOUS CEREMONY AT MONACO.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

IT was with much pleasure that I recognized in your publication of the 18th ultimo the true views of the principality of Monaco; they are faithful representations, and I gazed upon them long and fondly, as we dwelt upon the portrait of some dear friend from whom we have for years been separated.

As I recall the curious details of that antique structure—the Palace of Monaco—memory spreads an aera more before me wondering eyes the vision of the most remarkable procession, or sacred pantomime, that can be imagined. As it was an exhibition of a startling and unique character, perhaps you will not deem a description of it unworthy of a place in your columns, your previous paper having awakened an interest in the principality.

Some years ago, during a visit at Monaco, I had the advantage of being present at this religious pageantry, which takes place on the evening of Good Friday. The procession was formed in the court of the Palace and slowly defiled through the porte cochère. The most picturesque appeared was intended to represent a centurion. He was seated on horseback and clad in armor; his breast-plate was profusely covered with a most anachronistic collection of modern jewelry: earrings, breastpins, brooches, were all in heterogeneous confusion, the great object being to produce a glitter, and in that point he had perfectly succeeded. Then followed a number of men making various demonstrations of grief. Then came a person clad in a loose scarlet robe, girt around the waist with a rope; this was intended to represent Jesus. He was followed by a man who, over and anon, smote him upon the shoulders, upon which his person wearing the scarlet robe would meekly turn the other cheek and receive another buffet; this was repeated at intervals of about three minutes as they passed along. Then followed a young girl with long and beautiful hair floating on her shoulders; in her hand she carried a small alabaster box: this was Mary Magdalen. Other young girls followed her, two by two. Then came another Jesus, clad like the first, followed by a man who scourged him. Then came a maiden, who, turning from side to side, displayed a square of linen on which was painted the portrait of our Saviour. I was told this was St. Veronica, who gave Jesus a handkerchief to wipe the drops of agony from his brow, and all pious Catholics declare that the face of our Saviour remained imprinted on the cloth. Then came the three Marys, weeping. Then another Jesus, carrying an immense cross (made of thin board, however), beneath the weight of which, from time to time, he fell to the earth. Unfortunately for the solemnity of the scene, this last personage was represented by a worthless fellow, who might be daily seen reeling and tumbling about under the influence of the juice of the grape just as he now staggered and fell under the weight of the cross. Here followed a man with a sponge on the point of a lance: this he offered occasionally to the (supposed to be) fainting and exhausted cross-bearer. They seemed to have forgotten that the cross was borne by "Simon, a Cyrenian." Then followed ten throwing dice for the seamless garment, and seeming to struggle for the spoil. There were others representing Jesus—five or six in all—but I have forgotten their particular attributes. The procession was lengthened by different confraries—the red, the blue, and the white—all enveloped in loose robes with hoods over their heads, having holes cut in them for the eyes. These were followed by de[illegible] some of whom followed barefoot. Half it toll bells for the infi[illegible] of strangers who come to witness this religious pantomime there would have been more actors than spectators, for two-thirds of the population were walking in it.

If the personage composing this sacred drama had been selected from among the pious members of the Church above, or if it had been conducted with due solemnity, there might have been something impressive and awe-inspiring in this long procession winding through the dark streets by torchlight. There was, however, little calculated to produce such an effect; but, on the contrary, much that elicited a smile of scorn or a shudder at this profane trifling with holy events. The whole affair is merely got up to attract strangers to their highly impoverished town, who, for one day and night, crowd the hotel. It is calculated upon with the same anticipations of profit as they estimate the probable yield of their olives or lemon trees. Much, however, might be said in extenuation of a people ground to the dust by the exactions of a prince who imposes such heavy taxation upon the oil and lemons—their only available produce—that he derives a larger profit from them than does the poor peasant after all his toil and indefatigable labor.

The more intelligent of the priesthood disapprove very strongly of this mummery, and feel that it casts a shade of ridicule upon their religion; they have frequently essayed to suppress it, but without success. During the period when I was present the cure of the place forbade it, positively, and threatened to call in military aid to prevent it; upon which the infuriated inhabitants vowed they would throw their revered priest from the battlements into the blue Mediterranean, and so he was intimidated into allowing them to proceed as before.

DANCING BEARS IN INDIA.

THERE are more bears, perhaps, in North America than in any other part of the world, but hitherto they have been put to no use except as purveyors of grease, hams, and skins for sleighs. In the Himalayas the bear is more intelligent, and serves a more lofty purpose. The brave herdsmen of the Himalayas frequently take young cubs and train them to perform all kinds of antics—to dance, to smoke, to drink wine, to shake hands, etc., etc. The accompanying illustration represents a couple of educated bears, with their keepers, going through their exercises. They are a fortune to their owners.

DANCING BEARS IN INDIA.

CONCERNING A BIRD.

I.

THE fire of hickory logs burned dimly in the chimney-place, the red embers glowed and suggged, and sent out sparks which burned holes in the carpet, and made me run hurrying to kick them back. Without, the night was piercingly cold; the snow flew and rattled against the house; it lodged on the sash edge, and drew long, sloping lines upon the window-pane; it blew in under the door, and made small triangular spots in the corner of it. The last tea was white with frost, and the wind which swept down the mountain, and through the "Glen," told plainly of the inclement night. I never heeded it at all, but threw another log across the fire, and sat down to meditate. I watched the glowing coals as every one does, and fancied that I saw little red men walking in and out among them, that the white ashes were resting softly in the corner were their graves, where they should lie down after their fiery lives were ended and sleep sweetly. Then Patience, my wife, took down a book, and read aloud from its charmed pages.

What a cozy little place it was, to be sure! The bright brass andirons shining, and seeming to make grotesque faces at the little red men in the fire, who winked back again; the checked carpet, clean, though homely; the tick-tock clock on the mantle; the peppers which we picked last fall for the rheumatism, which troubles me occasionally; and that grim and quaint old bureau, with its tin sunlamb, its brass ornaments, which Patience keeps brighter than gold, made our humble little dwelling cheerful and happy; and I thanked the Father-not as the Pharisee did, that he had made me better than other men—but that, out of His bountiful providence, so much of good had fallen to me.

Just as I was dropping off in a doze—the reading having lulled me to sleep, and the little red men, getting tired of cutting up their capers, had rested quietly in their ashy graves—there came a tremendous rap on the outer door. There was a room between me and it, where the well was, the cheese-press, the milk-pots, and other elements of the dairy; and at first I thought the storm had allowed one of them to the shadow of the house, covered in snow.

"Squire Lee," he said, "there's a party in distress along here over my ground, and looking somethey had fallen, but a repetition of it soon convinced me that it was actual; so hastily brushing my hand across my eyes, and looking wonderingly at Patience, who looked the same as me, without a word I started in the direction opened by Mercy! the first blast of wind caught the door out of my hand, and sent it slamming against the wall, filling my clothes full of fine snow, and nearly taking my breath away. Then I looked, and saw my neighbor Hollister standing, muffled up in the shadow of the house, covered in snow.

"Squire Lee," he said, "there's a party in distress along here over my ground, and looking somewhat like the 'Glen,' and we must turn out and look for them. I don't like cries some kind, and don't seem to be getting them. Such a night as this one would not let a dog out knowingly. I need your aid. Will you help me search for them, Listen!"

Yes; it was true. Far above the roaring of the tree tops, the rushing of the fierce wind, I heard that awful cry upon the night—Help! help!" and a shriller cry, in a minor key, that struck painfully on my heart. Without waiting for an instant, I hastily equipped me, and telling Patience to be ready in case of need for sufferers, I took my stable lantern and set out.

Out into the bleak and desolate night. We took hold of each other's hands—counted—and off we —and wrestled with the storm. It hurled its masses of wind and snow heavily against us, as if to beat us back from our errand of mercy. The heavy drifts clogged our feet painfully at every step, and more than once, as I stumbled and fell, among some heavy bank, I was on the point of sinking down myself. Though we knew the road perfectly, it seemed strange to us, and getting confused, stopped for a moment to consult. Again the cry, and this time so near that we struggled on again through the driving snow-clouds, striving to reach them. Now to the right —now to the left—as the wind blew the sound into our ears, until, when we were nearly ready to give up our fruitless search, we at last caught sight of them.

A man was standing at a horse's head, holding the plunging and rearing beast from breaking away altogether; and a little place in the snow, more level than the rest, told us plainly they had been overturned, but were now righted again.

Dimly through the storm we could see some figures seated in the sleigh. As soon as they had discerned our little light they all set up a shout together; and the man cried out, in a voice thin with cold,

"For God's sake, friends, lend us a hand here! We are nearly perished in this cursed place. My wife and child are nearly perished with cold, to say nothing of myself and beast. Lead us out quick! We can't stop to parley us to turns. Get us under cover as soon as possible!"

Assuring him that he was in good hands, and would soon be all right again, we—revived and inspirited, now that we had found the object of our search—set to work with alacrity, and soon had the horse, mad with cold and affright, detached from the sleigh. It drove into the road, and, all pilling in, were galloping like the wind toward the house. When we reached there, which we did in a few minutes, I saw, through the storm, Patience at the lighted window watching for us; but for all she could have seen out she might as well have looked in the cellar. But her good heart so longed for us that she sent it out through her eyes to welcome us in.

We bundled them out pretty quick, Neighbor Holcomb and I—and we were none too quick, for they had all relapsed into a stupor, brought on by their cold and exposure, and, stiff and cramped, by sitting so long in one position, and Rebel, old as he was, slowly to the house. Then I returned, and took the sleigh and drove around under the shed, leaving Patience to take care of her patients. I soon cared for the beast; and left my neighbor to cut the feed of his own team, thanking him for calling on me.

When I got into the house again my guests—as I considered them—were doing very well, what with the roaring fire we had, and a little stimulus which was necessary to thaw their frozen blood; and I had time, for the first, to look at them. The father was a man of fine commanding presence, and the mother a quiet, retiring little person, whose manner and face took the heart at once a captive. But then the daughter—for there were only two in all—how shall I speak of her without being extravagant in terms? A light, graceful figure, scarcely fit to stand alone, looking as though it wanted some one to lean on; beautiful golden hair, and a profusion of it, knotted and twisted around her head, as though she did not know what to do with it all; an eye like that of the wild gazelle's skin, set in a face as fair, spiritually and physically, as ever mortal eye looked on.

When I entered the father rose and thanked me in a quiet and sensible way, which bespoke the high-bred gentleman, and, falling, fainted. I came at the most critical period, as they were fast giving way to that death-like torpor which mercifully sends over those frozen to death, and standing at once in terms of praise which I must be excused for not endeavoring to describe. I gave them, after all the credit of the rescue, as it was in truth his. It was, in good earnest, a close touch to life and death. One and the last lump of sugar, and ignorant of the way, would have soon been snowed under and perished.

The first thing they wanted was rest and quiet; and we soon had the spare bedroom ready, with a little room off for the daughter; and Rebel was shut up, and retired for the night.

The morning after the storm broke clear and bright; the sun, as if ashamed of having been so long concealed, now dazzled our eyes with his beams.

We were seated at breakfast with our guests, and mid-winter though it was, a small wild bird's concerts, when from out the little porter which joined our kitchen there came a peal of music such as I never heard before. She fed frequently from my hand, and I sat open-mouthed in amazement. It went on, and at last I could run and get Patience and musical, as it were a song of thanksgiving and praise fresh from the heart. I looked in vain for from one to another of my guests. I saw we had no such creature in the house of our own, whatever it was. At last I asked on the daughter.

"It's only my bird," she said.

"Only your bird? What do you mean?—forgetting myself for the moment—'only' your bird? If that be a bird which just now sung, then I never heard bird before."

"I'll go and fetch him, that you may see for yourself."

She went, and returned bearing in her hand a little wicker cage—such a one as we see birds inserted in—set it down before us, and was then awaited its pleasure.

It was a funny little thing. It had a black crest on its head, which curled as it was in song. I enjoyed very unconcernedly french to perch, and pipe—set completely at my wit's beads of what—by which small way, "I am very fine; admire me."

"Let us hear him sing, if you can persuade him," I asked.

"Oh! very readily. He is well-trained, is Cherry, and sings at the word of command."

She raised her forefinger, and said to it, "Sing, Cherry!"

The little yellow ball of feathers straightened itself, stropped its beak to its satisfaction upon the perch, and broke out into very perceptible hums and haws, and let loose again. What a melody it was! It sung of green trees; of meadows fresh with flowers; of warm sunshine; of a summer sky; of fervent heats; of cooling shades, dells noisy with brook, and a thousand other things. Then it stopped. No one spake. I filled with the sweet thoughts which crowded on me thick and fast, and the rest, I think, in the same.

Where did you get this priceless bird, my little lady?"

"Carl gave it me," she said.

"And who is Carl, might I ask?"

The father then spoke up and told me. "This bird," said he, "came into our possession in the following manner: About a year and a half ago a young German was coming to this country. On leaving the land they were cast away on the Scylla of modern manners. They were poor; and, out of all his effects, only this bird and a few dollars did he save. 'For,' as he said himself, 'he is very kind and a rare singer. If he die, my comrade is gone.' He was of good parentage, was the German, and well brought up; and, like a sensible man, has set out to earn his own living on a farm hard by in a neighboring city—we retaining the bird in our possession at his request. He comes occasionally to see us in our house at Hartford, to teach us the feeling and education of it."

I should have liked very much to have asked him which bird he came to see; but did not think it altogether polite. I wondered how it escaped the violence of the storm; but supposed it was such a little thing they had it snugly wrapped up.

"Ah," said my little lady, "you should hear him sing when Carl comes to see us!" her eye lighting as she mentioned the name. "He has a different song then from the one which he generally sings. Should you choose to hear it?"

"I should choose," I said.

"Sing, Cherry!" with the finger raised.

He forgot a golden chain—that is his throat, on which my heart run straight to heaven. We were all hushed and stopped to listen. The very chair or train of thought that we had been for many a day, we sat a while calmly; but as we could not hear the bird sing and talk at the same time, it soon went about our several businesses—I to the village, having given myself to my guests, as my duties were urgent, and Patience to her household cares.

The following day my friend—for so his gentlemanly bearing and sound heart had brought me to consider him—and I were the same as we were broken as to warrant his setting out again on his journey. So he took his horse and sleigh and started. I was delighted to have had to be allowed to stay a week or so that he at last relactantly consented. We, having no children of our own, were very glad to have her. So Fairy—she was so like one that I will call her thus—and the bird stayed. She was but a little innocent at first without father or mother; but with the little household cares she was pleased to busy herself with, time never hung heavy on her hands. The week changed to a fortnight, and that to a further period, when I found myself in love as I never remembered to have done before, and as he was pleased to say he was in love with me. So my little romance was indefinitely postponed. Little parties and social circles occupied the time pleasantly, and in that small neighborhood I was looked upon as the very views of life, young though she was, and were all the more beautiful for that.

Only a few days after the occurrences narrated above, I noticed one day, while coming up the road, a strange-looking sleigh, with a bell, and which I never had seen before, standing at the gate. There were also some strange feet in the hall; and sure enough, when I reached my house, Fairy came running to greet me, saying, "Uncle"—she sometimes called me so—"there is some one for his bird." And a tall, elegant gentleman stepped forward, signifying, with a bow, that some without invitation in language at once so fluent that one could never detect a trace of his native accent, it took him a minute or two to get over, he afforded, of course. The afternoon wore away in pleasant talk. The bird was introduced, rehearsed some of foreign travel, incidents he had passed through, and chested life's brief hour of every sharpness.

"You have a rare bird there, sir," I said.

"I have, and could never tire of it; but I think the song of the bird is the one he sang after his deliverance from the storm."

"How this one now," he said; "for he has a very fine voice—my little pet—I am informed on in military attitude, threw his hair back from his forehead, and, with his head in the air, seemed to literally regurling him, with his head first on one side and then on the other, "Hist, sing!"

The crest rose, the golden chain throat swelled, the feathers quivered, and then it rolled forth cheerily, cheerily—oh! how cheerily—the notes being thinking sweetly over its pebbly bottom; swifter, faster, and more furious now, like the waterfall pouring impetuously over the height, and then into a magnificent tide of song that eclipsed all I ever heard—bright flakes played, thunderbolts nodded and rung their floral chimes, and humming-birds fitted on glistening winds through gardens of sweet-smelling flowers, and only the bird sang. I held my hands over my ears lest it should run down to my heart and kill (and contagiously) it. It went with song. A surfeit of music filled and clayed us, as the breath of new-mown hay doth the senses when it long inhaled in it; and then it was silence, by the master—not the teacher, God wot its teacher—leaved his head, and gave for the thousandth time perhaps he had heard its melody.

"I was afraid," said he, "he had forgotten his cunning." He then, with the point of my teaspoon, little bully, although I think the cage is a little too small (bad contemplation!)." It was sweet with song. A surfeit of music filled and clayed us, as the breath of new-mown hay doth the senses when it long inhaled in it; and then it was silence, by the master—not the teacher, God wot its teacher—leaved his head, and gave for the thousandth time perhaps he had heard its melody.

As I live the little red men were there again, darting as of old, and with the same whistling up the smoke and making themselves ridiculous with their antics. "Patience," I said, "how do you like your new pets eh?"

She looked shyly up at me, and seeing the drift of my remark, answered me with a cunning little laugh.

"Maybap he knows where there is a larger cage, since the other is not large enough."

She was provokingly silent and non-committal.

"I say, Fairy, what do you think of them? Can you make one of your brilliant remarks now—it's such a fine chance? Be a little sarcastic, please."

Only the more she pets me."

She looked sl

ull behindhand in taking part in the proceedings. That prince of song—silent till now since his master's return—he surpassed himself, his top-knot nodded and trembled with the violence of his song, for when the ceremony was ended and we were all laughing, crying, and shouting together, the noise made him break forth again.

It was as if an angel played upon a flute of pearl and the theme were God. It dispelled all doubt and fear, made clear the devious ways of life, sang sweetly and cheerfully of that other state which is beyond the stars, bore purer and softer light to us than they, and left our souls clear and pure for the impress of that divine love which passeth all understanding. It soared lightly to the vault of heaven itself, and then it came again, swelling in the air and glorifying the room, until haloes of it seemed to rest upon the darling wife's head as the halo round the saint; now lightly piping, now richly warbling; faintly and low, like a young mother lulling her babe to sleep; then flashing melodious hymns out over all, like the lapping of the waters sea upon the strand; sweeter, lower, fainter still, till at last it died away altogether, leaving our hearts entranced with its melody.

It was the king of birds, and its name was Cherry.

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

Christmas Prayer in the Anglican Church—Christmas Fêtes and Presents—Concerts—Christmas Eve—Shrub times in Paris—Abuse of Ice Holidays—The vivid Queen's Beauty and Fashion—A conversion of Faust—The Protestant Bauer, etc.

PARIS, December 30, 1858.

I THINK I can not better begin my letter of the first year than by quoting some part of the eloquent prayer I listened to on Christmas Day, in the English part of the usual service of the English Church, of which the Rev. Mr. Gurney is the clergyman. It is "for blessings on the anniversa ion of the United States"—and to the effect that the Anglo-Saxon race upon both sides of the Atlantic "may be enabled manfully to perform the work which God has called upon them to do;" and for which I say Amen!

Christmas in France is only a religious fête, not one of social or family interest; and as it is in many of the inhabitants of other countries resi dents here, that Christmas-trees and Christmas-dinners, turkey-s and-plum-puddings, are almost as numerous as in their native lands. From several invitations for the evening of the Christmas I selected one at the house of one of the German Ministers, where the Christmas-tree was in the perfection of its arrangement, of towering height, and beautifully decorated; and from it were distributed to each of the family and guests a present or mir of the occasion. The lady of the mansion is our country-woman; and her engaging, graceful manners, uniting feminine kindness of heart with her an ornament of the diplomatic circle, and endear her to all admitted to her intimacy. The party assembled was small, but brilliant—the corps diplomatique, of course, and French of the Faubourg St. Germain. Among them, as the most worthily bears a historical name, and his duchess, whose ancestor was contemporary with Louis Quatre's pleasant and gallant injunction to him to hang himself because a certain battle had been fought without him. The dark-eyed grandson of the beau des beaux does not belie the blood, for she is known to be one of the true country-women's number that which makes of them affectionate wives and devoted mothers. There is every day creeping into Paris society more of the domestic sentiment and more of that refinement of luxury which makes the name display of magnificence and extravagance for a few or a larger number of guests. On this occasion, for thirty persons, there was entertainment so fe a hundred; and I have been lately to several dinner-parties, composed of six or eight persons, where the dinner were lighted with a ball, and the viands and the wines, and the graceful subject of fresh flowers, were all that the most fastidious formerly rare even in dinners of ceremony, and which much astonishes the sober and economical French of the old school.

My list of these parties was one summoned to partake of some cunning duck which had been sent brought in the Aroya. You would pity me if you knew how few times in my life I have had the opportunity of eating that best and most renowned of American dainties. It was amusing to see the re-appearance of the faces of some of the low vessels of my club to whom I announced in the morning the good fortune which was in store for me. Some of them were on shore soon only to live to order and to eat their dinners; and the thought of this unknown delicacy of which they could not attain, excited, I am sure, more envy than if I had told them I had the promise of an introduction to the most beautiful eyes of Paris, of the demi or my other monde. The cavaradacks grovelled, scratched, and were not invited to the lovely birds of Maryland thus to profane their recondite taste.

Paris is fast filling up. The French are returning; and taxes are Russians and Americans are coming up for the delicacy in number of English and Anglo-Americans. But Paris is not pleasant or brilliant as yet. There has been a dull week's absence of sunshine, and the dampness and mud of the streets is something too depressing and annoying, making it impossible even for us masculines to pay visits on foot, or to enjoy the once agreeable lounge among the shops and the pretty passers-by. And there is not only the dirt of rain and Macadamized streets are in miserable confusion, with some houses being pulled down, others erected, and these formidable works for the drainage, which flood them with dirty water, and fill them with holes which, in spite of all precautions, have already occasioned several carriage accidents. Health and symmetry are promised out of this chaos; but, for the time, the City of Delight is despoiled of its outward life and enjoyment.

But there is compensation to be found within (I do not mean its homes, but its theatres). I went, not long ago, to the Italiens, to hear Alboni and Graziani in "Il Giuramento," with the music of which, I believe, in New York, you are already familiar. It is new here, and has been well received—thanks, perhaps, to the admirable staging of these thoroughly Italian operas. Without the same beautiful music in it, I doubt its ever taking a place among the chosen operas of the Parisians. As usual in the early season, the audience was mostly composed of strangers and travelers, and there were two boxes filled with diplomatic and renowned personages; and I was amused to see the eagerness with which the opera-glasses were scanned each other, particularly the two heroines (if such they be called). In one was the discreet (if not ugly) face of the ex-envoy and winning countenance, of the Countess de B——, (the former lover of Lord Ellenborough's wife), and in the other, rather tame-looking, but gentlemanly, English husband by her side—looked as proud and as happy as the most proper of English couples. In the box opposite, the new Lady C——n was more conspicuous in her style of dress, and in the evident enjoyment of the attention she excited. Her diamonds, however, have been compared to the rivalries of Oriental effect. Her hair was bound with golden coins; her dress was of white muslin, with a sash à la Empress Eugenie, and her bouquet, (the gold embroidery, gave her a sort of "Light of the Harem" air, perhaps not inappropriate. She is not pretty, but her eyes are dark and expressive, and she seems lively and graceful. Lord C——n kept closely by her side, and I am sure did not dislike being looked at too, as he is well known to be object to being conspicuous.

I have been to see "Faust" at the Porte St. Martin, where it is made into a superb melodrama, which has created a delightful audience to numerous representations. I need not say it is perfectly got up, and that the poetry of the original is condensed in the representation of "Marguerite;" but "Faust" looks so merely sensual that it destroys the charm, and makes the whole idea of the original, who seems to me rather to have been regarded as a mental study of the human heart—which a highly intellectual nature derives from its own power of investing every thing with a certain charm. There is a young actress in the whole who creates a she-devil, whose name of "Mademoiselle Sulpherine" reminds my fancy as particularly well chosen and French.

There was last week the annual Fancy Fair for the Female Prisoners of Paris, given by a society of ladies, who themselves make and give all the articles disposed of at the bazaar, and by the pupils of schools in Paris and the Departments. It is presided over by the illustrious Guizot, and supported by the beautiful and gifted Mme. Haussmann, Bettingoes, and many others of the honored and fashionable women of Paris. Many fashionable dames," as the French exid of them. The result of the two days' sale was fifteen thousand francs—pretty well for gin-cushions!

But my letter must finish; and if the sun will only shine upon me with the new year, I promise to be more gay next week, and to endeavor to do justice to what is really a pleasant and interesting national fête, the year Do'n'A'n Pursue.

PROBLEM XIV.

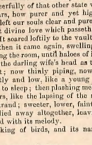
BLACK.



WHITE.

White to play and checkmate in three moves.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A. B. (Baltimore). We believe not. Herr Anderssen, the gallant player, is likewise an accomplished Professor of Mathematics, resident at Breslau.——J. M. B. (Forest de Lac, Wisconsin). Your problem with your first Chess column thereto contained, is received, and referred most forthwith.——"Four Plates." An introduction to one of the officers or members of the New York Chess Club, or of Brooklyn, is all that is necessary to insure to a non-resident a gratuitous call.——"A Subscriber" (Westminster). How can you expect the proprietors of this paper to give advertisements to other periodicals by devoting valuable space to sweet such queries?——J. S. C. (Nashville). Your Problem is quite sound, and very neat; but, as a general principle, two-mover Problems are scarcely suitable for this publication.——"Franklin," "G. B.," "Learner," and some others will see the above as applied to their contributions.——Carrie and Louie. Exceptions always there also are to the rule. In Chess III, in the variation you propose, White plays, 2. Q to K1 and checkmates next move.——"Crowe." Your four-move strangers appears to be by no means below mediocrity, but scarcely sufficiently above par for present use.

Solutions to various Problems already given in the Weekly have been received from various contributors. For the most part they are correct; but considerably otherwise. In order to satisfy correspondents as to which category they write, time and space compel us to refer them to the current numbers of this paper. Irrespective of the above, we have much correspondence which, as wells, as yet, we have not had an opportunity even to glance.

THE NEW WORLD AGAINST THE OLD.

The following well-contested game is one occurring in the late great match between Mr. Paul Morphy and Herr Anderssen. The opening is that termed Ruy Lopez Gambit Queen. Black's third move, "K B to Q Kt 5," is the move which is the application of the principle which generally considered to give first-player somewhat more than his usual advantage that is obtained from the adoption of most any other method of commencing a game.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

"As handy as snuff in a rap," is a cant phrase sometimes used. In origin we do not know; but here is a story that might originate a new one. "I say, Jack, is Adam Smoaker's snuffers."

"Why, Tom, about a fortnight of years ago, came to Huntingdon Furnace, and seeing there, for the first time, a pair of snuffers, asked—

"What's them for, eh?"

"Why, to snuff the candle."

"Snuff the candle! Whatever for?"

The candle just then needing attention, Adam with his hands and fingers snuffed off the snuff, and carefully poked it into the snuffers, saying,

"Well, see, that's what they're for."

Speaking of furnaces, there is a story told of a furnace-stoker, to which a boy went to buy potatoes.

"Mother says, how much are they a bushel, but we have onions."

"Why," said he, "let's see yer onions."

"Don't know as I ground it could be superhuman) Now (very angry). "Curious! them's veg-etal!"

A gentleman balling from that island of the sea so noted for its potatoes and shillalahs purchased a fine bowling bull. Mac, getting rather excited in a controversy with a fellow-tar, told him, by way of settling the dispute, that "his head was so soft that it was hard to give any thing to him."

The young lady who lives with us attended in dancing general house-work, complained the other day of a difficulty in getting her feet to "go right" in the various steps of dress (quick). I said to take a broom-handle and hook the dress, and, after making some wry faces, looked up and said, "Ah-ha, Miss, is them Holloway's Pills you're after giving me?"

A young M. D., one of the lower counties of EastTennessee, was driving a gig-load of his fair friends and gallants, and it so happened (as is frequently the case in those parts) that the landlady of the house of stop-loans served up for his discretion of her gentle-folks a dish of fried chicken. The doctor, who was a lively, romantic lad, thought to himself, "Here's a delightful field of beaus that one of them upon his distributed around, then no hurt will come to a hen-too-hen-nor any accidents." "Oh! I wish I hadn't a volunteered.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRIDAY EVENING, Saturday, Jan. 29, 1859.

The week ending this day has been very cheerful in financial circles, and the feeling of confidence is general. Were it not for the rumors of war which reach us from Europe, it would be safe to count upon one of the most prosperous years that the commercial world has lately had. In money matters, the chief event has been the subscription for the new Ten Million Loan, which is to close to-day. It is generally expected that it will go much lower than the last, 98½ in the neighborhood of 102 @ 103, partly in consequence of the unsettled state of European affairs, and partly from the uncertainty which exists to the amount of the further necessities of the Government.

Money is slightly dearer than it was last week, and financial institutions show an increased unwillingness to enter into long engagements. Exchange on Europe is above the specie-shipping point, and every steamer has on some ounces of gold.

Stocks are lower, as a general rule. The public are not speculating or buying for investment; under these circumstances, it is matter of a question of time when the decline shall take place. It has now begun.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 29, 1859.

The Wholesale Produce Markets exhibit increased activity during the leading kinds of breadstuffs. The Flour and Grain trade has been quite brisk, and the highest figures. Holders are not eager sellers. Provisions keep steady, but closed quite briskly and buoyantly. Provisions, Groceries, Rice, Tobacco, Seeds, Fruit, Hides, and Naval Stores, have been more sought after. Hay, Hemp, Hops, Lime, Lime, Tallow, and Whisky have been quiet. Oils, Leather, Tin, and Wool have been in fair demand. The movements in Dry Goods are becoming quite extensive. Buyers from distant Southern and Western markets have arrived freely in spring for, and, in many instances freely purchasing, Spring and Summer goods. The jobbing trade is also improving, and there is every reason to expect a good season. Cotton and are ready to meet the wants of their customers. Woollens have been generally inquired after sparingly, anticipating a vigorous and successful trade. The principal article of Cotton Goods—both Domestics and Foreign—are especially stiffly held, and are in lively request. The amount of the week's sales at the Dry Goods has been $1,703,505 against $503,213 the same week last year. The imports since January 1st have been $2,114,448 against $1,744,648 same time last year. The movements in other commodities have not been characteristic of any remarkable changes.—We append a revised list of the closing wholesale prices prevailing, articles:

BIBLICAL ILLUSTRATIONS DRAWN FROM THE MANNERS AND CUSTOMS, THE SCENERY AND SCENES OF THE HOLY LAND.

BY W. M. THOMSON, D.D.,

Twenty-Six Years a Missionary of the A.B.C.F.M. in Syria and Palestine.

With two elaborate Maps of Palestine, an accurate Plan of Jerusalem, and several Anndred Engravings, representing the Scenery, Topography, and Productions of the Holy Land, and the Costumes, Manners, and Habits of the People. In large 12mo, pp. 800.

PRICE THREE DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS.

The work of Dr. W. M. Thomson, entitled "The Land and the Book," has for many years enjoyed the rare advantage of a long residence in the Holy Land, with special facilities for travel and exploration—a familiar knowledge of the languages of the Bible, and the consequent longings of the heart, which have led to a careful study of the manners and customs, characteristics of the soil, and the scenes connected with the ego and the mind of the reader. As literary evidence, the physical characteristics and the local and domestic habits of the land in which the Bible was written, and with which it is permanently associated. This is done with scrupulous accuracy, with fidelity to the sacred text, and at the same time in a popular and engaging style. The work will prove a most valuable aid in the study of the Bible, and will greatly enrich the stores of those who are called to expound it in the pulpit or in the Sabbath-School.

Our personal observation of the habits and manners of the people of Palestine enables us to add that the Pictures of the Land and the Inhabitants are drawn with the utmost fidelity and reliable, and we cordially recommend them to all who seek a better understanding of the Sacred Scriptures.

HUMPHREYS'

Specific Homœopathic Remedies,

For Domestic and Private Use,

Stand confessedly at the head of remedial means for the use of the people. They are alike removed from the palaverous, dangerous, and repulsive dose of nauseous or old-school practice; the inconvenience of water-cure, or the irritating and perplexing obscurities of the usual Homœopathic books and medicines. Consisting of simple, safe, and reliable means adapted to suit any one's taste; put up in the form of sugar pellets; and prepared of ingredients neither dear nor troublesome, they are at once the ready resource of the household nurse, and are the comfort of the complaining or invalid.

They possess these positive advantages. They are harmless; no injury can arise from their use. They are simple; they always know what to take, and how to take it. They are convenient; you can give the proper dose and at a moment's warning, without hesitation or delay. They are efficient, in thousands of cases disease is arrested at once, and all the grave relieved without protraction or delay.

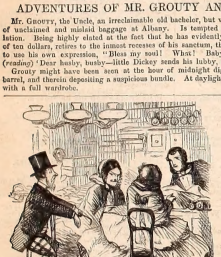
ADVENTURES OF MR. GROUTY AND HIS NEPHEW AT THE AUCTION SALE OF UNCLAIMED BAGGAGE AT ALBANY.

MR. GROUTY, the Uncle, an irreclaimable old bachelor, but very keen at a trade, attends the sale of unclaimed and mislaid baggage at Albany. Is tempted to purchase a carpet-bag on speculation. Being highly elated at the feet that he has evidently secured a prize for the small sum of ten dollars, retires to the inmost recesses of his sanctum, there to gloat over the treasure, when, to use his own expression, "Bless my soul! What! Baby-linen! dolls! shoes!—oh! letters! (reading) 'Dear hasby, busby—little Dickey sends his lubby, bubby, to his dear pappy, appy!'"

Grouty might have been seen at the hour of midnight digging a hole in a neighboring ash-barrel, and therein depositing a suspicious bundle. At daylight a poor ragpicker's child was blessed with a full wardrobe.

MR. ADOLPHUS GROUTY, the nephew, hears of the sale of baggage, and is delighted at the idea of buying something that would make a magnificent gift to be presented to Miss Bangum, the lovely object of his affections. Attends the sale, and becomes the possessor of a large black leather bag—very heavy. Visions of silver spoons, &c., &c., all—all his—for only $20 33. Happy thought!—Silver ware may be a little worn—will invite Object and affectionate mother to witness the opening of aforesaid bag—tell them a romantic story about old aunt having died and left him all her plate, &c. Grand tableau! Softly opens bag, instead of plate, burglar's implements—Can not explain.—Lovely daughter falls into mother's arms blessing her stars that she did not marry a burglar. BADGUM senior hands ADOLPHUS over to the police.



THOUGHTFUL MOTHER-IN-LAW.—"I am sure, dear, you had better choose the dearest. A few dollars more or less are of little consequence in comparison with your feelings. Don't you think so, MR. JONES?"

COUNTRY HELP.—BILL. "What, Sammy, left the Doctor's already?"

SAMMY. "Guess I did, Bill. When I spoke to the missus about wages, says she, 'Oh! go 'long, Sam, you don't want no money; when you've got a toothache, the doctor'll draw the tooth, and won't charge nothing for it.' Ain't it prime?"

PREMATURE LOSS OF THE HAIR.

Which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of Burnett's Cocoaine. It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and has never failed to arrest its decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth. It is, at the same time, unrivaled as a dressing for the hair. A single application will render it soft and glossy for several days.

We can concur heartily in the many commendations of the "BRONCHIAL TROCHES," prepared by the Misses BROWN. At the very time they were brought to our notice, we were suffering from a severe cold, from which we obtained immediate and permanent relief, by the use of the TROCHES. If any of our readers are suffering from bronchial irritation, particularly ministers or public speakers, they will find that this simple remedy will bring almost magical relief, and enable them to speak with little difficulty or suffering.—Boston Christian Watchman and Reflector.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—NO. 110. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

New-Year's Day—The poor Fruiterer's Children—The Count de ——— and his Boon Visit—Visit to the American Embassy—Mrs. Mason and her Daughters—The Empress's remark to Baron Haussmann—A New York Belle at Court—Beauty of the Empress—Fete of Madame Castiglione—How she procured her Beauty—Prospect of Winter Gayeties, etc., etc.

PARIS, January 5, 1859.

NEW-YEAR'S DAY was all that could be wished in the way of weather. The pavement was dry, and the sun positively shone for two or three hours. This was cheering; for as it is the fete alike of rich and poor—of those with carriages and those without—it is a pleasure when their last can move about without difficulty, and without having their best clothes spoiled. Every one, the meanest and poorest, has visits to pay and dresses to give and to receive.

There is a little fruiterer's shop which I can see from my window. It is on the ground-floor, and above it is a small, low room, where the proprietor, a cobbler, works, while his wife inside the shop helps. They have two fine little children; and I was distressed all the morning thinking they were to have no toys. The mother was busy selling oranges to the holiday-folks, and the child, who was all the time tugging at her skirts, eyed wistfully the dolls and drums of others, but seemed to have no other gift in them. The other child was with the father above, who was cobbling away as if forgetful of the fête. Late in the afternoon, however, just as I had made up my mind to send my own servant to the rescue of the fête of these children, I saw the pale father, in best attire, go out—I suppose to some of the stalls on the Boulevards—and soon return with doll and drum, and two or three pencils, and a satisfied smile upon his face; and then I felt relieved, and I knew that their holiday supper and their little gift would have more joy and more meaning, as the result of their own exertions and the expression of their simple love, than any thing I could bestow; and that this was indeed that "joy with which a stranger intermeddleth not."

And so every body went out—even my terrible enemy, the young Count de B——, who lodges over my head, and whose days are spent in eliciting sounds and noise from various musical instruments, to the great disturbance of my nerves and patience. His favorite instrument seems to be the bass viol; and I think he must take it to bed with him, since I hear the sound at such strange and unexpected hours. The truth is, the life of this young man is that of those minds of Frenchmen. All day in the house, reading novels and practicing music; going out at six o'clock to dine at a café or elsewhere; and then to the theatre, or to play billiards, or what not; and coming in at four o'clock in the morning, to begin the same thing over again the next day. It makes my Saxon blood hot within my veins to think of such an existence. How lazy you will think the Count might ask me! why I bring my Saxon blood to his country to be thus disturbed by its usages?—that he chooses to play the fiddle all day because it amuses him—that he does not go out for air or exercise because it is cold, and the mud would spoil his varnished boots—that one person likes one thing, and one another—and that my country is large enough to have a place for me if this does not suit me!" all of which is very true; but I no nevertheless rejoiced that this new year season and its visits has laid to rest for a time the eternal sighing and screeching of that violin.

I paid many visits; one to the American Embassy, which seemed the very Temple of Hospitality (the French give nothing), with its delicious eggnog and plum-cake in profusion, and the warm, undeniable welcome of the host and hostess and their charming daughters. Mrs. Mason was dressed in a black moire antique—which, I must tell my fair readers, has rushed back this winter into greater vogue than ever. There was a momentary attempt to put it aside for watered silks; but it has asserted its own supremacy and that of Madame Roger, the most distingué gowns she furnishes being in that material.

The incident of the day was the remark made by the Emperor to the Austrian Embassador, and which has put all diplomacy in emotion, and excited alike the hopes and fears of those who wish and those who dread a European war. I do not quote the words, as they are in all the newspapers; but any one not accustomed to the importance attached to what falls from Imperial lips would have been astonished at the effect produced by them; and the writing of dispatches, the sending off of couriers, and the confusion at the Bourse which ensued.

At the reception at Court for the presentation of ladies I hear there were several of our countrywomen, remarkable for their beauty and for the grace with which they wore their trains, though whilom unaccustomed to such peacock's plumage. It is invidious on such occasions to particularize; but a young lady of New York has been named to me, by several of the English and French who were there, as distinguished by the admirable proportions of her form and for the ease and elegance of her movements. The Empress is in great beauty this year, having lost the look of suffering which the pains and perils of maternity long stamped upon her features. I like to hear she is looking well, for she has been for many years the especial object of my admiration. I knew her well as Mademoiselle de Montijo, when she spent almost every spring either in London or Paris; and I always looked upon her as a woman set aside from others of her sex for "la bright particular" destiny. There is something so complete in her beauty, in its way—such a rare harmony of face, form, and movement, combined with sweetness of temper and warmth of feeling, which make up one beautiful whole, quite unlike any thing but itself. I believe she passionately loved the Emperor, who, even in his days of poverty and adventure, is said to have possessed a wondrous power in attaching the affections of women. It is his own fault if he is not always a well beloved; but it is the most beautiful and the most gifted who are the least likely to forgive any transfer of homage, however momentary; and perhaps the episode of the Countess de Castiglione is not yet forgotten.

I have not forgotten her; and, though no longer among the themes of the day, shall I turn aside from them for a moment to describe to you this lovely Italian lady, who two years ago made such a sensation in Paris? She was the most poetical-looking of her sex, reminding one of Byron's heroines at once; and yet of those who knew her have told me that it was impossible to be more prosaic and dull in character and feeling. She was in early youth; her figure tall and full, but exquisitely modeled; her skin had the polish of a shell and its delicate tints; her eyes were large and lustrous; and her hair, of the same hues was wonderfully soft and abundant, and arranged with admirable regard to effect, as indeed was the whole dress, which, though peculiar, was always becoming. It is said that her beauty and its adornment and preservation were her only thought; and that, if the weather changed in the night, her maid had orders to bring a cambric handkerchief to protect her face from the cold; and that she always dressed for the evening in a very cool room, to avert the danger of an unbecoming flush. Her star, brilliant as it was, did not remain long above our Parisian horizon; and the lady has returned to her own land, and let us hope her charms and her frailty are alike forgotten.

And now the Court and official season has fairly begun, and through long weeks there will be balls and fêtes, "never ending, still beginning." Those of more private circles have not yet begun, and it is said do not promise to be so numerous or brilliant as usual. Many houses to which one is accustomed to look for fêtes are, from various causes, shut up—some from absences, others from death and mourning. The hotel of the English Embassy is undergoing repairs, which will prevent any thing there until late in the spring; and "We shall have no dancing!" is the despairing cry of mother and daughters.

But these things are always said at the beginning of every season; and yet I never knew Paris, not even in its republican days, when there were not balls and fêtes enough to satisfy the most avid and pleasure-seeking, and to weary heartily those for whom such vanities have lost their charm in losing their freshness and novelty. Paris, as long as it is Paris, will be gay, thoughtless, and excitable.

A DIFFERENCE OF OPINION.

FINE BRACING WEATHER. BITTER, BITTER COLD.

COLD.—THE LODGER OUT.

It is cold, cold, cold,
Bitterly, bitterly cold,
My garments are thin and old,
And the north wind's breath is keen.
The shadows no longer play—
Some ghosts! how they fade away
When Night round the couch of Day
Draws closely her velvet screen!

And the poor, poor Poor,
The groaning, shivering poor
Must a weary night endure—
They have borne a weary day.
Alas, that with shadows blind
The poor can not seek their FRIEND;
That knees are too cold to bend,
Even hearts too chilled to pray!

Stars peep down, down, down,
Blithely and merrily down—
I had rather that they would frown
Than smile at sight of our woe;
But the angels, that vigils keep
When the stars close their eyes and sleep,
Bend over us pitiuous to weep,
And their crystal tears are snow.

Oh, the rich, rich Rich,
The happy and favored rich,
Who doze in the chimney niche
And growl at "this bracing air;"
God send you may never know
The hunger, and want, and woe
That certain a couch of snow,
And mock at Poverty's prayer!

And these stones, stones, stones,
These icy and tingling stones,
On which I must stretch my bones,
And watch for the dawning light.
But, brothers, 'tis ours to endure!
All evils in time have an end;
Till then, oh, rich Rich and poor Poor,
May God love you all! Good-night!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1859.

THE NEW LOAN.

THE remaining half of the Twenty Million United States Loan of 1847 was advertised to be bidden on 24th January, at an average premium of about $2 40 per $100. The previous half of the loan sold at an average of $1 40 premium; so that, on the face of it, the national credit appears to have declined 24 per cent since August last. There are, however, reasons for the discrepancy which do not involve the financial credit of the country.

At the time the first half of the loan was issued to the public the commercial world was in the midst of a general process of liquidation. Business—not only in the United States, but throughout Europe also—was stagnant; and no man could tell, from the general symptoms that were apparent, when it would revive. Many persons who had gone through the crisis of 1837 and 1847 considered that at least five years would elapse before the active commercial movement of 1856 would be renewed. Under the circumstances the Government loan was eagerly welcomed by capitalists. Money in August last was not, on the average, worth over 3½ per cent. in the city of New York. A capitalist could thus afford to give a handsome premium for a five per cent. security. And, accordingly, the application for the loan were more numerous and more liberal than even the most sanguine person had anticipated. Now, circumstances are materially different. Business is visibly reviving. The impetus are very large. The manufacturers are overwhelmed with orders. Whatever may be the condition of the West, there can be no doubt but the South is richer than it ever was. The cotton growers, the sugarers, the iron and coal miners, and many other producers, are pretty certain to do well; and, as a natural consequence, trade is sure to be profitable at the great commercial centres. There is sure to be a large amount of paper seeking discount. Loans are certain to be offered for all kinds of industrial and commercial enterprises. However plentiful money may be at this particular moment, before the summer comes round it can be no doubt but we shall see a healthily-active money market. Men of means need be under no apprehension about their investments this year.

This consideration alone is sufficient to account for the apparent decline in the value of the United States Five Per Cents. Capitalists see that they can now do better with their money than by the Government stocks.

Other reasons have concurred in producing the result. With singular want of judgment the Secretary of the Treasury directed that the loan should be awarded without the July coupon; that, in effect, placing a bar on its sale till after July. This error was repaired on Tuesday, and the loan rose accordingly; but it was too late to prevent the transmission to Europe of the news that a premium of $2 40 had been the utmost the loan had obtained.

The uncertainty overhanging the Government finances likewise operated against the loan. It is certain that, even should Congress authorize the reissue of the Treasury Notes, a further loan of some twenty millions will be required for the ordinary service of the Government. Should Congress decide to redeem the public debt now existing in the shape of Treasury Notes, other twenty millions would be needed for this purpose. And should the popular scheme for the purchase of Cuba obtain favor at the hands of the National Legislature, other thirty millions may be called for on this account. Altogether it is quite possible that, before March next, Congress may authorize fresh loans to the amount of seventy, or even one year's gross income of the country. Every one can judge how such an avalanche of United States securities would affect the market. Should they be issued the people of this generation would see for the first—and, we hope, for the last—time Government Five Per Cents. selling under par.

Nor have the existing complications in Europe been without effect in deterring capitalists from bidding for the new loan. Austria, Russia, and Prussia are all in the market for loans ranging from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000; Great Britain wants $60,000,000 for India; France, 40 cents, needs the same sum. Of course, in case of war some of these loans would be sought at any sacrifice. It must not be supposed that such events are unforeseen either by such houses as the correspondents of the Rothschilds and the Barings. They suffice to vacuum for their reserve, and for the benefit of other financial houses which take the cue from them.

THE WORKING FARMER.

We give in another part of this paper the first of a series of agricultural articles under the heading of the Weekly Farmer. We hope that these articles will be duly considered by our agricultural readers. They are prepared with considerable labor by a gentleman whose experience in agricultural literature is extensive; and they are calculated to be, alone, worth the very small price at which this paper is sold. Many a farmer will save ten times the cost of this paper if he study these articles with the attention they deserve.

We do not intend to reflect upon any contemporary. But it is notorious that widely-circulated papers, just two or three days' issue, are not reading. contain articles on agricultural subjects which are designed to serve the private purposes of speculators. We hope the Weekly Farmer will run no risk of being deluded by the information contained in the Weekly Farmer in such journals. It will never conceal facts in order to serve private purposes. It will contain all the information which farmers want to know. No agricultural column will contain the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

THE END OF THE PACIFIC RAILROAD SCHEME.

On Thursday the Senate killed the Pacific Railroad Bill. Senator Simmons, of Rhode Island, a hard-headed, practical man, was the executioner who officiated on the occasion. It was manifest many days ago that the contest between the three proposed routes was too bitter to admit of compromise. The partisans of a Southern route seem to prefer no road at all to a Northern one; the advocates of the Northern route would have no road at all rather than the Southern road; and the central line was opposed by the sectional men on both sides. So, for the present, the Pacific remains a playground, and as Mr. Douglas says, all that remains to be done is to bury it decently.

In truth, the country has already poor just now to build military roads at a cost of eighteen months' national revenue. When the public income again leaves a fat surplus in the Treasury, the Pacific Railroad project will be revived with every prospect of success. But to propose it at a time when Government is positively on the eve to borrow to pay the ordinary expenses of the public service was, to say the least, preposterous. We believe that within the past month Mr. Cobb has actually postponed the payment of very small sums, and that but for the proposed Pacific road, which secured bidders for the new loan have shown in paying the amount of their bids into the Government. The ordinary public officers would have been seriously embarrassed in the discharge of their duties. To talk, under such circumstances, of appropriating hundred millions on a work which, however useful, may safely be postponed for a few years, is out of the question.

We have no opinion to express in favor of or against any of the three rival routes. It belongs to engineers to decide between them, and we hope that competent men will be chosen (if the Senate bill should pass the House), and that neither political partisanship nor sectional prejudice will be considered in the matter. It is loudly asserted that the location of the overland route to California is very ill chosen, and that deference to sectional feelings has induced the Government and the contractors to adopt a line which is not the best, or the shortest, or the safest. With this fact, or—to speak circumspectly—with these rumors before us, the Pacific Railroad question can not be approached too cautiously. It will never do to build a road in the wrong place in order to please politicians from this or that section of the country. If it be not built on the line best adapted for it, in respect of engineering capacities, and where it can obtain the largest amount of business, it had better not be built at all.

SENATORIAL ETHICS.

THE country will be glad to hear that the reports which were current a week since, and to which we, among others, gave currency, with respect to the late fracas in the Senate on the nomination of certain postmasters were exaggerated, and in many respects incorrect. It appears that Senator Davis, of Mississippi, did not tell Senators Douglas and Fitch that their language would subject the highwayman and the brave; and though the lie certainly did pass between Senators Fitch and Douglas, in reference to the unsound appointments in Illinois, there was, we are assured, none of the coarse language used which the Washington press and telegraph have reported. This is very gratifying.

The Senate, we are sorry to say, does not stand very high as a school of debate or of manners. Senators are more accustomed to deliver lectures than to make business speeches. They write out speeches, part, or the whole, of which they deliver to a yawning House, and which are subsequently published by order by the public afterward. Out of the sixty-four Senators at least thirty have such speeches to make, for the special consumption of constituents or admirers, on every leading topic. It happens rarely that two such speeches can be compressed into the limits of a day. The result is thus consumed in hearing the orations of Senators on one subject; and at the end of the month the general business of legislation and the subject is no further advanced than it was at the beginning. The Senate might, on this point, take useful lessons from the Parliament of Great Britain. In the British House a debate rarely lasts over one day. The great subject is many days; but it is not thrashed out in the third or fourth it is sure to come to a vote. Thus time is economized, and practical legislation advanced.

In respect of manners, the Senate of the United States is quite as much at fault. Every reader of Congressional proceedings can call to mind several instances within the past year or two in which Senator has called Senator a liar on the le. At least four duels be'ween Senators were on the tapis last winter. Already this session, one Senator has called another a liar, and Fitch—has grown out of th ntemperance of debate indulged in by Senato-.

Young men, looking to your seniors for their hot-headed impatience of control, naturally refer, in their defense, to the example that is set them by the grave and reverend body in the land. If a postmaster can not be confirmed or a customs tariff altered without the lie passing between Senators Douglas and Fitch, how can it be expected that young Smith and Brown will regulate their tea-pot tempers without foul language and a resort to pistols or bowie-knife?

The Senate of the United States is setting a bad example to the country. If the Senators do not respect themselves, they should at all events take some thought for the evil their example may be doing. Bullyism and ruffianism —in words and in deeds—should surely be rather the exception than the prize-fighter than the United States Senator.

THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

CONGRESS is at present much troubled about the diplomatic service. Some members think the service, in the abstract, a good institution, but object to the salaries which it involves. Others consider missions to Switzerland and Austria unnecessary. Some Senators think that the whole diplomatic service might be done away; which creates no little commotion in the breast of men who have been appointed to the country's service, and who, with fond emotion, hope to go out again under the like circumstances.

Embassadors have been defined as men who are sent abroad to lie for their country. Without questioning the accuracy of this definition, it may be doubted whether lying by such officials could, under any circumstances, be of use to any country. And if embassadors are only to tell the truth, it is obvious that they are mere supernfluities.

In the olden time, long before telegraphs, railroads, and steamboats—when there was no reliable post-office, and no truthful press to report events throughout the world—embassadors were a necessity. The King of France was never safe unless he knew what the King of England was about, and vice versa; accordingly, each monarch deputed a trusty spy to watch his brother sovereign, and the spies went by the name of embassadors—a grand Spanish name, sounding well, and meaning any thing but the truth. Even in these days embassadors—by handsome, intriguing, and misrepresenting—did about as much mischief as good. Still, they often served a useful purpose.

But in our day, when the press, aided by swift steamers, telegraphs, and railroads, presents the world with a daily record of what is happening in all parts of the world, the vocation of court spies is evidently gone. No foreign Government will dare to commit an act known as much, by his own observation, as Smith or Jones who takes the pains to read the Washington news in the New York Herald, daily. The British Government, with all their enormous diplomatic staff, has frequently confessed that it has been indebted to the London journals for its information respecting foreign affairs. As vehicles of intelligence, embassadors have been entirely superseded by the newspapers.

It will be said that they are useful in conducting negotiations. This may be the exception of some foreign nations; it is not ours. Our foreign ministers invariably complicate and embarrass every question the few foreign questions in which the United States are concerned. Look at the questions between this country and England, and between this country and France. Diplomacy has so tangled them—though they were simple enough at first—that it may yet need the sword to cut the knot. The pending questions between the United States and Great Britain might be disposed of in a week by five men of sense, if left to that task of peace and order; the diplomatists have been paid hundreds of thousands of dollars merely to complicate them.

As to the minor countries of the world, American diplomatic representation at their courts is an absolute fraud. Our American ministers to Switzerland, Austria, Turkey, Portugal, Persia, etc., must have some difficulty in restraining their pity for the people they think of their functions. The old functionaries at the feudal courts, whose sole duty it was to carry a silver rod, or a golden spoon, were efficient and laborious officers in comparison with the American ministers to these powers.

Consuls—with commercial jurisdiction—are necessary in every sea-port throughout the commercial world. The only advantage of diplomatic representation is, that it affords the Government of the day a graceful opportunity of rewarding political services.

THE LOUNGER.

PUBLIC RUGGING.

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—I observe that you keep a kindly eye upon the minor morals and manners, and that you have a most friendly all over the country, whose eyes are at your service, for the keeping of that eye. Now, as I am a fellow-passenger, it certainly is a great satisfaction to have some such generous ear into which to pour our private griefs. I have been asked, you will hardly think (I have used the word correctly; and yet do you not know that many a public nuisance may be a private offense?

"If you do not yet know, I will tell you. I am to take the next express train, almost, Sir, in the country—and you will be instantly convinced of it.

"I write to you, Mr. Lounger, in my rage to beg all young persons recently engaged or upon the point of engagement, recently married or upon the eve of marriage, to avoid the cars as the public cars. Yesterday I was obliged to take the train; and entering the car for the last or fourth seat occupied, except one by the side of a gentleman, who, I am happy to say, did not offer to fill his conversational void, a young man in the habit of pork; but saw that I wished to read, or sleep, or meditate in front of a lady. I took the low bay privacy because I had been obliged to travel by the cars.

"Well, Sir, I was reading, as it happened; but my attention was in vain directed to my book, for, in front of me, and of course, in front of at least twenty people—sat a young man and woman, reputably dressed, and of an unpossessing demeanor. The young lady—who, I am sorry to say, wore no gloves, but exposed a very pretty plump hand to the public gaze—was evidently desirously to become drowsy, and resting her head for a moment against the window, began to adjust the cushion of the seat, and, finding the postures equally uncomfortable, she threw herself upon the young man's bosom, and he encompassed her waist with his arm.

"Now, Mr. Lounger, it is a dreadful thing to suggest—but I am of opinion that the young woman was not sleepy! for after a very few moments she raised her head and placed that plump herself in the young man's embrace; who, very naturally, raised his arm until it found a more comfortable rest. He played with the tassel of her cape, he played with the end of her tippet, he played with her pretty plump hand; in fine, Sir, had they been lovers newly betrothed, or newly married, and sitting in the most absolute privacy, they could hardly have engaged in fonder dalliance.

"Had it been a single instance, Sir, I should have said nothing. I should merely have pitied the foolishness of two geese, and spared you and your readers the trouble. But, Mr. Lounger, it is very common. The 'traveling public is conversing the common railway car into a range of private chambers without walls. A party enters and turns over the back of a seat, and then encamps, as if there were nobody else within earshot or eye-shot. They sing, talk, scold, eat, and hug, as if they were behind stone walls and double-locked doors.

"Now, Sir, every body who comes into a car is bound to observe a certain propriety. He is bound to behave himself (yes, Sir, and herself) decently, and not to remember that the man or woman in the next seat has a right to the best behavior of their neighbors. In one of the papers this morning, Mr. Everett mentions the loud conversation of two men in a sleeping car, murdering sleep, and apparently not conscious that they were doing so unconsciously selfish. So in a hotel: a man comes out at midnight, or later, bumps along the passages to his room—singing, perhaps, or humming—blows his boots down before his door, bangs it after him as if he were not aware that people in the house who were paying quite as much money as he for their comfort, and at a time of night when everything else contaminates had a right to be a great blundering, blustering, noisy, selfish booby.

"What, Sir! I swear I warm with the theme.

"Mr. Lonegrr, I think a great many of this class of our fellow-beings may find chance to see this letter. If any one of them does so, let him consider that it is intended for him. Let me recollect carefully upon Hegel. Let him remember that in every car, or station, or hotel, however he may swagger and strut, there is always somebody watching him with disgust, and that in the Lounger there is always some one who will put the complaint and protest of that observer before the world.

"TRAVELLER."

"TRAVELLER states his case very well, as regards the whole, fairly; and whenever his letter is read in a railroad car, let the reader instantly look around him, and decide whether the protest is not just.

"THE END CROWNS THE WORK."

MR. MOTLEY'S History of the Revolution in the Netherlands in the Sixteenth Century" has been translated into French and published at Brussels, and, according to the correspondent of the Times, it has created astonishment, admiration, and enthusiasm.

But to those who know the author the greatest success in this matter is not that of the book but of the man. Mr. Motley, as an honored name in American literature, is, within proper limits, the subject of personal interest and regard, and his career is an illustration of the best quality of character. It has the charm which is so alluring in the story of Sir Philip Sidney, who, possessed of genius, and accomplished, would not allow his advantages to be swerved to mere self-indulgence, but forgot every thing but the pleasure of listening to it; but Mr. Motley, in a similar relative position, having published early years since two volumes of novels, which failed, instead of retiring upon mortification and disgust at want of public appreciation, undismayed by his failures, withdrew from a life of elegant leisure, and devoted himself, with enthusiasm, and patient industry, to the close investigation of one of the most momentous epochs of modern history, and has left with each successive public of the history of the great Prince of Orange—the head of early Protestantism as Luther was its brain—that last work of his, and which is perhaps the noblest of modern histories, and the author, who had vainly tried to pluck a little bay leaf, finds himself crowned with laurel. The Times correspondent writes that one of his foreign critics says: "He has made of his work the most complete, the most learned, and the most living tableau of the sixteenth century. Drama and history are as well as a monument of erudition. He has found the art of the historian, that difficult art so rare."

The Lounger remembers a like example of Mr. Motley to those of his friends who confide to him that they are not appreciated. Be sure that he will say thing that the world wants, the world will thank us warmly enough for doing it.

A SCAPE-GOAT.

IF a man chooses to tie the tail of a horse to a manger, and then leave his fellow-citizens to pay two shillings apiece to see a horse with his tail where his head ought to be; and if those fellow-citizens, in great numbers, indulge their natural curiosity, and discovering, upon entering, that their own heads are upon the wrong end of the show, and so keep the secret, that others may learn it for themselves, one can hardly be very indignant with any body.

So, if a man chooses to set the tail of a dried eel to the head of a dried monkey, and by that ludicrous combination a mermaid, and solicit the attention of a discriminating public, and again the first spectator, for his own reasons, refrains from exhibiting with equal publicity just what the mermaid is, you may not call it very honorable conduct, but you can hardly fall into moral hysterics about it.

And if the same man engages the most celebrated singer in the world to sing a song of welcome to thousands of delighted people, why shall we be too quiet tempers because he makes money by doing so?

If you want to hear a man praised as a kind friend and a good citizen, go to Bridgeport, in Connecticut, and ask about Mr. Barnum. If you want to know the man who, in the midst of universally called a great "humbug" by the perceptive public, you will probably hear the name of Barnum.

Now how it happens that this fellow-citizen had come quietly to New York, and opened an office in Wall Street or its purlieus, and had there tossed and trampled stocks, after the manner of bulls and bears. Let us suppose that he sold ten thousand shares of the Moonshine and Suds Union stock, to deliver," and had duly delivered, and "made his pile," and went on day after day doing the same thing, what would he be doing? Simply gambling; simply practicing upon the gullibility of a certain part of the public. He would be doing what, in Wall Street, is called speculating in stocks, and, in the American Museum, is called a horse with his head where his tail ought to be.

Mr. Barnum gambled in fancy stocks—in stocks of no value—mermaids, woolly horses, et cetera. But the stocks of Wall Street can claim no higher value, and the gentry who gamble in them no higher consideration. If the one gambler is a humbug, what is the other?

Or suppose a man establishes a newspaper upon the principle that every body is a fool, and, therefore flattered, and that popular opinion is always to be reflected in the paper, without regard to the utility or truth of that opinion upon the whole; and, for the purpose of pecuniary success, the editor always expresses it in the strongest terms by side which he thinks will be most agreeable to the greatest number—what is that called doing but gambling? He is speculating upon his sagacity to calculate with certainty the kind of thing people want to be told, and that which is not. It is a false and bad thing or not. He is sowing a cob's nail to a dead monkey's head and calling it a mermaid.

Mr. Barnum did the work more rapidly. He made more money in a shorter time than any one of these persons, his brethren, in speculating upon public credulity. But then he had more genius, more daring.

Unhappily, he had not the art of keeping what he got, and was obliged to call upon the fate of speculators of this kind, whether you apply it to Wall Street or to Broadway. With undaunted heart he crossed the sea, and is now trying his fortune again in London. He is touching the same string, for it is one which seems to vibrate in all seasons, ways, and is lecturing upon Humbug. Let us not rail at him, but applaud his brave spirit. Above all, don't let his fellow-speculators who have not chanced to be reduced revile him like a pickpocket. He is only an object of pity, like other immorals. He has mulcted the most credulous only, the sensational public, and the sensational public. He is not different from his fellows, but he is, unhappily for himself, the scape-goat of the flock.

THE FARE.

LOUNGERS and Parks have a secret sympathy. The Park, in most countries, is the resort of every body, and the Lounger has an own beloved public common, whereof alimmers are the feathered tribe, strangers of every land in their costumes observed, from the youthful pitcher of coppers up to the revered archness of Daniel Webster.

But the Park is doomed. It is now simply the most hideous area of desolation upon Manhattan Island. There, where once grew the grass that is fondles and charred City Hall; there are grass, here a mournful waste of sand, and there a perfect book-keeper upon the smallest salary; there are broken pavements, and patches of gutter and mud; there is a general air of dilapidation, as if to energencies—for surely Valley Forge and Morristown were nothing to this—and the whole ruin then in the middle of our beloved leafer-pasture; there is every where in the inclosure the most dismal mockery of a park, and the whole is doomed because this is now very generally perceived.

The whole space should be thrown open. Park Place, Murray and Warren streets should be carried across and the whole City Hall Square, the first of the space being converted into broad sidewalks. Access to the park not closed up with buildings. Let it be the busy, open heart of the city, from which the great arteries shall be fed with traffic, and not the dull, dry, dead space in one of the chief and oldest charms of the solid part of the City.

At all events, before a place so unworn with the associations and history of New York is destroyed by building, the public should certainly have a chance to say directly whether they wish to preserve it unencumbered or not.

REGRETS.

MR. PRESTEVE, the well-known facetious editor of the London Punch, has published the names in the various Lyceums upon American statesmen, and throughout the discourse there is a melancholy sense of regret, as if the great men of the country were all departed, and it were almost too much to hope that any more were to be born.

This is a lugubrious but not unusual criticism. It is very natural that a man like Mr. Prentice, who has been conversant with public affairs for many years, as he looks around him and observes the lack of talent, and the great stakes to which he was interested have left the arena, should sigh for the old familiar faces, and to lament that there is no one to succeed them or be deeply interested in the newer struggles.

There is perhaps a little of the more reason for that regret, if the mourner has lived to see the chief measures that were then proposed to the people accomplished and his manhood admired all passed or passing away with them. The three great questions of Mr. Prentice's youth were his own Calhoun, Webster, and Clay. They held equal divided interests, for how many years, in the Senate of the United States. There were other Senators of talent, learning, sagacity, and reputation, but these three towered above all others, the chosen prize of that assembly.

They are gone, and their political policies with them. They certainly are not without sufficient honor in public report; but the sentiment of the country has either reversed the decisions formed to them, or has superseded them by questions more engrossing.

It is a graceful and natural tribute that Mr. Prentice pays to the memory of the famous age of which these were the famous men. But meanwhile let us not lose heart. The closer we come to the last judgment of the times and men, the more plainly we see that they were quite like ours. The statesmen of our earlier day, even in the Washington era, were able men, but they were not immaculate men. There was quite as much hot political feeling, as much bitter misrepresentation, as much rancorous abuse as in our time. No President, perhaps, has ever been more thoroughly hated and unjustly criticised than Jefferson by the Federalists, none more than Hamilton by the Democrats. Time, that softens all, is already touching those forms. Mr. Randall, in his Life of Jefferson, shows us that "Saint Thomas" was not a gridiron with handles, and Irving's Life and Letters of Washington will unquestionably reveal the fact that Hamilton did not wear a kingly crown under his hat.

Mr. Prentice deals with later times and men. But as the subjects he deplores are contemporaries of the Revolution, so his departed heroes have successors. Public questions were never more lively and fiercely discussed than they are now. Let Mr. Prentice take heart, and all the other mourners from the Hub to the Mississippi, and have a rhythmic and appealing beauty in all sensitive imaginations. But even they, dear departed days, had each twenty-four hours and their share of sun and shade; and one great reason that they seem so dear and fair is because we are glad in regretting those that went before.

Let us all take heart and make the best of the noblest opportunity God ever gave to men.

THE SINGER AND SEWER.

THE papers report a ball of the makers of the Singer Sewing Machine. By lightening labor, it is supposed, they, that one machine has not been made a singer by the machine. But while we must all congratulate ourselves upon the progress of science and the ugly inventions of the Yankee genius, let us not forget in the cold wise way to-day that labor is best remembered to many, it is altogether taken away from some.

The inevitable immediate result of every laborsaving machine is to the throwing of many human laborers out of employ. This misfortune requires time itself to cure. The increasing demand for work, and the opening of new forms of labor, but at first it has this melancholy result. There have been no end of poor women from whom science has stolen the needle, and who have lost even their poorest and scantiest employment, who are all around us always, and the charity of thought and act is never lost upon them.

And as great numbers of hand-working women are thus constantly thrown into idleness, it is inevitable that the question of opening to them every department of labor in which they are fitted to excel becomes more and more the subject of consideration. It will presently come to be considered not a final disposition of the difficulty to laugh at women who wish to wear the breeches, but it will be seen that it is a simple question of how a large part of the human race shall live.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—You ask for the authorship of the line,

"'Or do a lord to death some secret deed.'

"It is to be found in a forgotten poem of a forgotten English poet, who published, in 1760 or thereabouts, a metrical translation of Horace's Epistles. My friend is unable to say whether this line is from that translation or not. If you find it by 'accidentally opening' the book again, it may be original. If, with this start, you find the song about the line and its author, please let us know.

"The couplet is—

"'To sin, is lasting as some silent shore,
Whose billows never break, nor tempests roar.'

"A FRIEND OF THE LOUNGER.

(And an enemy of "The Clerval".)

—For an explanation of "the Clerval," the reader is referred to a late number of Harper's Magazine, in which the cherubs upon the cover of that periodical are ordered by a correspondent, and defended by the Lounger's friend, the Easy Chair.

"DEAR LOUNGER.—A disconsolate bachelor, a former friend of mine, and a victim of the cutters, has not the hard to be a torment to some lovely woman, requests you to solve a difficulty which has troubled him for a serious despair: How far does a wife's ownership over her husband extend? I am not so absurd, you know, as to suppose that a wife exercises property in the person of her husband. But there must be a limit somewhere to female—but no matter. Let me state the case. I have met with this notice in a recent English paper, that both by law and common usage a man might punish or chastise his likeness taken without asking permission of his wife. The notice states that

"'THE NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY OF EMINENT PERSONAGES will be opened to the public on the 8th of January, 1859, when will be published, by permission of Her Majesty the Queen, a PORTRAIT OF MRS. PRINCE CONSORT, engraved on Steel, from a Photograph by MYSELF.'

"I have just read before that Prince Albert is sadly obstinate; but to me this is a very serious matter. Suppose I were married—I assure you the case is not impossible—I am just about to send to the publishers my great American picture of Washington in Hoboken. Illustrated with a portrait of General Washington and one of myself—now would I have to get the permission of Mrs. Brown, Jones, or Robinson the name is neither here nor there, whose property I look upon as made of the finest sable Brady?

"I write your reply with anxiety. If you perversely decide in favor of the ladies, Matilda will have to wait till my Epic is published. That is decided.

"Yours faithfully, B. B."

—Whatever ill-regulated bachelors may think of the duties and limitations of matrimony, and however wild their ideas may be of personal independence, they will be brought to a clear sense of their condition as soon as they are married. Why, evidently, if a husband might go without permission and have his daguerreotype taken, what is there that he might not do? It is simply opening the door of opportunity, which every wise wife keeps locked and the key in her pocket. Wherever the wife has brought her husband under proper control she suffers no step to be taken without her permission. DID B. B. never hear of the striped pig? But if the Queen of every Prince Albert did not insist upon her natural right of veto, does not B. B. see that "I want to go and have my daguerreotype taken, please, ma'am," would gradually be a more large upon words, and upon things also? Every self-willed husband would go "for a week's shooting in the country," under pretense of having his daguerreotype taken. No, Sir, the Queen is perfectly right. All the Master Alberts must be tickled to leave, and, as they ought to be arrested, whatever they are doing.

—The Lounger's anonymous friend, who writes from Philadelphia about Thackeray, is informed that his note has been "printed in the Circle." Quite true. But the Lounger read it first, and has a word to say in reply. Let him thank his unknown correspondent for the discovery of his delicate and the doctrine of which, however, he essentially dissents. Does the reader who thinks Thackeray "not only "a keen writhing" and an accomplished literary artist, using his skill "to balance on the delicate edge that separates the false from the true" the thing at all," has so profoundly different an impression from the one correctly produced by a touch to do more than wonder. Is it possible for any body to read The Newcomes without perceiving its moral scope in the same way that it is perceived in Shakespeare and the works of all great genius that is, as the necessary result of the moral position of the whole, to in human life? Is there not this toin always audible in Thackeray's writings? "Since human nature is thus and thus, and common sin and folly by deceiving good and beautiful impossible beings, and so reveal proof against the picture, why not try the other style a moment? Now look here—here is a picture of Vice—a good Sir and good Madame, that is your portrait! You see you are actually that! If, then, the pictures of the impossible but pestilent kind of virtue, let us try whether the portrait of your own folly will not shame you." Is this very different from the "keen worldling" theory. Thackeray does not lead with more "legitimate directness" to Eugene Sue than Fielding, or Swift, or Shakespeare. It is true that the botcher and Raphael may both paint the same subject, and in both cases there will be a painting. But the one is art and the other is not. Thackeray undoubtedly writes from Experience, and Dickens from the same source. The imagination—the result shows the difference of the inspiration. But this difference does not involve the condemnation of either. There are so many different kinds of workmen for the same work. Let us see as charitable, and patient, and catholic as we can!

—MERRICK proposes from Baltimore a method of raising the Mount Vernon money in three months. He suggests that the Ladies' Association of this same friend and reader of the Weekly in every town to call a town-meeting, and appoint a chairman and select every man, woman, and child to give one cent. But this is the very thing the ladies are doing. Mr. Everett's oration is, practically, a town-meeting, and the ladies of the fund canvass the residences and shops. The Lounger is glad to be able to announce that if the money were not collected by the 1st of July, 1859, the project would be abandoned. This reluctant and tardy contribution destroys half the dignity of the enterprise. It is fast passing to the "Old Mortality" category.

—TERENCE, Chicago, complains of the very picture which an anonymous correspondent in Tarrytown so enthusiastically admires, that he breaks out into an invitation of General Morris's "Woodman, spare that tree!" TERENCE will be reminded by the coincidence that there are various tastes for which an editor must provide. The insinuation of TERENCE, that politics enter into the matter, is ridiculously remote. But his assertion concerning a certain political party, that it is inconsistent in its sympathies, would be warmly denied by its members. The Lounger begs to assure TERENCE that the "political" platform of the Weekly is the determination to please every body to the greatest possible number of readers in the most unexceptionable way.

—J. B. writes that he believes "Mackay to be, on the whole, a good writer, certainly more popular and practical writer," than Carlyle, and that he is aptly called a brilliant writer. But he laments "the appearance of private feelings in all our authors"—and their works, we suppose he intends. The Lounger differs from J. B. He thinks that Carlyle is the most influential and representative intellectual force of the day, the keen speaks of the practical materialism of Macaulay. His God is good in the act." He is a worshiper and fascinating narrator; but he is surely not a great thinker. Macaulay influences men's styles of writing, not their minds and lives.

—A FRONTIER WOMAN, in Leroy, defends Thackeray as the great male sugar coater. She says:

"If you, or J. G. J., of Upper Red Hook, will inquire diligently of back-woodsmen and Indians, I am sure you will find that no one is more successful than he in coaxing up the sugar-maple in autumn after long frosts, and gathering the sap in the most unlikely spots. It will not grain readily at that season of the year. Mr. Thackeray would have made no mistake at all had he written drop instead of sugar."

—C. HENDERSON, North Carolina, sends a new song to an old tune:

"I'm think of me when tadpoles shake
Their little tails down in the water,
And when the frogs the neighbors wake
Ti think of thee, old Johnson's daughter.
When the new moon the old embraces,
And minks sink roost to steal chicken,
Be I in dark or twinkle places,
Ill think of thee! I'll think of thee!"

There is more, but the sustinent is contained in this stanza.

FACT, FANCY, AND FUN.

BY A SOUTHERN LAWYER.

"A TIGHT SQUEEZE."

THE sudden acquisition of wealth is the cotton-growing region of the United States, in many instances by planters commencing with very limited means, is almost miraculous. Patient, industrious, frugal, and skill-denying, nearly the entire amount of their cotton-crops is devoted to the increase of their active capital. The result is, in a few years large estates, if not princely fortunes, accumulated. The fortunate proprietors then build fine houses, and surround themselves with comforts and luxuries to which they were strangers in their earlier years of care and toil.

No planter in all the region round about him had started with such slender means, and had been more successful in speedily growing rich, than John Wesdun. Having arrived at a period in his affairs when he thought he could venture to indulge himself and family with a more elegant and comfortable dwelling, he selected an eminence in the middle of his plantation as the spot on which to erect his splendid mansion. Several years before he had left untouched the native growth on this hill, indulging then the hope of one day displaying there his architectural taste. Before determining positively whether that elevation or plat of ground should be the site of his new settlement, he concluded to have a well dug—obtaining water being indispensable to any further progress, etc. With this view he put three of his negro men—Ike, Jake, and Bruce—to digging. After commencing, however, he procured the services of Messrs Doggett, celebrated for his success in the use of the divining-rod. This "water wizard," as he was called, after repeated trials with his hazel switch, selected a spot very near a low partition fence running through the centre of the elevation, and dividing two contentious fields. The hazel-rod had gone some forty feet in search of water, when an accident occurred which frustrated Wesdun's plans and hopes, occasioned the cutting down and destruction of all those old and venerable oaks, and converted that high and beautiful plat of land into a spring into a small patch of new-ground corn!

As the negroes engaged in digging the well were occasionally to be disastrous an occurrence, Ike shall describe it in his own way.

"You see de ole marster-nuggin' Miss Doggett com dar wid his forked peach-tree twig, and he hole 'em in both hand, and walk 'bout mighty slow like he 'bleege-ha, dat ting fall down, and pints out de place what de water lay sholler. Dat was rite by de back of de last fence. It mean de rite place for to dug well, but mighty onlucky for de ole man, as you see a while. He dug and dug and dug, and told us to dug away. We 'gin, one to work under ground, two to drug up dirt wid basket and rope, two to cook turn 'bout.

"When we did got dat well 'bout forty foot into de ground, and we 'gun to shovel out de dirt, de ole man he walk up dar to see how we was coming 'long wid de operation. When he arrove dar he let down de empty basket, sit down on de side de well, tuck hold on de rope, put he foot in de step we dig in de ground, and did went down wid you know, he low man and mighty big. I didn't thought he rotch dem steps, his legs so short; but he did! When he was down dar, he holler out to Seth, he dog, which follow him out dar, tuck arter de sheep in timber field, and how he dog and sheep cuss come pipping, tarring, and jump ober dat fench rite by dat well. Fus thing dat ole man know, here went big ram bom-bim wid he wool all on he body, you know, is mighty big feels; what one been jump, all fellers, and dar jes crowded in de well-hole dar forty head! You ort to see de feals; as of de well wa'n't deep enuff, eber one jump bout five foot high 'fore he left downward!

"I nuber hear sich noise under de yath as dat ole man make dat day. He bellered, 'Here, you dam mus' me!' We send de sheep running in as we was coming back from dinner, but didn't know dat ole man was in dar till we hearn him holler. Den we run; but, bless God! 'twas too late. De last sheep was in, and de dog wa'n't stopping, barking, scarring 'bout dar, look like he gwine to jump in herself—thought he dun lig things, treuing de ole man and de sheep. I gin him a sockdologer on head wid rock; and when he come to, he left, wasser hurt dun my thing come outen dat well dat day.

"We tuck hold dat windlass, and try to drug up de whole confurtumsnit; couldn't budge 'em; steam-engine gwine to stall wid dat job. All dem sheep lay still and say nuffing; but de ole man he make some down dar like bull dog, and bad cold. If he warn't crowded, dis nigger wouldn't say so! Jake, he did run down, and did ask de rope 'bove dem sheep, which we splice it, and den we did work hard to hieve sheep, ole man, and all. Dem sheep, when de wus pulled out, was bigger fool dan eber; de know not which way to go; eiry one go he own way; so two did went together; de all did fall out wid one and nudder, and 'solved de gang. Dar was twenty-seven sheep on de ole man, and thirteen underneath 'em! He dun his best to keep on top, but dat's jes' quite to de middle of de excitement!

"When we did got de ole man out he look wuss for wear; he smell like whole gang of sheep—was mighty skim all 'ober he face and hand. He didn't have brief suff to talk much; he jist say, 'Fall up dat well and go to picking out cotton.' Eber one did thought he ole man's head been mos'-spoldering, and dat he lets he mind, so we dig on dat evening. Next mornin' we did went back to dug in dat well 'gin; just soon de ole man cum out dar in big hurry. When he cum in 'bout twenty foot of dat well he stop quick, and look round to see of sheep was about. He say, 'You black scamps, didn't I tell you fall up dat well? Full her up; ram dirt all back in her hard; plant tirmsly grass over her; never want to see dat place no more.'

"We dun so and left. De ole man send all dem

"DEM MIGHTY BIG FOOLS, DE SHEEPS."

sheep off; got he gorge of mutton; full up de well at de house, and drink no well-water more. He found spring down de branch, build he new house down dar close by, have little new ground up on dat hill next year. De ole man, de say, dun left it in his will he must not be buried under de ground. I tell you what, of de de, and sheep cum grazing 'bout dar, he gwine to left dat place. Now de say de devil punish man in de had world wid fire and brimstone. I don't know to well 'bout dat; but sure as you are born, of eber he git de ole man, he gwine put him in deep well, and set sheep hovering 'bout dar, and put cur-dog arter 'em!"

A RACE IN WHICH THE HORSE THAT STARTED LAST AND CAME OUT FIRST DID NOT WIN—OR NOT RUNNING AVERAGE.

"If is so ure, gentlemen, to talk; the race is made, money staked, and 'Montezim' is bound to run. I know what you say is true; he has not been out of the stable in three months; and in my opinion that is so much the better. Dura is here that can't bottle up any quantity of speed and bottom in that time! I run him on the long-heap, and if he can't, after resting so long, beat that shadow of a Kentucky filly, I'll alter his condition in life most materially, and make a plow-horse of him!"

The foregoing was uttered by Thomas Jud in a loud, impatient tone and manner, surrounded by a number of his friends and advisers, on the racecourse near the village of Haywardville, not thirty miles distant from the metropolis. It will be readily perceived a race was on hand, if "Montezim" was not on foot, and that his owner had no idea of paying forfeit.

Several months prior to this Jud won this celebrated stallion in a raffle. The horse being rather vicious and hard to control, was backed up in a stable, and water and provender furnished through the cracks. He had been thus housed for three entire months, and presented, indeed, a strange appearance for a racer. His shaggy hoofs were unnaturally long, and no eye, however practiced, could tell from his foot-prints on the track where he run, what they were, and which way the animal that made them was traveling. His crack-fed ugly head was thin finely; and as for health and fat, one would have to search extensively the realms of horseleon in Tennessee and Kentucky to find a better specimen. His obesity was such as to throw him out of horse shape, to which add his long, uncombed foretop, heavy mane and tail, and some faint idea may be formed of his horseship. The only encouraging sign about him was his ears. That was noble. Having been released so suddenly from his long confinement, and thrown on the race-course amidst so many of his species, caused an excitement which gave an unnatural expression to his organs of vision. As his owner surveyed him over, tossing up and down his bullshaped neck, neighing shrilly, and peering through his thick, shaggy foretop with his flashing eyes, he could read pride and triumph in his handsome and intelligent face.

"I tell you, gentlemen, he's game—has a small steam-engine within him as sure as you are born! My only fear is that the locomotive can't show all of its speed on a circular track. If the conductor puts on his brakes right, and holds him properly at the corners, you will see the trip made in the quickest sort of time. Who's afraid? Besides" (in an undertone to one of his friends), "the fate of 'Montezim' and the stakes are in good hands. Do you suppose the judges will give up their own money? Until they do that, mine is in no danger."

The truth was, the judges were going his halves! The race was one mile out, and the stakes $100 a "Montezim's" competitor was a Kentucky filly of fine parts, in the estimation of her owner, and the beau ideal of a race nag. Her owner—a tall, raw-boned man, with an uncommon share of red hair about his face and head, and with a long drab overcoat and leggings on—sported a huge, heavy, loaded horsewhip, and seemed well acquainted with the business on hand.

Relying on the superior fleetness of his filly, he gave Jud's horse the inside track, and held her back at the top of the drum until every one saw the horse had at least one hundred rods the start. But when she was permitted to leave, the distance between two contending horse was never so quickly "devoured up."

"Montezim" commenced his performances with great power but little speed. As the rennet as if endeavoring to break through rather than pass over the earth. Before he made a quarter of a mile from the stand Kentucky was one hundred yards ahead!

There was likely to be no sport. But by some means the entrance-gate to the race-course had been left open, and a stout wood just east of the hill, who, disdaining to compete with so uninteresting an adversary, in spite of rain and spur, darted through the opening and ran some hundred and fifty yards before she could be taken up.

"Montezim" came bounding by, amidst the earthquake shout of Jud's friends, with no inclination whatever to imitate the filly in extra labor; was fully satisfied there was ground enough inside on which to exhibit his speed and bottom.

At the moment when the filly's fleetest seemed inevitable she was rushed back into the track, and took after the horse. So lightning-like was the motion, and so fast was her gaining on him, the tumult and shout were suddenly hushed, and all, with unparalleled breath and instinctive admiration, gazed on such wonderful exhibition of speed, set off, doubtless, by a contest with the other motion of the horse. Wonderful to relate, under the weight of the disadvantages above mentioned, the passest the horse on the home-stretch by first a head! The judges, without hesitation, announced that Jud was entitled to the money. The superior management of the Kentuckian may be better imagined than described. His face became redder than ever, and his filly's head and tail assumed extreme combustion.

"Gentlemen," said he to the judges, "I desire to ax you a few questions.

Their silence and attention seemed to say "proceed."

"Didn't my filly start last?"

"Yes," said the judges.

"She flew the outside track, which always makes it the furthest round, and come in where she went out, didn't she?"

"Yes."

"She come out first, didn't she?"

"Yes."

"Well, why am I not entitled to the money?"

The worst known reason for withholding from these premises would have been irresistible. But as down in the Kentuckian's temperance was put, on the judges, with great decision in his manner and tone, said,

"Darn your filly! She was too far behind in the middle of the race; she didn't run average!"

"Never was reason more unsatisfactory to a red-headed man. Without attempting to answer such logic, he upended to Jud himself, and demanded in under the circumstances, "Where's the money?

"Do you see any thing verdant here?" said the person addressed, putting his right thumb on the end of his nose and waving his open hand. "The money is with the judges, and they have had hard running for, and to give him a reputation on the turf."

"You can't pretend you won the money fairly. My nag, to a certainty, beat your horse; and this is under the rules of racing in all parts of the country."

"What's the use of having judges if you are not governed by what they decide?" replied Jud; "and although your filly may have the heels of 'Montezim,' the judges, as umpires, says, 'The race is not always to the swift.'"

"The hoss will win the next heat!"

"Don't you wish you may get it?" retorted the Kentuckian, "must have done racing, and in time fit up with Haywarville judges! I have seventeen smiles and a quarter on the result, and can't be bluffed under $2000. I will stake them against $2000, and run my filly against your horse on the Montgomery track."

"I never run on the short, but always on the long heap; and I don't think 'Montezim,' from present appearances, can get his breath in three months, if he does start! Having established his character on the turf, I will run him no more."

"DO YOU SEE ANY THING VERDANT HERE?"

HOW ROYAL YOUTHS ENJOY THEMSELVES IN EUROPE.

THE illustrations on the following page shed a joyful light on the life and education of the juvenile members of royal families in Europe. In the next generation, when the royal children of our day will be men, actively influencing the destinies of their respective countries and of the world, it is highly probable that our relations with Europe will be closer than they are. And as the child is father to the man, a knowledge of the habits of the one may not prove wholly useless in dealing with the other. One of our illustrations depicts the infant heir to the Imperial throne of France surrounded by his "staff." The other engraving introduces us to Prince Alfred, a younger son of Queen Victoria, making his first appearance as a midshipman at Malta, and undergoing a public reception at the hands of the Governor and authorities of that British Colony.

We are happily enabled, with the aid of the Paris correspondent, to give a pretty exact account of the outdoor habits of his Imperial Highness, the son of

THE FRENCH IMPERIAL PRINCE, WITH HIS STUD.

Napoleon. According to the laws of Court etiquette, he is not entitled to a separate establishment until he reaches the mature age of seven years. Then he will have a squire and a groom of his own, with no end of horses and carriages; the cost of all which will, of course, be defrayed by a special appropriation from the Government of France. At present his stud is paid for by his papa out of the general Civil List. His carriages belong to the Emperor. He has not even a racer of his own.

His Royal Highness is thus entitled to the respectful sympathy of a kind world. Still, it must be admitted that the privations incidental to his dependent position are not intolerable. When, in Paris, he takes the air, he travels in a landau, with a pretty English girl, named Miss Showe, by his side. A piqueur rides in front of the carriage, one of the Emperor's outriders follows, and a squadron of cavalry surrounds the vehicle, the commanding officer, with drawn sword, riding as close to the Prince as the wheels will permit. This public confession of the peril in which the poor child lives is only necessary at Paris.

In the country—at St. Cloud, Fontainebleau, and Compiegne—assassins are not so vigilantly guarded against. In the parks attached to these palaces the baby prince takes the air with less restraint. If he desires to drive, he has a lovely little green wagon drawn by two goats. Each goat is managed by a separate groom, and the baby prince is comforted during the drive by Miss Showe and a couple of other nurses. By the time he is tired of his goats, two Norwegian ponies, bought for the Empress but by her graciously bestowed on her son, will be thoroughly trained to draw a fairy calèche, built expressly for the boy by the most famous carriage-maker of Paris. At present they are only half tamed, though in the illustration they look quiet enough. These compose the baby's driving stud. Strangely enough, it has never been suggested to harness two courtiers—say senators or editors—to one of the baby carriages! Surely they would answer as well as the ponies.

When the baby desires to ride, he has a shoe-ass of remarkable beauty and uncommon docility; likewise a Shetland pony, called Balmoral, presented by the Queen of England. The latter animal, with the saddle used by the Prince—in which he must resemble a Jack-in-the-box—will be seen in the illustration.

The Paris editors remark upon these carriages, saddles, asses, and ponies that they evidence "the strong and liberal education" which the Prince is receiving. They hardly constitute our notion of a strong and liberal education. But it does not do to be hypercritical in such matters.

Let us turn now to the English Prince. He is, according to all accounts, a boy of fourteen, and a promising young fellow. A few months ago he was apprenticed to the sea as a midshipman on board the Euryalus. Great care, we were told, had been taken to preserve his immaculate purity. The sentian was a born noble, and so were others of the officers. For some months before Prince Alfred joined no officer was admitted on board till his name had been approved by the Queen. The public was reminded of the naval services of William Peel, the Hamiltons, and the authorities and people of the British island—Malta—to show how much the Prince's education survives in the human race in the present year of our Lord.

The moment the Euryalus came in sight of the city of Valetta the batteries were manned, and as soon as she was within hearing a royal salute was fired. Before the port officers had declared the ship fit to communicate with the shore the Governor and civil dignitaries were on board the flagboat, will to pay their duty to the midshipman of fourteen. Long before any one from the ship had obtained permission to land, arrangements were made for the landing of the boy; and accordingly, as shown in our engraving, the Governor, in full uniform, was received, and, by all the most illustrious and dignified people of the place. Old Admiral Stopford—covered with glory and honors nobly won as a soldier—stronger and bowed and stalked in the train of the young lad as if he had been King of England. Public halls were given in his honor, etc. Public notice was given that the whole body of fourteen—would honor such a building by his presence at such an hour; and, at the hour appointed, Governor, aide-de-camp, Governor, Commander of the Forces, Bishop, Chief Justice, clergy, magistrates, and people were all waiting, with hats off and bended knees, to do obeisance. Eastern Satrap was never welcomed with more signs of respect. Mighty conqueror never saw more tongues lick the dust before him.

It is but just to say that the people of Great Britain do not seem much pleased with the adulation bestowed on their young Prince. Their chief regret appears to arise solely from their fear that so much worship will spoil him. No one blames General Pennefather for his base adulation of the boy. No one censures the Captain of the Euryalus for his prostration at the feet of his duty. Even the Times only argues that if the boy is to be bred a non-water sailor, the people of England will simply cease to think about him. It is thought that an aide can easily be raised to denounce and execrate the barbarous familiarity of which the officials of the Euryalus and of Malta have been guilty.

LITERARY.

TRAVEL readers, and all who are interested in the wonderful advances made by modern investigation in the study of Africa, will welcome the first volume of DR. BARTH'S TRAVELS AND DISCOVERIES IN NORTH AND CENTRAL AFRICA, from the press of Harper & Brothers, not only as a work of intrinsic interest and curiosity, but as a most valuable contribution to the geographical and ethnological knowledge. The two volumes which preceded this have been making their way silently but steadily, and have found a place for themselves. The learned German was not announced in the country with any flourish of trumpets, and no Europe, where his work has been distinguished by so great popularity, but the volumes now published are regarded as the most valuable ones on Africa that the modern spirit of roving has produced. Nor do the superb illustrations which enhance so generously part of a book of travel, form the least attractive portion of these books.

The results of the first volume will remember that the narrative left Dr. Barth alone in the country of the Tuaricks of Air Overweg, on the prospect of a successful prosecution of the designs of the expedition. Dr. Barth was not long alone, however, to yield to circumstances over which energy could exert any control, and although his plans were found to be yet destined to be carried out, plish one great object of African research, the explorations of Niger, and the opening of a commercial intercourse with the great and almost mythical city of Timbuktu. The volume contains his account of the most successful accomplishment of these designs, through a country where no civilized man had been before, among a people many of who were as strange to his eyes as he to theirs, with abundance of stirring adventure and incident during the whole journey.

European travelers have experienced the petty annoyance of changing their coin at each petty state of country, when sovereigns must be turned into francs, or brewers into bairochi. Let them imagine Dr. Barth's occasional perplexity when he came to enter a new region, where coin was unknown, and the medium of exchange was a piece of unbleached cloth, now a shirt, and now the strings of cowries. Such, and many other difficulties and tribulation, and the European difficulty will sink into insignificance.

No book of modern travel surpass these volumes in all that is ornamental, instructive, valuable, and interesting.

Tickner & Fields send us THE SCORPION OF THE WHITE HOUSE, by the author of Tom Brown's School Days. The White House is an ancient Saxon relic, on a hill-side near Abingdon in England. The home is actually a rude outline of the animal cut out of a chalk hill-side, and standing, or lying, in relief on the side of the slope. What ever be its origin, there is a custom of cleaning off the growth of grass and moss from the image, and having a great fair and two days of English games and sports. This occurs "semi-occasionally"—once in five, ten, or twenty years, as the people of the neighborhood determine, and the book is an account of two days of this fair.

We notice with pleasure the commencement of a new and very elegant edition of MR. COOPER'S NOVELS, to be issued by W. A. Townsend & Co., and illustrated by Darley. The first volume is before us, containing THE PRAIRIE—a work which is peculiarly to speak at present of the general literary character of Cooper's works, we may take the opportunity to urge on every one who does not possess the entire set, this opportunity of possessing the most elegant extant edition of the great American novelist.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, 24th January, in the Senate, numerous bills received their first reading. Mr. BRIGHT moved forth that Henry S. Lane and Jesse D. Bright be appointed to act as Senators from Indiana, and praying for their admission; referred to the committee on the Judiciary. Messrs. Bigler and Cameron presented memorials from Pennsylvania, praying for an alteration in the tariff; referred. Senator Slidell, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported in favor of granting $99,000,00 to the President for the purchase of Cuba. Senators Mason and Seward dissented from the vote in the Committee, which were sustained by Senators Bayard and Hunter. Mr. Bigler, from the Committee on Finance, reported in the House, Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, in favor of the Pacific Railroad bill. Mr. Grow, of Pennsylvania, moved to take up the bill for the purpose of retaining the fishing bounties; other speeches on the same subject occupied the time. Messrs. Bocock, Cox, and others.

On Tuesday, 25th, in the Senate, some conversation took place in reference to the newspaper reports of the attack in question on the conduct of Commodore Paulding. Senators Sowden Davis, Douglas, and Fitch denied the accuracy of the reports. Senator Douglas stated that there was a room where eaves-droppers could hear what was said in the Senate, but that he had not been informed it was only found to contain newspaper correspondents. Mr. Bigler presented several newspaper correspondents. Senator Bright moved for the appointment of Senators from Vermont, Indiana, and Florida. The Pacific Railroad bill was then taken up, and Senator Wade spoke for two hours and a half against the bill.—In the House, Mr. English reported from the Post-office Committee a bill to prevent the franking privilege in the Regouts of the Mount Vernon Association. Mr. Bocock introduced a bill for the cession of steamers to the Gulf of Mexico, to South American states, and to the West Indies. Mr. Cox moved to abolish the franking privilege, and to regulate postage on newspapers. Mr. Cox's motion was rejected by a vote of 90 to 85. Mr. Stephens moved to appropriate the sum of $7500 for the salary of Townsend Harris, late Consul-General to Japan. The House was addressed by Messrs. Corby, Scott, and Sickles. The African slave-trade was referred to a motion of Mr. Cox, which sets out an appropriation of $75,000 to enable the President to carry out the treaty of 1819. Amendments were made by Messrs. Phelps, Clay, Sickles, Nichols, and Dowdell to the Pacific Railroad bill, which occupied the time of the resi pendence of John Nugent.

On Wednesday, 26th, in the Senate, the credentials of Senator Fessenden were presented. Senator Seward moved that Messrs. Bigler and Cameron be added to the Senators from Indiana, be admitted to the floor; but on the vote being taken, the motion was rejected by a majority of one. Mr. Bigler introduced a bill, which was referred. Mr. Hayard, Bell, and Davis, the resolution was again laid on the table by a vote of 31 to 21. The Pacific bill was taken up, and the amendments of Senators Wilson, Bigler, and Wade, the claim amendment, and Senator Hammond moved to lay the subject on the table; lost. Mr. Douglas moved that the amendments which had been made from the several committees, and acted upon by the House. Mr. Kelsey introduced a homestead bill, which was discussed by himself and Mr. Grow, Mr. Phelps, and Mr. Stephens, when the bill was laid on the table by a majority of 1. Mr. Grow moved that the House go back the shares of the Echo, and also on the question of the amendment of Mr. Phelps, Messrs. Bocock, Burnett, Moore, Millson, Case, Keitt, Bonham, Seward, Barksdale, Cox, Quitman, Stephens, Hopkins, Letcher, Goodrich, Brooks, Mitchell, Clay, Miles, Gooch, and Branch took part; the claim amendment, which precludes the President to carry out his contract with the Mount Vernon Association, was rejected.

On Thursday, 27th, in the Senate, various reports were made and acted upon. Senator Douglas moved that in reporting the Abbott Ship Canal, and Colonel Wright's report be printed. Mr. Bigler moved that the bill be taken up; lost. Senator Douglas moved that the Committee on the Interior be authorized to abandon the proposals for the construction of a road between Northern, Central, and Southern, and that $3000 be appropriated for the survey of the route. The motion, on motion by Senators Douglas, Hale, Mason, Trumbull, Toucey, Crittenden, Pugh, Hunter, Bigler, and Wade, was adopted; and, on motion of Senator Simmons, the bill of the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association. The amendments were made on the death of the measure by Senators Bigler, Wade, Douglas, Hale, Mason, and Simmons. In the House, the usual debate on the morning hour occupied the time. Mr. Sickles resigned his seat, following the example of Senator Brown. The motion reducing and striking out the appropriation of $75,000 for the return of the African slave-trade. The bill was then put to the vote, and lost by 99 to 85. After discussion by Messrs. Phelps, Stephens, Bocock, Phelps, and others, the vote was reconsidered. Motions were made to lay the motion to adjourn on the table, and Buena Ayres were lost. A motion to strike out the appropriation for Mount Vernon, $18,000, was put to the vote, and again lost by 94 to 91. A personal explanation was made by Mr. Grow, in reference to the proceedings of the House.

On Friday, 28th, in the Senate, Senator Green gave notice of a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Pacific Railroad bill was rejected a moment for $70,000 worth of merchandise for New York.

Senator Bingham, of Michigan, were presented. Senator Davis introduced a resolution to authorize the payment from the free list to the land schedules; referred.—In the House, Mr. Phelps inquired whether the report of the Treasury whether the next year's income of the Government would be sufficient for the year. He introduced bills for the organization of Dacotah, Arizona, and Jefferson. Mr. Grow gave notice that he would move an amendment that slavery should never exist in the territories. The House resumed the debate on the Homestead bill, and passed it by 101 to 95. Various reports were received.

On Saturday, 29th, in the Senate, Mr. Gwin tried to get a reconsideration of the vote by which the Pacific Railroad Bill was killed, but his motion was postponed until Monday. Affairs of the District of Columbia occupied nearly all of the session.—In the House, private bills were the order of the day. Mr. Houston asked leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Sam Houston. Mr. Leave was also asked to report a bill so revising the tariff as to make the revenue adequate to the expenses of the Government, economical administration, and discriminating in favor of American products, and substituting specific for ad valorem duties. In all cases objections were made.

MR. PHELPS'S TARIFF BILL.

The Reporter for the Associated Press telegraphs: "The tariff of Mr. Phelps, of Missouri, fully meets the views of Secretary Cobb, who believes it will yield more revenue and be less productive than the tariff of 1857. Sixteenen have been made by certain parties, in which the Secretary's estimate of the revenue under the present tariff is considerably less; but it is shown that no increase of duties is necessary, and so does the President. It is understood that Mr. Phelps, in the Committee of Ways and Means, will report a bill in accordance with the views of the Administration."

The Secretary would have increased the revenues on post roads' imposed an increase of duty on articles of dutiable goods. The reply of the Secretary of the Treasury to the inquiry made of him by the House Committee of Ways and Means in relation to the cost of the Government."

MR. BUCHANAN FRACAS IN CONGRESS.

On Thursday the following scene is reported to have occurred in the House of Representatives:

Mr. Giddings, alluding to what had gone before, remarked his private opinion that the Speaker had not acted in that direction.

The Speaker reminded him of the irrelevancy of the Cuban question at this time.

Mr. Hughes then called if the Speaker had not noticed his objection to the question of Mr. Giddings this morning, and he would call the attention of the House to the rule which would prohibit the questions.

Mr. Hughes replied that he could not help that.

The Speaker said, Mr. Hughes questioned the decision of the chair.

Mr. Hughes—Yes; but if I had I should have only been paying off an old debt."

The Speaker—Then the gentleman has my personal quarrel with the Chair, the House is no place to settle it.

Mr. Hughes—"I know that, and say the same to the Speaker."

This colloquy occasioned considerable sensation.

DEATH OF THE PRINCESS CARIGNAN.

William H. Prescott, the historian, died on Friday, 28th inst., at Boston, Massachusetts. We are pained that he was in his usual health and spirits on the morning of his day. At about half-past 12 he was seized with a paralysis by prostrated by this fatal shock. Physicians were present, and the most skillful aid was given, but the unfortunate family that a few hours at utmost would end his earthly career. He breathed his last at 2 o'clock on the same day, in unconscious state, and early in the afternoon his corpse was borne to the house of mourning, where so many were soon of his children.

BURNING OF A NEGRO AT THE STAKE.

The following account of the burning of a negro at the stake by a mob, for the murder of his master, is given by a correspondent of the Maysville Eagle. It took place at Perry, Kentucky:

"On Nov.-Year's Day the accused negro (who

The Cadiz (Ohio) Republican says that Mrs. Barney, of Tuscarawas, Harrison County, Ohio, a highly respectable lady, and a member of the Presbyterian Church, during a particular condition of her physical and mental organization, has preached a sermon half an hour long, every other Sunday for the last five years. Her husband, while preaching, is always a bad, blue hearing, and his countenance is swollen, and abound in scripture quotations; but when she resumes her consciousness there is no recollection whatever of what she has been about, and Saturday night away her time and recollection of several medical gentlemen, who, while they had the utmost confidence in her piety, cannot agree in a satisfactory explanation of the mystery.

The Springfield Republican regrets to report the serious illness of ex-President Hitchcock, of Amherst College, the eminent geologist. He has been ill for a year or more ago, with the symptoms of a cancer in the stomach, which has now assumed a complicated and threatening form, involving the liver congested, and producing also some inflammation of the kidneys. There was a consultation of physicians on Saturday, and more hoping, and much anxiety was felt as to the termination of the illness.

The Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Patriot relates the following anecdote of Secretary Cobb, which furnishes a happy instance of a ground occupation. Eleven years ago, Major Lee, who is a fellow-passenger with Mr. Clement and his wife on a homeward-bound boat, was in the habit of relating to a story to some friends, which he had heard from a gentleman concerning for its conclusion before the termination of their passage, the voyage of the steamer would New York, and remained so until a day or two ago, when the Major related the story to a gentleman who was present them to Washington. The first gentleman over, Mrs. Clement, is the sister of General Cobb, remarked, "Ah, Major H——, pray relate us the remainder of that story."

A letter from Rome, of the 5th inst., says the American minister, Mr. Peacock, had the wife of one of the Papal spies on his suit at the Stonecutt Palace, on account of his having given information against her husband. The husband fling for his services, and in the last copy of accounts given, on the complaint of superabusive bounds occurring the list beneath the proposed sums of discharge for services.

The Independance Belge announces the marriages in Brussels at the United States Legation, on the 8th inst., of the Brazilian daughter of the late Baron de Sao Joao, formerly member of Congress, with the Baron Philip Schenking de Tautenburg. After the ceremony the wedding breakfast united around the table of the American Minister some twenty persons, the friends of both families.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE CASE OF THE TOM PUNCH CLUB.—The Dublin correspondent of the London Times says that the Crown case against some of the members of the Punch Club is more complete than the public have been led to believe, and sufficient to satisfy the most partial jury. The farming classes have stood aloof, and the members of the Club are chiefly shopkeepers and publicans. The Clubs were rapidly increasing, and it therefore was necessary to suppress them at once, and to put an end to the movement.

A WEDDING RING FOUND IN A RAT'S NECK.—The Scotsman newspaper relates the following curious story of the recovery of a lost marriage ring:—"About the end of July or the beginning of August last, a woman named Lochhead, residing in the town of Dalkeith, named M'Lean, at Clifton, near the head of Loch Leonard, lost her marriage ring while engaged in putting in or building peats, and, notwithstanding that every search was made for it, it could not be found. About a fortnight ago, however, a rat was seen to run out from and around the neck of the rat was the missing marriage ring. It immediately and carried away the ring in two pieces of silver or gold, that the ring had been taken to the rat's nest, where it had gnawed it in two for the use of the young ones, and remained there until the animal had scented its progress, and, curiously enough, was captured by the rat. Mrs. M'Lean, who had been about a year married, was much pleased at the unexpected recovery again of her lost ring that surprised at the very singular way in which it was recovered."

FRANCE.

ARMY MOVEMENTS.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says that the French Marshals are charged to take command of the great military camps, and that the Emperor commanding military divisions, who were on leave of absence, have received orders to repair to their posts. He also says that Count Walewski has protested energetically against the calumnies and insinuations of the Austrian supreme, and that he had, it was said, determined on retiring from a scene where undeserved abuse was showered to. Among the authenticated rumors from Paris are the following:—That the Emperor has ordered a force of 900 bronzepiece; that General M'Mahon is to command the first army of the Rhine; that 30,000 Austrian troops are to cross over to Italy from the Adriatic coast.

HOW UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE WORKS AT PARIS.

A correspondent of the Express writes:—"The way in which voting is the Paris now for some weeks, into the operation of universal suffrage, is characteristic. It is conducted, with universal suffrage in the city of New York. It is a question with it how many votes can be got out at least. Every body votes here—that is, every body who votes at all. Not to vote is considered to be exactly as bad as not voting in the United States. It is respects the latter, that is, the most efficient bulwark of voting is by means of a question four-cornered affair, this, I say, for I have not seen a Frenchman of my acquaintance who does not, either in the Champs Elysees, or the fortress of the court. Indeed, cheating under the new French system of voting is much more difficult than in New York we certainly are all deathens. But, in the case of the Emperor, the Empress, and the Prince of the Wards, and none of us doubt our capacity to vote freely, or to vote at all, according to our inclination, or to vote for whom we please. Indeed, if the Legislature would but free all from the fear of the police, and the consequent fooling, there would be no voting at all. Nevertheless, Saint Jonathan would then be properly at fault for what would but universal suffrage would be, in the very thing to that case. The question then would be not only of good and bad, but of good and better, and not a few will any body at that. Not so, however, here in Paris. It is a question to vote most likely, and not to vote. The Bonapartists, or, as they call them, the Napoleonists, are in power, and thus that there is an honest conviction."

WHAT FRENCH EQUALITY MEANS.

"Brown, Jones, and Robinson, who have achieved fortunes in France, and only the more wretched the poorer, if only their position upon the scale of society upon conveyance and trade. Nevertheless I have seen in the Champs Elysees a 'Seigneur,' as Fitzgerald. Little baby three years old 'Prince,' dress on the Champs Elysees, with half a dozen notables in advance, a company of horse in court, and every body saying, or bowing, or cringing, to the little fellow as he passed. The grand show of magnificent equipages on Sunday, New Year's Day, gold lace, and scarlet livery, footmen, etc., etc., tells its tale. There is no Spring to be enough on paper, no Restaurant any where, and yet the Lobster for every body to vote on election day, and to make or smash this Emperor-Government, the Jacques Bonhomme of mystery. I am speaking, then, of the conditions of such a Government. There is a considerable liberty of debate allowed in the Legislative body; but the newspapers are allowed no report of the discussions. The Government has its own corps of reporters, but they report only what they please in the Moniteur, and the other journals, not even the Opposition will copy, and yet there is universal suffrage! Nevertheless, it can not be denied there underlie in the very strata of the Government strong ideas and sentiments of real Liberty, of real Equality, and of respect which, under the law, is now unquestionable; for the whole people are educated to it. Their children in the schools, their associations, their food, their dress, their manner, their manly port and bearing. A mere untutored negro, upon whom the Declaration of Independence and the slaves are in London, not in Paris; though John Bull has the grimness of Liberty, and the Frenchman has only learned so Frenchman, save as conspirator, of in the secret societies of Paris.

COMMENCEMENT OF THE PARIS SEASON.

Paris has fairly begun the season of gayety in which to the winter it is renowned. Under the last two kings it was the fashion to open the season at the end of the second of autumn, but now the English custom of keeping away in January and February is followed. The Parisians—and, too, to be called together in November, and the Emperor and Empress intend to be present at the Tuileries on the 1st of February. The Emperor and Empress intend to be present at the Tuileries on the 1st of February. The 8th, and Tuesday is to be followed in due order by all the great dignitaries of the court, the ministers, the Senate, and the Legislative body. At the last he expects the large saniers they receive to be not hoarded, but spent. Among the guests will be Count Walewski, Madame, Lady Cowley, is also about to give a ball.

THE EMPEROR AND EMPRESS IN A CHURCH.

At the Medecine, on Christmas Eve, a concert was performed. The old Sabbath Alle Bonbin preached in the evening, and the Emperor and Empress were in the pit-stalls and a number of the Imperial family. The Duke of France, a very large congregation assembled.

ANECDOTE.—Napoleon I. was fond of a joke, but after a pause cried in a sonorous voice, "A Saviour is born unto you!" Then in his ordinary tone he added, "My brothers, why do you not receive that glad tidings with a hymn?" The choir sang, and the congregation stood up and cried, "Hallelujah!" After which he proceeded to the next ceremony.

A STORY OF A PRINCE AND HIS CHOCOLATE POT.

"Prince K—— is a good-natured, easy-tempered Russian boyard, who, when he comes to Paris, takes a pretty lively scamper on the boulevart-des-Italiens, between the Rue Laffitte and the Rue Richelieu, every morning. One Russian lives in Paris because it is the place of all others in the world where he can lead the most independent, desultive, and spend money. Prince K—— is also perfectly disposed to Russian habits, and he would be very unwilling to be in love with some popular actress, the swishy and extravagant son ought to be his companion. But the very vision they owe them playing a fairy drama, and Prince K—— is not the man to be a spectator of the sort of life about him. The lady of the theatre is very willingly the attentions of so advantageous an admirer; and Mademoiselle Rose Chéri, Mademoiselle Déjazet, and Théâtre, when New Year came. The Prince naturally considered that the occasion was one for the display of his high appreciation of the fair one's shining qualities, and sent to every one of the theatres named a bouquet. The gift was an elegant little rose-wood box, of which the key was locked in a golden padlock. The box lay in the Prince's own handwriting. The lady hastily opened the envelope, and found in it a note, in the Prince's own hand and coloured on one side of the sheet. Nothing in the world but a number of pieces of paper, each with a seal thing. The lady of the theatre opened it again! Disappointed and enraged, she pitched the whole concern, box, key, and all, into the fire, whence they fell upon the roof of a shed in the yard below, where they remained for a week, when the key fell of paper-candy, which rolled off the shed into a corner of the yard. Thither the lady's maid had gone to empty out in a frame of mint easier to be imagined than described.

HOW THE PRINCE TOOK HIS CHOCOLATE.

"This happened in the morning. The same evening Prince K—— received a letter from the lady, and one from up his card. For a moment the still furious damsel was confused between the conflicting emotions of anger and admirer, and let his affair pass thus. But upon second thoughts, determined to write a letter of reproach, especially, the unfortunate and unsuspecting Lothario was informed that the box had been found, and the key, the loss of which he had hitherto supposed the fairy utterly inexplicable. The letter was written, and the lady's maid sent off to the Prince's hotel. But the Prince was not in this extraordinary and discouraging reception! An accident in the flow of Paris's inexhaustible gayety. The myst-fied Russian demanded an explanation; and after pondering for a few minutes, he could make no possible question, finally obtained an intelligible reply.

"'Do you mean to say, my dear boy,' how many there were of these frightful papillotes?'

"'Twenty-four, Monseigneur, I suppose,' returned the lady, 'that I gave myself the trouble to count your Highness's chocolate pots.'

"It would have been as well, however, to have done so before you sent them to the theatres.'

"'Because there were thirty of them.'

"'Which should have been used, I suppose?' (Another smile.)

"'You would have found, upon very slight examination,' continued the Russian, 'that each paper contained but thirty-five chocolate were wrapped in thirty notes of a thousand francs each!'

The lady of the theatre fainted—and fainted a little. The beyond readily brought her to by holding his pocket-book under her nose. She is reported to have actually recovered next before, who, by the aid of a ladder, mounted to the roof of the shed, and recovered the precious box. They were still there, and the key was found, and the box had rolled off, and that, too, after some further search. Her fainting attack was a little longer than the former, but over with his nose, found out its chocolative character, and disdained to be put to bed. Finally, after a good deal lasting boon made of simple sugar, the mouthful would have cost a thousand francs.

PRUSSIA.

THE SPEECH OF THE REGENT.

The Prussian Chambers opened their session on the 19th. The speech, which was looked for by the King's presence, is conflicting, and is the first official declaration of policy the Regent. The general condition of the country is prosperous, and Germany is described as being at present in a favorable state and sufficient for the expenditures. Increased confidence is expressed in the maintenance of the royal dignity, for the augmentation of the army force, and for the support of the German Confederation, so far as its constituting condition. The peaceful relations of Prussia and the foreign countries continue, and their friendly connections with the great powers remain undisturbed.

The Regent declares that the relations between Prussia and the other German Federal powers have been directed by the principles of the Federal Constitution. He also declares that Danish disputes will be settled by the Federal Diet within the federal law and treaties between the German Diet and Denmark, and concludes with a passage in his speech considered with a patriotic appeal to the Deputies.

ITALY.

SPEECH OF THE KING OF SARDINIA.

At latest dates from Europe, dispatching rumors continued to prevail on the Continent. Matters were agitated by the speech of the King of Sardinia at the opening of the Chambers, which was construed into a warlike sense. The King says: "The political horizon is not clear, but the fair must be watched with firmness; the future can not fail to be fortunate, because the policy of the Government is based on justice, and a love of its country's liberty." Piedmont is small, but great in the moral force which it represents. It represents and represents and the sympathies it inspires. It respects treaties, and is not insensible to Italy's cry of anguish. The King concluded with these words: "Let us reconcile with decrees of Providence." Prolonged acclamations followed the conclusion of the speech.

MARRIAGE OF PRINCE NAPOLEON WITH A SARDINIAN PRINCESS.

Prince Napoleon left Paris on the 18th ultimo for Turin to espouse the Princess Clotilde, daughter of the King of Sardinia. The news of the alliance of Prince Napoleon with the Princess Clotilde produced great excitement in Paris, and Napoleon, who regard it as a pledge of the united action of France and Sardinia. Count Cavour, the Sardinian Minister, and Count Walewski, Minister for Foreign Affairs, at Genoa and Turin would lead to demonstrations of an unfriendly character.

FEELING AMONG THE ITALIANS.

The reserve of the Italian press continues sustained. Many persons were leaving Milan to meet the Emperor Napoleon at Turin. The Milan Corriere says that the Italians are "Death to the Germans!" The troops quartered at Milan are constantly cavalry, and the strictest discipline is necessary to prevent excesses. The Piedmontese Minister of War has issued a circular calling back from the ranks of the Liberal party, Signor Radaze being chosen Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The official Piedmontese Gazette publishes the following decree:—"The Minister of War is authorized to make the disposals of reinforcements in Italy, the Piedmontese troops are to be placed on a war footing." The dietary allowance for the Piedmontese Legion of Lombardy, with Garibaldi, existing out the contingent.

AUSTRIAN PREPARATIONS FOR DEFENCE.

No fewer than 100,000 men are under arms in Venetia. Three Victoria on the 5th, and by Wednesday seventeen thousand men, with their artillery, were on the road to Verona. Twenty-four pieces of heavy artillery were sent off on Monday. Three steamers with troops had arrived at Venice. The Austrian Government has ordered an additional reinforcements extend Milan on the 10th inst. ten thousand men. Marshal Count Schwarzenberg, the Count Wimpffen, and General Gyulai, the Military Governor, remained at Milan. Reinforcements continued to be sent mounted on the citadel of Milan, all pointed against the city.

MALTA.

FRENCH ALFRED ON HIS TRAVELS.

The Prince of Wales arrived at Malta on the 7th. Today the authorities of Malta went to very great trouble and expense to receive the Prince in a manner worthy of the Queen of Malta. The Governor's residence, the Palace of Malta, which has been the great affair of my darling life, was fitted up for the Prince's reception, and there he has been in-house, at which the Prince landed. It was an hour of honor received his there: and on his leading Bergen Malta were arranged in the form of the word Victoria, the front was a very brilliant sight. The landing-place was lined with soldiers and sailors, and the streets were lined with tanners and flags. The whole was arranged by Sir Henry Storks, Governor and did him great credit. The Queen herself could not have received greater honors. The Prince proceeded to the Palace of Malta, where he remained for the night. He will leave this morning, steamed of a boat, to going to the dog-ship to sport others, to the Governor's yacht, and will then proceed on his sleeps across. He has, in company with Major Gen. Storks, visited the principal sights of the island, and seen purchases in the shops. He is very observant, and has often been heard to express his admiration of the English beauty, a visitor at Malta, who is attended of his visit. The Prince has been the guest of Governor Storks. Prince picked up, and smiled on seeing the dance No. 1 was think it a very pretty one, and did not like the next. And the six following dances with the same name."

TURKEY.

THE SULTAN BENT ON HIS CONDITIONS.

A Constantinople letter of the 15th December, in the Journal de Francfort, says:—"The Sultan received, in place, a few days ago, on the part of the persons who had fled from Jeddah, a deputation charged to ask his pardon. The Sultan was on his way from Top Hanei, where he had been to see the Sultana Validé, who was ill. He would not hear but by an ambassador of many from him. The Sultan, at finding himself surrounded by the crowd, who were entreating him to grant the life of the chief of his suite; but soon discovering the pacific character of the deputation, he made a sign to the crowd that he was then should be designed to call on Hakki Bey, who should be the interpreter between him and the deputation and the subject of the claims. The following day three of the deputies were received by the Grand Vizier, and then to Riza Pasha, the president of the commission formed to inquire into the affair of Jeddah. Riza Pasha is said to have been very severe or to treat the deputies. The Sultan assured them that all their accounts could be paid, but that he could not accept any excuses. Meanwhile many of these unfortunate men, who are pressed by their own creditors, have been obliged to sell their property, and several of them have been compelled to abandon their commercial establishments for days after, by the workmen of the Imperial buildings."

THE CONDITIONS SEEN BY EUCAY.

The Times correspondent at Constantinople asserts that the Grand Vizier has not the power of concluding peace" to a greater extent than any of his forefathers. It is a mistake to suppose that the ambassadors of the predecessors certain time-honored interests, old laws and customs, inflexible principles, and unwritten rules, are consented on the power of the sovereign; and, even if the Grand Vizier should have entered into any treaty which he received, he had to do so at his own risk, and often to pay for such imprudence with his head. Nevertheless, he is always with all these obstacles to unlimited sovereign power, by statesmen who have been obliged to negotiate and cross interests in a bureaucratic hierarchy entirely at variance with the principles of European diplomacy. Hence it is that the representative of a French or English ambassador grows facetious and angry over some intrigue or act of treachery which, in the eyes of the native monarch is a most thorough astonut. And although he may be disappointed at the result of his efforts, he is still in the long run defeat those who coerce him. We have, it is true, only seen the Grand Vizier exercise his numerous soon-in-ire, and lecture his multitudinous ministers, but we recognize in his dignity and in the importance of short recitals. But the strong-minded slave of the Ottoman Empire is not to be judged by the standard of his economical minister's decree. Weaker find that their oil stockinets.

SERVIA.

HOW PRINCE ALEXANDER WAS ASKED TO RESIGN.

According to metropolitan newspaper correspondence, the Skupschtina has addressed a deputation to Prince Alexander when they asked him to resign. A deputation of twenty-four members, headed by Colonel Petronievitch, and by the Archimandrite Hadjitschitsch, proceeded to the Prince's residence to fulfil their commission. The deputies declared that the wishes of the nation were to remain in the country in possession of thy full liberty. And that it is also the wish of the Porte, and of the heads of the family. The nation expects thy abdication; thou wilt not refuse to comply with the nation's wish. The grand functionary to whom this extraordinary language was addressed, replied that he was quite ready to resign. His wife and relatives, however, after word compelled him to refuse the request, and he was obliged to take refuge in the Turkish fortress of Belgrade.

HOW THE PRINCE SEAT HIS WIFE.

Another writer says: "It would seem that the scene which caused when a deputation of the Skupschtina presented the Prince to abdicate was of a kind unusual in political life, and in Western Europe. The Prince's wife, Princess Julia, was present, and violently reproached her husband for his weakness, declaring that 'she would rather be out to please than abdicate.' What subsequently passed in the presence of the deputation is thus described by the Vienna correspondent of the Augsburg Gazette: 'After the second address had been read for some time, her husband lost patience, and, as the Princess still remained, he pushed her into an adjoining room. Hereby however, had the interrupted conversation been resumed by the spokesmen of the deputation, when the lady reappeared, and discharged a volley of invectives at the representatives of the nation. The Hospodar again conducted his wife to the door, and dismissed her with a few second calm."

INDIA.

SENTENCE ON THE KING OF DELHI.

At latest dates the Nawab of Bonda had surrendered to the British. The trial of the principal prisoners on the ex-King of Dehli had been carried into effect on Monday, January 3d, and sentence passed on the chief Gosp, which is to be his destination. The dispersion of the rebels continued, but military accounts slow being received.

SIAM.

A STATE DINNER AT BANGKOK.

A correspondent of the London Times thus describes a dinner given by the second King of Siam to the suite and officials of Siam:—"The illustrious company sit down to a table covered with every delicacy of the season. A full of cold pheasants, and the rest of the bill of fare purveyed, so one who has the means to afford can have every thing without all the trouble of rearing and fattening fowls at home. Turtle soup and salmon, hare and current jelly, grouse and venison pasty, and a dozen other dishes of luxury other less familiar but higher sounding claims, relieve the monotony of roast beef and boiled fowls and ducks; even these to-day make their appearance in the shape of curries, and with English sauces, and the French mushrooms. Madeira supplies the most appropriate wine for the dinner, but there is also to be a kind of Bottle Beer at all which is a delicious combination of potatoes, and Australia the most delicious beverage in the country, and Champagne, Burgundy, and Claret, and West Indies furnish the rest; there are dates from Egypt and raisins from Malaga, and Manilla cheroots from China; scarcely a country in the world but helps to load the table, and the Queen of Siam and the Cape of Good Hope but bad liquor. The guests taste of every thing, and the Siamese, who have their own beautiful fruits, they only taste, for like all good Siamese, they have a decided preference for their own country productions. The dinner is served in European style, and the salmon pulled to pieces with a fork, and not with a knife. The Siamese are not a knife and fork people as we do with the cheese, they express themselves astonished at the vulgarity of the custom, and say that we can not cut as many as he likes by dropping a tine and bent the knife."

WHAT AND HOW THEY DRINK.

"They drink wine, but not much, for wine will not tempt, and the client is rejected, but they do not control their high spirits with it. The Second King of Siam wishes to take wine with the gentlemen next him, whose attention is called to the fact by the interpreter of the wine; he turns round, his noise fitted in glassing cannot convey any thing but wine, and the gentleman sees quickly filled, two bowls are greatly inclined, two glasses of wine are drunk, and the interpreter is told to inform the King that the drinking followed the example of his royal highness. The King expresses himself highly pleased at such a mark of attention, and begs to drink to the next rest for that evening. The Prince and Prakeng ordinary drink with the Second King in honor of the attention, where their arms will not reach, by a series of bowing and the mutual drinking of his name wishes they wish to honor.

DESSERT AND CIGARS.

"Dinner is over, the cloth is off, and the table given with purple velvet, ornamented with gold lace, massive golden pines, and heaps of scarlet mandarins. The Second King rises, and the company follow his royal example. Lovely flowers of exquisite odor spring from silver vases; the air is perfumed with the most fragrant sparkling of glasses covered the luxurious gilt; leaving the room and a large number of cigars, in the most fancy cigar circle. The prince's son and the prince minister's daughter, who are present, in the veranda during dinner, are now invited in; the former, a boy of about seven years old, is dressed in a European suit, and is regarded with the greatest attention as he runs hastily into the floor. The cigars become extinct, and the gentlemen, preparing to take their departure for a time there is silence, but the cigars are soon finished, and the guests rise to take their leave. Conversation in the King of Siam have their healths proposed in a sort speech by one of the ministers, and the King, after replying to the prince's, who, rising up and calling attention to the health of the King of Siam, gives the toast of 'Queen Wik-to-rier!' and then gives a second grant of exhilaration as all loyally proposed to it."

MEXICO

MORE REVOLUTIONS.

The date from Mexico is to the 10th inst. The Pendulenoia—General Miramon's organ at Guadalajara —declares that the Liberals are in a hopeless state of their bolster, but will adhere to the Zuloago plan. General Miramon and marching with 2,000 men, and declared a forced loan of $600,000 at Guadalajara, including contributions of $100,000 each from the clergy. The press of the City of Mexico state that the French Minister has left for Vera Cruz, and that the Spanish Minister is about to follow him. It is said that the choice of French and English subjects within six days, the fleets of those nations will be in the harbor of Vera Cruz and Tampico. The statement was discredited. Miramon declares that the capture of Vera Cruz by treachery to his (Miramon's) election to the Presidency, but has not been confirmed. Vera Cruz was in a state of siege, and was backed by the capitulists and on friendly terms with the Liberals. No news had been received for Zuloaga, Robles will join the liberals. The English and French steamers had left for Vera Cruz. Miramon had issued on Juarez for prompt payment of the English debt.

PARAGUAY.

LOPEZ DECLARES WAR ON PIQUE.

Advices from Paraguay, through sources unlikely to be American, state that Lopez is actively making preparations for war, in expectation of the failure of negotiations with the United States. The correspondent who left Asuncion on November 20, reports that he saw Lopez on the occasion of a review, and that he was in a dictatorial, and commanded by French and English officers. The Paraguayan army is said to be well drilled and disciplined and the artillery is described as being in a state of the flower of the army. President Lopez was in very bold in demanding the satisfaction of the flag, the demands of the United States. He continually declared in the strongest terms that nothing but war would meet his requirements. The last number of the Semanario says:

"The American squadron, demanding the decisive and dignity of this Government, making demands which, in the opinion of the Government, it is impossible to grant, is required to leave the territorial waters of the Republic within twenty-four hours from the time of the Asuncion. The order issued from the fortress of Humaita on the way crimson Water Witch, and to allow the persons who were detained indemnity to return and re-establish their business in the territory of the Republic.

The Committee of the United States Senate doubtless wish to make Paraguay the laughing stock of the world. No; a thousand times no. Although we can not promise ourselves the laurels of victory, we can, at least, be sensible of the reward which all will accord to the heroically defended. It is not great and difficult to die for the country, but it is sometimes more glorious not when an obstacle dishonorably to annihilating or conditions."

DR. HORACE GREEN.

DR. HORACE GREEN AND HIS METHOD.

THE excitement which has been caused by the circumstances attending the death of the late S. S. Whitney, and the vital importance of shedding the utmost possible light on the subject of throat and lung disease and the various methods employed to cure them, have prompted us to lay before our subscribers a portrait of Dr. Horace Green of this city, and some illustrations of his modus operandi and his instruments. Of the Doctor himself we may say briefly here that he is a native of this country, and about fifty-seven years of age. He began practice in Vermont, removed from there to Pennsylvania, and finally settled in New York; he adopted, as his specialty, the treatment of lung and throat diseases, and became so eminent in that branch that his practice is said to be the most lucrative in the city; in 1850 he helped to start, and became the President of, the New York Medical College. His method of treating throat and lung diseases is chiefly local—namely, with the knife, the scissors, and the cautery. With the scissors engraved herewith he snips off the palate; the nippers and surgeon's knife are used, in like manner, for the excision of the tonsils and diseased parts of the interior of the throat. When the disease springs from ulcerations which can not or ought not to be treated with the knife, Dr. Green cauterizes with a solution of nitrate of silver on a sponge, which sponge is placed at the end of a long, slender rod of whalebone, called a probang. The probang is lowered into the throat, as in the illustration herewith given, and the ulcerated parts gently washed with the solution. Occasionally a hollow flexible gutta percha tube is introduced, and through this tube a solution of nitrate of silver injected into the lungs, with a view to cauterize ulcers or sores there. Of course it is neither our province nor our purpose to make any remark upon Dr. Green's treatment either for throat or bronchial affections, or actual tubercular disease; its merits and demerits must be left to the decision of experience; we merely make the above brief explanations in order that our lay readers may understand the use of the instruments. The accompanying diagrams of the throat, lungs, and adjacent parts will enable the attentive reader to understand thoroughly the processes of Dr. Green, and the case of Mr. Whitney.

To come to the melancholy event which has attracted so much attention to Dr. Green's method: On 25th October last, Mr. S. S. Whitney, of this city, a patient of Dr. Beales, consulted Dr. Green for, as he believed, disease of the throat. Dr. Green pursued the usual course: removed part of the tonsil, cauterized the pharynx, epiglottis, and other parts, and injected a solution of nitrate of silver into the lungs. On 14th December Mr. Whitney sent for his old physician, Dr. Beales, and stated to him that Dr. Green had killed him. Dr. Beales and Dr. Valentine Mott treated Mr. Whitney for a week, at the end of which he died. An autopsy was made of his body by Drs. Mott and Beales, without notification to Dr. Green; and it was discovered that the patient had died of an abscess in the larynx. With the professional question raised in the case the public have very little concern; the practical point at issue is, was Mr. Whitney's death produced by Dr. Green's injections into his throat and lungs; or did he die of an abscess, which Drs. Beales and Mott failed to diagnose? This question was taken up by the Academy on Wednesday, 23d, and statements made by the medical men concerned. We give them in order:

DR. GREEN'S STATEMENT.

On the 25th of October, 1858, Mr. S. S. Whitney called on me, and requested to place himself under my care, for medical treatment. His health, as he stated, had been bad during several years, and for a twelvemonth past he had more or less cough, which cough had increased considerably of late. It was quite severe by spells, he said, and was attended with slight hemorrhage, which, he believed, came from his throat. His face was pale and thin, and his general appearance was indicative of a phthisical condition of the system. I examined his chest by auscultation, in the presence of Dr. Richards, who, as is usual in the cases I examine, made a note, at the time, of the physical signs observed. I take from this record: "Chest thin; a little depression is observed on the left thoracic wall, with less expansion on this side; percussion gives a flat sound over all the upper portion of the left lung; slightly dull on the right side." On applying the ear to the chest, a distinct humid râle or "click" was heard below the left clavicle in both inspiration and expiration—which, when accompanying the above signs, is positively indicative, in my experience, of the presence of tubercular softening. His throat appeared granulated and inflamed; the left tonsil was slightly enlarged and ulcerated; the epiglottis was thickened, and its border whitened with a line of erosions.

TREATMENT.—The enlarged and ulcerated portion of the left tonsil was removed, the pharynx, the entoteuthyy fauce, and the border of the ulcerated epiglottis were cauterized. A drachm of the following alterative mixture was advised night and morning:

R Iodid. Potassæ	2 drachms.
Protiodid. Hydrarg.	2 grains.
Tinct. Rhei	1 ounce.
Syr. Sarsæ. Co.	3 ounces.

This alterative was continued by Mr. W. during the three following weeks.

Oct. 28.—Applications of a solution of nitrate of silver were again made to the fossæ, epiglottis, and into the glottis.

Oct. 27.—The same treatment was continued. After this I saw nothing more of Mr. Whitney until the 8th of November, when he returned and requested to have the treatment continued. At this visit, and again on the 18th, cauterizations of the glottis and larynx were employed. I now spoke to him of the necessity of giving more attention to his case if he expected to be benefited by the treatment. He named some cause for his long absence, and promised to be regular in his calls thereafter. The soreness of his throat had disappeared, and his cough was less for a time, but latterly it had increased again. He expressed much anxiety about his lungs, and at this visit it was proposed to employ the tube and injections into the left bronchus as soon as the parts were prepared for this operation. For this purpose the topical applications were continued to the opening of the glottis, and into the larynx. It was, I believe, at a subsequent visit on the 20th, that I made another careful examination of his lungs. Unequivocal signs of a cavity in the superior portion of the left lung were now observed; for in addition to humid râles in this location, the respiratory sound was distinctly cavernous.

A prescription for the following remedy was given to the patient:

R Mangani Oxid. Puri	2 drachms.
Tr. Cinchonæ	3 ounces.
Syr. Sarsæ	4 ounces.
Mucil. Acaciæ	1 ounce.
Ol. Gaultheriæ	20 drops.

With directions that a drachm should be taken twice daily.

Dec. 4.—Another interruption of two weeks occurred, when Mr. W. returned, and the opposite probang was passed into the larynx.

Dec. 6.—It had been my intention for several weeks to employ tubage of the larynx in this case, as soon as the normal sensibility at the opening of the glottis was sufficiently overcome to allow the introduction of the instrument. But the patient's visits had occurred at such long intervals that I found the parts were not properly prepared. But as Mr. W. had several times expressed a desire to have it used, I resolved on the 6th to make the attempt. The tube was therefore introduced, and a drachm of the nitrate of silver solution, of the strength of fifteen grains to the ounce, was injected into the left bronchus. No irritation whatever followed this operation. The patient's next call was on the 9th of December. At this visit he expressed much satisfaction with the effects of the injection, stating that his cough and expectoration were both diminished, and he desired that the injection should be again employed; but, for reasons hereafter named, only the glottis and larynx were cauterized as in previous operations, and the patient engaged to call in two days and have the tubage repeated; but he failed to meet this engagement, and did not return until the 14th—five days afterward. This was the last visit Mr. W. made at my office; and as most unjust and utterly unfounded reports have been made and widely circulated with regard to the character of this operation and its effects, I shall describe briefly, but minutely and exactly, the steps of the operation. After much experience in catheters of the larynx, it has been fully ascertained that this operation can be performed with greater certainty if employed soon, or within one or two days after the opening of the glottis has been cauterized. Hence these applications are usually made once or twice between each operation of tubage.

When Mr. W. came to my office on the 14th, Dr. E. M. Foy, a member of this Academy, was present. He had expressed a desire to see the operation of tubage employed on some of my patients, and when Mr. W. came and took his seat, I remarked to Dr. Foy that it had been my intention to employ the tube for him on that day; but as he had not had an application to the glottic opening for five or six days, I was fearful, for that reason, of not succeeding; and as I had other patients on whom the tube operation was practiced, I should not use it in Mr. W.'s case, but employ the sponge-probang. This instrument was employed, but the tube was not used that day on Mr. Whitney. It was never used but once in his case, and that was on the 6th of December, eight days before this last operation. The same probang, identical instrument, which, on some ten different occasions previously, had been passed into the glottis and larynx of the patient, was employed, and in precisely the same way, except when the sponge reached the glottic opening the patient partially closed the throat (a thing occurring every day with nervous or sensitive patients, and as every operator knows, without the occurrence of any harm to the patient), by which the progress of the instrument was suddenly arrested, so that it did not enter the windpipe at all. It was at once removed, no more force having been used than that which is constantly employed every day in operations on the sio-pasages. The operation was not renewed, and the patient, after lying a while with Dr. Foy and myself, and remarking that "the operation hurt him more," or that "he felt it more than usual" (which error, as I said to him, from the sudden arrestment of the instrument), he left, with the arrangement that he should return the next day and have the tube employed. These are the precise steps, and the particulars of the last operation. Dr. Foy stood directly by the side of Mr. W., and saw every part of the operation, and can testify, I doubt not, to the entire correctness of this statement. On the 27th of December, as soon as rumor brought to me the report said to have come from the patient and his physician, or friends, "that the tube was used and had been thrust through the windpipe," I addressed a note to Dr. Foy, the purport of which will be sufficiently apparent from his reply, which was as follows:

Letter of Dr. Foy.

NO. 16 WEST TWENTY-FIFTH STREET, } DEC. 27, 1858.

DR. HORACE GREEN:—Dear Sir: In reply to your note of this date, I was present when you operated on Mr. Whitney in your office on the 14th inst. You directed my attention to Mr. Whitney's case.

You passed a sponge-probang, saturated with solution of nitrate of silver, into the glottis. The operation was followed by very trifling irritation, not worse than I have experienced from having myself swab brushed with nitrate of silver.

We had, at the time, a conversation about probangs. You exhibited to me some brought you by your patients, remarking that the sponge was too large and the curve too great. You showed me that the sponge used on Mr. Whitney was capable of containing half a drachm of the solution.

Your office lad told me that, if I required probangs, he could supply me with the same sort you generally use. I mention these trifling particulars that you may see how vividly the operation is impressed on my mind.

You mentioned Mr. Whitney by name, and the date is fixed on my mind beyond shadow of doubt.

I am, dear Sir, yours obediently,
MICHAEL EYRE FOY, Surgeon.

P.S.—I desire further to state that nothing but the probang was used.

You did not use a tube. In fact, I never saw a tube used by you or others.
M. E. FOY.

It is reported that the patient returned to his house complaining of his throat. That night he was taken worse, and died in one week from the day in which he last visited me at my office. Of the cause of his death, it remains for the profession of my country to say, after they shall have learned from his attending physicians the symptoms present during his life, and the appearances found at the post-mortem, as observed by these gentlemen, for at this examination neither myself nor any of my friends were present.

In connection with cases of this nature, Mr. President, are involved questions of great interest to practical medicine. Of the employment of topical medication, or the direct application of nitrate of silver and other medicinal agents to the mucous membranes of the air-passages, a practice which, at the present day, is being every where more or less employed; if, I say, it be fraught with danger to the patient, or if there exist any peculiar conditions of the human system, general or local, in which topical applications, such as I have described as having been employed in Mr. W.'s case, are likely to be followed with dangerous or fatal symptoms, then, if possible, let these facts be ascertained. For myself, I shrink from no inquiry in which the interests of practical medicine may be advanced. Having performed the same operation as that which was practiced upon Mr. Whitney on the 14th of last December over 100,000 times since 1845 (so can be shown by my books), without the occurrence of a single untoward accident, I am quite desirous to know whether the fatal results which have been attributed to it as the cause, have in reality followed this particular operation.

Struggling against some disadvantages, of which the Fellows of this Academy are not wholly ignorant, I have labored more than twenty years to add something to our curative means, in the more successful treatment of a disease which, doubly decimating in its fatality, is still the opprobrium of our profession; and to this same work, whatever obstacles may arise, I am determined to give the remaining years of my professional life.

DR. BEALE'S STATEMENT.

Dec. 14, 1858.—About 1 in the afternoon I was called to see Samuel S. Whitney; I found him surrounded by several members of his family, in a state of the most intense excitement, suffering, and terror; in answer to my inquiries as to what had happened, he answered, "Sit down, Beales, and I will tell you the truth; I was such a fool as to go to Dr. Green to be operated upon, and the d—d villain his killed me" his countenance was pale and haggard, and had all the appearance of a man whose nervous system had received a severe shock; his breathing was occasionally irregular and almost spasmodic, coughing almost incessantly and speaking with great difficulty and pain, in a hoarse, unnatural tone of voice; his skin was cold and clammy, and covered with perspiration; the pulse was extremely frequent, feeble, irregular, and intermittent; he was excessively restless, not remaining in the same place more than a few minutes at a time, complaining of intense pain in the region of the larynx; shooting through to the cervical vertebræ and down the course of the trachea to the chest; he kept grasping the larynx, and reiterating every few minutes that he was murdered; I endeavored to calm the excitement of the patient, and tried to examine his fauces and throat, which appeared to be in a state of great inflammation; I discovered no lesion, as, in fact, on account of the pain and terror of the patient, the examination was necessarily very imperfect, as he would scarcely allow the spoon to touch his tongue, and I concluded, therefore, to defer the examination till he should become more quiet; I gradually ascertained, partly from the family and partly from himself, that he had been several times to see Dr. Green; on the first occasion his tonsils had been amputated; at a subsequent occasion, ten or twelve days previously (the exact dates were not told to the relator), a hollow tube had been passed into his lungs, and about a tea-spoonful of solution of nitrate of silver had been injected into them by touching a spring at the top of the tube; whether this was done more than once the relator did not recollect to have been stated; on the 14th of December Mr. Whitney breakfasted with his family, appearing to be in his usual health; he afterward went to Dr. Green's office; the Doctor passed an instrument into his throat, and finding some obstruction, he pushed the instrument with some force; he (Mr. W.) felt something give way; immediately experienced severe pain about the top of the windpipe, and told the Doctor he had hurt him; he returned home, informed the family of what had occurred, and I was called, as before stated; I, for a few days, with the symptoms and in the state previously described; it was evident that, under such circumstances, the only indications that could be followed were to rally the patient's strength, to produce some reaction, and to moderate the local irritation in the fauces; to this effect I ordered him to be immediately put in bed, between warm blankets, and to use hot-water and flax-seed tea.

Dec. 14, 7 P.M.—Is suffering severe pain, described to be in the larynx down the course of the trachea to the chest, and round to the cervical vertebræ; pulse 112, full and irregular; still excessively restless: other symptoms are about the same; insisted on my swallowing with him all night. B Vin. antimonial., solut. s. morph., syrup. guaun, aq. distillat. A dessert-spoonful every four hours. To inhale the vapor of infusion of flax seed and poppy heads.

Dec. 15, 3 A.M.—They called me, as they observed the face to be swelling; I found extensive emphysema all round the neck, and partially in the face, rather more noticeable on the left side; he had continued excessively restless, scarcely dozing for a few minutes, breathing very irregular; pulse 106; urine scanty, very high colored, and turbid. Continue the same remedies and nourishment.

1 P.M.—Heat of surface more natural; scarcely any pain in the chest, emphysema very much increased round the throat and face, and extending down the chest; has not slept; has taken scarcely any nourishment on account of the pain in swallowing; could not continue the inhalations, although they were relieved him temporarily. Anodyne liniment to be applied to throat and chest.

8 P.M.—Dr. Valentine Mott saw him, in consultation with me; is decidedly worse; emphysema very much increased; neck and chest enormously swollen—it has extended all over the chest, but lower down on the right side; breathing somewhat labored; pulse very feeble, irregular, and 112; skin is again covered with clammy perspiration, and about the neck and chest is of a purplish erysipelatous appearance; does not particularly complain of pain, except on talking or swallowing. Dr. Mott gave a very unfavorable prognosis. Continue anodyne, and take alternately a tea-spoonful of ammoniated tincture of valerian.

Dec. 16, 6 A.M.—Upon the whole has passed a more comfortable night; symptoms are all a shade better; the emphysema rather less in the face, but the throat and the chest are enormous, the mammæ resembling those of a nursing woman. Continue fine whey.

1 P.M.—With Dr. Mott. The emphysema extends to Poupart's ligament on the right side; but only as low as the umbilicus on the left; cough less frequent, except when he swallows; pulse 108 and rather firmer. Same remedies and nourishment.

P. M.—With Dr. Mott. Is not so well; emphysematous swelling increasing; can not open his eye till the air is carefully pressed out of the lids; chest and abdomen still more swollen; pulse more feeble, 122, although he has taken nourishment more freely. Same remedies.

Dec. 17, 8 A.M.—Has slept more during the night —sometimes for nearly an hour at a time; has taken more nourishment, but three ingestions of nourishment in the morning exercise, which interrupts his respiration, and gives him great trouble to expectorate; pulse very irregular and feeble; the slightest movement increases its frequency; it averages about 108.

P. M.—With Dr. Mott. There is no observable change in the symptoms, although he says he has more confidence; several attempts have been made from time to time to examine the fauces and adjacent parts, but the examination was prevented then useless.

P. M.—With Dr. Mott. There is again a slight lull in the symptoms, excepting the pulse, which is extremely irregular at 160. Same remedies.

Dec. 18, 8 A.M.—Has passed the last night without the attack; there is a decided improvement in all his symptoms; emphysema slightly subsiding; pulse 96; is much more hopeful.

P. M.—With Dr. Mott. We consider him decidedly improved; all the symptoms are favorable; he is slightly flighty from the effects of the anodynes.

P. M.—Is not so well again, without any other apparent cause than he would get up during my absence and sit for about an hour on the chair; the pulse is more frequent and irregular; the difficulty of swallowing is decidedly increasing; he also attempt to do so bringing on coughing, partial strangulation, and some regurgitation of the food.

Dec. 19, 6 A.M.—Passed a very bad night, principally owing to the great increase of the mucous secretion, which keeps him almost constantly coughing and expectorating, which he does with great difficulty and suffering; the pulse very frequent, feeble, and extensively irregular; took a half-drachm of the anodyne at a time (ß Ammon. carbon., gtt. v; mist. camph. ßiß.), every four hours, in place of the tinct. valerian. ammoniat.; although it is certain that the ulceration is not seen below the inferior vicinity of the glottis, yet it is utterly impossible to ascertain the state of the parts; the swelling has rather extended around the upper part of the face, so that he can partially open his eyes.

P. M.—With Dr. Mott. Has slightly rallied; but the mucous secretion is increasing, the cough more frequent, the difficulty of swallowing greater; towels have not acted for three days; continue remedies; injection; give as much nourishment as possible.

9 P.M.—All his symptoms much worse; pulse more feeble, difficulty of swallowing with the coughing and strangulation very much increased; expectorately has not been able to take as much nourishment.

Dec. 20, 6 A.M.—Has passed a very bad night, breathing difficult, and all the difficulties of swallowing, etc., increasing; the emphysema rapidly disappearing from the face and head; abdomen distended and tympanitic; injection did not operate; a table-spoonful of castor oil.

P. M.—With Dr. Mott. All the symptoms gradually becoming more serious.

10 P.M.—Is very much worse in every respect; respiration excessively laborer; the slightest attempt to deep threatens suffocation from the accumulation of mucus; can swallow with difficulty; refused to swallow; the oil operated twice, and he was excessively exhausted; pulse extremely feeble and irregular, 136; he is evidently sinking.

Dec. 21, 7 A.M.—During the night he became rapidly worse; could not swallow after 2 A.M., and died rather suddenly at 8 A.M., partly from exhaustion and partly by asphyxia.

Note.—A number of trifling circumstances, such as the varying appearance of the tumor in the occasional slight changes in the symptoms, etc., as not throwing additional light on the case, have been omitted, in order to make the history more distinct.

NEW YORK, Jan. 16, 1858.

POST MORTEM OF SAMUEL S. WHITING.

NEW YORK, December 22, 1858.

Thirty hours after death nothing peculiar in the appearance of the body. Rigor mortis not very accurate.

On making an incision from under the chin in the mesial line of the sternum, it was remarked that the anterior projection of the thyroid cartilage was more than ordinary. Dissecting down, I divided the deep cervical fascia on the left side of the thyroid cartilage and found only a little fatty tissue division opened into a cavity, containing pus, about the size of a large hen's egg, and extending a little in front of the pharynx and downward behind and below the thyroid cartilage. At the upper and posterior part of this abscess there was a small opening into the pharynx, large enough to admit the end of the forefinger. This abscess was found to hold a quantity of destroyed filamentous tissue, hanging from different parts of it like wetted tow. The entrance into the œsophagus immediately below this was perfectly sound, internally and externally. The larynx was now laid open from behind, and at the first glimpse a red point about the size and shape of a grain of wheat on the left side, a little below the left chorda vocalis, and running longitudinally, led us to exclaim, there is the point of laceration of the mucous membrane, by which the air has escaped into the cellular tissue to constitute the emphysema. On close inspection, and wiping the part with a sponge, no abrasion nor aperture could be discovered. Every other part of the larynx and trachea, as far as removed, presented on its internal surface a perfectly normal appearance. Indeed, we all remarked that we had never seen a larynx and trachea more natural and healthy. We next proceeded to have a look at the œsophagus. Perhaps about an inch above the division of the trachea, the most beautiful vermilion redness that we ever saw on a mucous surface commenced and extended into each bronchus, but greatest in the left, and extended down to each lung. Over this peculiar redness there was a clear shade, which vanished after a moment's study to the flir. On opening the pleura, the upper lobe of the left side, at first glance, seemed covered with white flakes, but, on close examination, it proved to be soft strumous, like fibrin, easily rubbed off. This, on the most posterior part, presented that lobe in patches to the pleura costalis. These impacted flakes were also found closely united to the perfect adhesions were easily broken down. The left lung, like the right, in the upper part of this lobe was very red, and very solid—hepatized. Just at the root, or at the commencement of the bronchial ramifications there was an open cavity, about the size of a small black walnut, of a dark purplish color, and irregular hilliows surface, as though a slough had separated. At the upper and anterior part of this cavity was a small opening through tough pleura. This lobe was cut into in different directions, but no other cavity was found. The lower lobe was perfectly healthy. The redness of the mucous membrane of the right bronchus extended to the top of that side, but the three lobes were perfectly normal. There were no old adhesions on either side of the cavity. Some little appearance of the emphysema remained.

ALEX'R B. MOTT, M.D.

Dr. Green made some further remarks, to the effect that the French faculty were unanimously adult that nitrate of silver can be safely injected into the lungs, and beneficially used in many cases. He added: I did not desire Mr. Whitney to come to me for treatment. He came to me of his own accord, and I found him laboring under a bronchial affection, and in the early stage of pneumonia, as I supposed. When he left he went under the care of another physician, by whom I believe myself by dogging him [applause], and degrade my profession? Very [Renewed applause.] I did they not for me, I should have been there. I have saved two or three patients in this city under similar circumstances by the same line of treatment. But it is asked why I did not send round and inquire. Dr. Beales has asserted to a gentleman present that such was the duty of the family toward me that, had I ventured to come near the house, I should have been sent for—called personal violence. Still, if I had been called upon, I should have gone nevertheless. Although in the first stage, his friends and others advised him to be present himself, or have a representative present, to watch the case—examination, Dr. Green stated that he had at last deputed Dr. Carnochan to represent him, and to visit Dr. Mott to make the arrangements to be present, when he found that it had already taken place.

Dr. Green made some remarks, but they chiefly referred to his (the speaker's) knowledge of abscesses, and threw no light on the subject.

THE SUNLIGHT IN HER HAIR.

THERE'S no old store house, on a lonely street,
In house or in dwelling, low,
And day by day, for forty years,
I've passed within its view;
And a form as old, and weary state—
The sun-cast shell of the rich and great—
I've drawn in the street, through the dingy palet,
In a consequential way;
Thinking to shun from the summer heat
And the yellow sunlight's play.

But I watch alone the one bright spot
On these dingy, sombre walls,
Where a woman sits at her daily toil,
And the yellow sunlight falls.
Her hair is as white as the snow for forty years,
Through the breaking of miles and the falling of tears;
I have watched the jewel my heart has cherished,
The passion and the best;
I have mingled her name with my daily prayers,
The Sunlight in her hair.

And never, in all these long, long years
Have I spoken to Josephine,
But I watch the sunlight play in her hair
And the shadows pass between;
And I muse on the change that Time will bring
To every fair and beautiful thing
For when first the sunlight fell on her hair
It played with such golden tresses there
But the gold has gone, and the gathered locks
Are with time of silver laid.

I never have spoken to Josephine
Though I've watched her long and well:
But the dreams I have dreamed of the coming time
Have been in my heart to tell.
I have promised myself from day to day,
All my big new years old and my hair has grown gray,
That when fortune shall favor my efforts to rise,
Dear Josephine shall share,
And the dim old house shall be bright again
With the sunlight in her hair.

She may have grown old to other eyes,
To mine she is ever the same;
Like a glorious picture, enclosed by time,
And set in an oaken frame.
For many and many a toilsome year
I lingered in passion, or shivered in fear,
Lest some who were grander or richer than I
Should mark the yellow shoes
Of the sunlight shining in her hair
And woo my Josephine.

But the years have passed us, one by one,
And now a wiser time comes on;
They may have slighted the toiling girl,
But I love her just the same.
And every day I will pass the street,
Though she hears not the sound of my lingering feet,
And every day, through the winter's snow,
And summer's waiting green,
I will look at the window, and wait for the time
I can speak to Josephine.

THE RESIDUARY LEGATEE.

I AM a great deal better off now, through the interest of Dick Adamson; but you must know I was Parlow, Dick Adamson's copying clerk when Richard first came there. Richard came to us from the office of his father to whom he had been articled. Richard's father, I fancy, in poorer circumstances than people in the habit of dining at his table have been led to imagine. Richard's unexpired articles were transferred to the offices of Pudson, Clegg, and Parlow—Dick's, which I was doing, Richard in the long-run, as I am going to tell.

Richard Adamson was no more fit for any duty in a lawyer's office than he was fit for the post of Astronomer Royal. I do not mean to disparage the first, genius, or indeed that he would have failed ignominiously in the second. He had a knack of finding out the finest, smashing, in any performance he undertook; and I have not the least doubt that, had he been left to himself, he would have worked his way to success. But he had not unduly so turn for the law.

He and I became almost from the day of our coming together. What made me take to him so I don't know; he did not like me, and was constant in his endeavor to place our intimacy on a ground of perfect ease and openness.

I don't think that ever have troubled my head with such questions, had it not been that, whenever I mentioned my intimacy with Richard to a gentleman, there was no possibility of regarding my sister Rose in any light but that of a lady. We were, fortunately, in a very high position in the circuit, who had married a cousin as poor as himself. We had a good deal to do with the gentry, and it was about nineteen and Rose three years younger. They had been to us the best father and mother in the world, and taught us all that they knew themselves knew, which was not a mean or unserviceable sum. Rose had been to a boarding-school from which my dear father himself gave me I had none. So it came to pass that without friends, without college degrees, without prospects or commendation of any kind, I was fain to take Richard Adamson to my heart, and to consider him my friend. Mr. Clegg's managing man engaged me at a rather larger weekly salary than I had dared to hope, though I promptly asked for it in the situation which I thus obtained was kept by no for more than another week, when I was married. Two years when Richard Adamson came to cheer and lighten my official life. As for my life at home, that was light enough. Between their gaps Rose and I made common lot, and faced the world together.

It was the custom of Mr. Clegg to give annually—about Christmas time—an entertainment to which all his clerks were invited. Upon the occasion of this kind, after Richard Adamson's accession to our corps, Richard Adamson commenced to court my sister Rose. It was easy enough to make out from the first that Richard not only admired her, at no pretty considerable rate, but that he considered himself about her in a degree much more likely to increase than to diminish.

The Miss Cleggs (as they neither kept a school nor gave lessons in music and painting, I can not bring myself to call them Misses Clegg,) thought that is the more approved form of conjoint titularity) proved to be unmarried, their papa's contertainment, and did little else on that occasion. They were five in number—the Miss Cleggs; and of the youngest, Miss Caroline, I think the language of unsympathetic bachelorhood, that she was "an old maid." Matters, however, was a malapropos and a turbaned old woman, on the worst possible terms with her father, and very near losing Clegg himself, the founder of the feast, was a lean, tall, straggling, sour-visaged, haughty man, with a slight stoop. He entered the room, and then ushered by drawing up his head in a very conscious and self-sacrificing manner. He even spoke to Richard, who hid his head forward on each side, so that the ends met in a peak at the top of his narrow forehead; seldom had I seen a more haughty lad, believed to have once made a joke; and had the reputation of possessing an enormous appetite, with but a very perfect digestion. Clegg's house of residence was in a rising young crescent, which formed part of a projected suburb, and boasted of the dignity of a fashionable London. There had we all met—we, I mean, of the office—and we and Clegg had invited on our account—one December evening in the year eighteen hundred and—never mind what. The rooms were always lighted, and fires burned every where, refreshed by batters, reflected in mirrors, multiplied by gilt mouldings, and by yards of folds of silken drapery. It was an expensive welcome, and Clegg knew it.

Among Richard Adamson's endowments not named, though perhaps implied, in my list, was the excellent one of a good voice. In Richard's life Dick had been on pretty intimate terms with these Cleggs; had been asked by them to dinner-balls, and what not; had joined their picnics; had met them frequently at the houses of their common acquaintance, as well as at his father's table. It may have been a grateful recollection of young Mr. Adamson's good offices in giving life and zeal to many a solemn "séance," and scarce less solemn quadrille party and "at home," that now animated the fair but lonely bosoms of the five Miss Cleggs. I am sorry to say, suppressing any such laudable feeling to have dictated the liberal advances of those ladies, it met from Richard a very poor return. To him alone did they address the smallest amenity; to him alone was it by every body else were the Miss Cleggs avoided. At length and at last the seeming sweet was changed to bitter gall. The patience of Job and of all the Cleggs together could not have stood long against such treatment. Clegg himself, although he could probably have have been overjoyed to see the nearly penniless Richard Adamson supplied very far by any one of the girls, was mortified to notice the positive failure of temptation when tried by all five in full force. In vain did they sing duets, and waltz, waltz, and just as Richard, with Rose still upon his arm, was preferring a request connected with he might have to the pleasures of taking her down to supper, that Mr. Clegg stepped up to him and commenced one of those conversations of intellectual grace.

Old Charley Waters had long been in the habit of sending for Clegg, at all sorts of hours, to make his will, and of sending Clegg back again without it. Indeed, for the last few years, whenever that Clegg now applied to Richard, whom he maliciously worked to death on the principle of economy.

"Mr. Waters," Clegg began, "has had another severe attack, and sends word that he is anxious to arrange his worldly affairs, not knowing how the hours of life may be left him." Clegg suppressed a grim smile at the ghastly pleasantry of the message he now recited in Richard Adamson's ear.

Never had he thought it so capital a joke.

"He has sent to request that I would be for me just now to undertake," said the lawyer in continuation. "Can you go, Parlow?" I suppose I must save him from your displeasure. Think of me down stairs, Parlow, while you are with the Faberian to the lonely wanderer. Do you know what sort of night it is? Snow—snowing—the heaviest fall we are to roast done; the owl is not such an ass as to sit on the tree; the night wind. make it a night for you to be out. Charley Waters liver right on the other side of Kensington Oval. God-bye! I will never manage to get home to-night, in time to see you—Now, Mr. Clegg, I am yours."

Mr. Clegg and his articled clerk to arrange preliminaries in a little back study down stairs. Soon we heard the step of the great Mr. Clegg on the stair-case Dick Adamson into the midnight and rough weather. I thought of him, and wished him—I am ashamed to confess it—long, deserted streets, over the white and muffled pavement.

Women are riddles, as I believe some philosopher has already researched, and though I have often since had slight reason to think that my sister Rose was not to be doubted, that she also could think of nothing but Richard Adamson during all that gay and fatal evening, she certainly did not betray interest or melancholy; indeed, so far was it otherwise with her spirits that I was in the habit of thinking much more and more cheerful than the moment the hall door was heard to slap to, shutting out Richard Adamson for a time before sunrise. While he had remained with us, I could not help thinking she was not quite at her ease. Her constant talk she had answered only with short affirmative sentences, and had sometimes not answered at all, except by a smile. Again, in fact, far more subdued than I had expected it to be, under the influence of Richard's high spirits. Now that he was gone, she was as remarkably when he had gone! Well, well—women are odd things! The philosopher was correct, beyond all question.

"My dears," I heard Mamma Clegg say to her daughters, as I left the room to receive the last page sent that Mr. Adamson out of the way. He is a puppy, and he shall not go," added this more than the puppy who ever thrust his nose into my drawing-room. He deserves, as a punishment, to have to walk fifty miles home in the snow, through fifty times worse weather. And all for drinking too, and not knowing when he had had better. He ought to know, indeed, after having been made a fool of by that stupid old miser twice in one night, when he was sober."

After supper the dancing was resumed with additional animation, for new partners had been lately introduced, by heretofore modest young men, into the staid and stereotyped "first set." I must say for Rose, that, in the midst of her enjoyment of dear, she gave signs of a relapse into her silent and thoughtful mood. Indeed, so much so, that more than once I thought it likely Mr. Adamson would return. As it was then past three o'clock, I told her decidedly that I thought not. She was unskilled in our seeing him.

Dick Adamson merely rejoined with a careless "Oh!" and then seemed to forget all about it. Yes, the philosopher was most certainly right, and women are the greatest riddles in existence.

Shawls, cloaks, overcoats, and other seasonable trappings were put on, and carriages were called, and there was a bustle on the staircase and in the hall below. Rose and I were nearly the last to leave, and Mr. Clegg was standing with us near the outer door, when, just as it opened to let us out, Richard Adamson stepped quickly in.

"Going my way, Mr. Herbert?" he said to me; "here's a cab waiting that has brought me from Kensington. Will you and your sister take seats in it? Alright. Mr. Clegg; here's the will. Bulk of property to a brother at Pelize, who does not seem to have acted fraternally to our friend Waters. Very forgiving of him to leave him any thing. I must sums to other persons, a little more than ten and less than kind. Shakspeare, Miss Herbert; clever man from Stratford-on-Avon. You remember, you remember the house where he was born. Deaths on the point, by-the-by. There's a thousand to you, Mr. Clegg, and two hundred each for the young ladies. Very fair will, I think—very fair indeed."

All this time the dumfounderment Clegg had held the documents unopened in his hand, gazing at Richard Adamson with a constantly-lengthening countenance. At length he asked, "This is a testamentary legatee?"

"I am," said Richard, precisely in the same position from the first, and just before used. "Odd, isn't it? Merely a matter of convenience, though. Distribution of property is the utmost feasible object of a residuary legatee required. Must have a residuary legatee, you know," said I to the old gentleman. 'Never heard of it,' says he. 'Dear, dear, how can you go on worrying me about such things, Sir,' says I, 'I'm still in the prime of life myself, I'm only forty.' 'There's your brother,' said I, 'won't do.' 'No, he won't,' says he. 'Then I'm a legatee. 'He's been no brother to me. I forgive him, and leave him thirty thousand pounds;' but that will be the end of it. I've no wife, and him named in any other capacity than an ordinary legatee." Is there not another child, Sir?' I asked. 'No, Sir, no,' tears out C. W. again. 'I tell you they're some of 'em say relations of mine. I say I leave the world at enmity with no one but God 'em; but they shan't be put down in the will except for a stated sum. Not the residuary legatee. Not any thing more to get; but I've made my mind up it shall be as I have said.' 'Your housekeeper,' then, said I. 'She seems to have been a faithful servant and friend, to judge from your bequeathing her fifteen hundred pounds.' 'No, no, no,' answers again, more gently this time, and more resolutely too, if possible. 'Poor old soul! poor old soul! She'll have well enough, with her couple of fifteen hundred pounds means; but she'll go farying all sorts of things if she's made a residuary legatee. No, no, no. Oh dear! oh dear! I wish there was no such thing as money to leave, or relations to have to among. Oh dear! oh dear!' Oh dear! Was you ever a residuary legatee, Sir?' he asked, turning to me suddenly, as if a new idea had struck him. 'Not that I am aware of, Sir,' I answered. 'Well, Sir, should you have any very particular objection to be a residuary legatee?'

None in the world, Sir,' said I, 'if it will oblige you.' 'Well, then,' said he, 'I will. I will put in your name as residuary legatee at once, and witness the will in the regular way, along with the servant here.' 'Thank you, Sir,' said I, 'that won't do. If you are good enough to insist upon making me residuary legatee, you must allow me to ring the bell for another witness.' Then, confound it, Sir, ring the bell, he cries; let the cook and the housemaid come, for we have my draught, and get a little rest.' So the thing was done, Mr. Clegg. You and Mr. Tarrock, of Mark Lane and Weybridge, Surrey, are executors; and that's the whole story. You have will to look over, and so on, I believe. A million pardons, Miss Herbert, for keeping you standing; all this time, to hear a lot of poor business. We are sorry we inconvenienced in the slightest degree. Now then, Jack, old fellow, bring your sister along at once—no ceremony. Mr. Ha, ha! Good-night—I mean, morning. Have me put down in the list of fashionable arrivals. Just send a paragraph to the Post. An hour, recollect, a whole hour; and I promise for Mr. Herbert, as well as myself, that we shall be at our posts when the office clock strikes ten. Don't come out in the cold, pray. I'll be left still waving my hat. The wind's gone down; but you'll get damp feet. All right, we can manage. Thank you, thank you. Good morning."

With these words Dick Adamson took leave of Mr. Clegg, who seemed on the point of choking with rage, and, I need not say, had no idea of coming outside his door, as the young man had boldly implied.

Richard's manner was changed as soon as we were all three comfortably squeezed once more in the four-wheeled sedan-chair, which he had kept waiting while he informed Mr. Clegg of these things. He said that he felt a great deal more at his ease, propped up in his bed, was something gracious. "I verily believe," added he, "that the wretched old fool had some perception of my commiserating him, and that he affected a simplicity in the matter of disposing a residuary legatee merely with the purpose of giving me a chance to the extent of an odd fifty-pounds and so on."

Richard was going further than we were, and he let us down at the door of our lodgings. From that night he was a frequent visitor there.

Old Charley Waters lived many months, but he would not allow his will, though I suppose Mr. Clegg did all he decently could to induce that set. It seemed probable to Richard's lawyer and me, one time, and that some kind of sympathy was hidden under the old man's ridiculous crotchet. I can easily believe that several persons connected with Charley Waters was quite sufficient to detect the kindness of the young man's nature, and that he was merely disguised a generous intention, catching at the means offered him by the want of a nominal residuary legatee.

Old Charley Waters died, and was buried. Two days after the funeral, a letter arrived at the office of Pulson, Clegg, and Pulson, from a lawyer at Bolton.

The letter notified the death of Hugh Waters, Esq., which had occurred at exactly one week's earlier date than that of the departure of poor old Charley. But this was not all. Hugh, the eldest, had died intestate and childless; and the estate of the only brother, Charles, was considerably enriched by the event. An aggregate fortune of more than forty thousand pounds thus dropped at the feet of Richard Adamson.

Clegg imparted the news privately to Richard, and congratulated him in a rather clumsy manner. Immediately on leaving Clegg's room Richard called me aside, led me into an inner office, and told me, first, that he loved my sister Rose. Having gained from me a ready promise to stand his friend, he next told me, what he had just learnt from Clegg, that he was, he believed, a rich man; though there was many a slip 'twixt cup and lip, and we might find there had been a mistake in the day of Hugh Waters's death. If he had died after instead of before his brother Charles, at once the thirty thousand would be added to the estate of Hugh, and would revert to the next of kin, whoever they might be. We were about to mention the matter to Rose until absolute certainty had been attained, but Richard could not refrain. He would be speak to her on the subject of his higher and better hopes.

The time soon came when Richard's good fortune as residuary legatee of the late Charles Waters, Esq., of Bolton, became a fact. Clegg, as I walked together, that evening, from Clegg's office to the house in Gower Street, where we dined, and as soon as we three were seated at the tea-table Richard calmly broke to her the tidings which had just been communicated to himself—and that for her and for him; but I could see the end of it directly the words reached mine. I remember well that face, which in another instant had become as pale as death, to the fixed gaze and trembling lip of my fostered brother, that his dear sister's cup of joy had but begun.

There was a jingling, asthmatic old piano in our little parlor, and we ordinarily had music, when Richard came to see us. On this evening Rose requested none particular from me, but sat down to it to play, and she altogether declined to sing, under the flimsy pretext of a cold. No, no, nothing of the sing either. He said, honestly, that he had a great deal too much on his mind. I was ought to be very festively in love of Richard's good fortune, and I went out to provide materials for a banquet.

When I came back I found Rose playing still. I had not hurried myself in collecting, a glance told me that the cricket I had been sent to buy was alive and that there were no my sister's face when I kissed it. Without quitting my sustenance, she held her hand out to me, and said, "Thank you, dear Adamson."

I pass over the details of a happy evening, which in the hands of the silent chronicler would make but a dull page. Having passed over those details, I have only to add that, on the 1st of May, 1848, the several estates of Hugh and Charles Waters, deceased, were administered by, and Richard Adamson took Rose Herbert to be his wedded wife.

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

WHEAT.

THE origin of this useful plant, whose grain is the "Staff of life," and favorite food of nations, is wrapped in obscurity and uncertainty.

The hard wheats are produced in warm climates, and chiefly in Southern Europe. The soft wheats originated in the northern parts of Europe. The cuticle or skin of the soft varieties is thick, and if not well cured will be easily grouted.

The kinds cultivated are very numerous; some being adapted to one locality, while others succeed better unprotected by snow:

When winter destroys autumn the field with cold The falsey rest can take no steady hold.

It is equally true that a young plant can not long survive in a soil saturated with water. Wheat will not in any habitation, no more than can a seed sown in the tin-house waters. The Mediterranean is cultivated by wheat-growers in the middle and southern parts of Illinois, where crops of winter wheat, during the spring months, are often "winter killed" by frequent changes of temperature.

Handsome, plump, and well-colored grain can be grown to perfection only on soils in exact balance for the requirements of the crop.

Chemical analyses, facts and observations by growers have shown that the composition of wheat is caused to vary by difference of soil and application of special fertilizers.

The proper selection of seed is indispensable to success. Avoid the seeds of weeds, chess, and light grain. Whatever the variety may be select from the best formed kinds, having a large, plump number of grains. It is a curious and useful fact that the constitutional peculiarities of a wheat plant, such as vigor, tenacity, and the peculiarities of soil, transmitted to its offspring.

The "change of seed should receive full attention; this fact is of great value to the wheat-grower, whether his soil be a loam, clay, gravel, or a part of the vast prairies. The difficult wheat-grower looks well to a change of seed, and to the getting of the best kinds. It is a misnomer from that on which it is to be sown. What grown on soil not in balance loses constitutional vigor, and is not adapted to a soil of another kind from that which produced it, although it may be no better as regards fertility; for it may not meet with elements of food in other relative proportions from those of its own soil, giving it power over to assimilate them, and thus be conducive to the production of a large crop.

Stems of wheat-plants are useful, when of the right kind and properly applied, in preventing the attacks of insects in the soil, and in giving food ready to be used by the plant during the earlier stages of its growth, increasing its vigor, and consequent ability to withstand the severity of winter. We have not space to detail the comparative advantages of steeps, but they should be of a concentrated kind, abounding in elements ready to be used by the young plant.

Meteorological influences have much to do with the production of the cereals, both as regards the structure of the grain, its chemical composition, and consequent quality of the flour. The hygrometric condition of the atmosphere has much to do with the percentage of water in the grain.

In the moist climate of Ireland wheat will contain more water than that grown in the clear and drier atmosphere of America. In England wheat can not be grown 1000 feet above the level of the sea, but in France it may be at an elevation of 2500 feet, by reason of the meteorological differences in the two countries.

The seed-wheat from foreign nations being distributed by the Patent Office is causing much interest in relation to varieties, and the best manner of adapting to influences of soil and climate on the quality of the grain, and the results of experiments with grain attempted, will undoubtedly be most beneficially be inclosed to communicate them to the public by pamphlet—several to meet with the agricultural bodies, and Boards of Agriculture who are interesting themselves to get new varieties of most value to American growers. We have already told us what is the success of the wheat from Mount Olympus? And what is the success of the Lawler-wheat? Of the seven-headed wheat of Tuscany? Of the blackchaff wheat? Of the Red Lammas? Of the Russian wheat? and a host of others.

Nearly the whole crop of 150,000,000 of bushels annually, in the United States, where it is subject to such differences of climate and soil, is of sufficiently good quality to make a fair article of best seed (and what success can be hoped without such seed) now to improve the soil, and to be ready or to be found in our own vast territories or far away where other people live.

Soils for wheat require full quantities of inorganic matter in an advanced condition. Many of the Western States are reticulated with vast prairies, and their wild crops, which have been decaying for centuries, are now in a state to which they have brought large quantities of carbon from the atmosphere by the solidification of carbonic acid, they have a notable quantity of the alkalies, and of nitrogenbases, and, therefore, the surface in many localities is not used for growing wheat exclusively, but full supply of inorganic food. In some places where wheat will not flourish and corn will, the difference between the soils is not in the quantity existing more deeply than those of wheat.

Stone pavements are what almost as well as if there was a house above it.

In soils not well plowed, the young, under roots strike east and west, and are easily protected by more are nipped by the biting frost. Freezings and thawings cause the soil to expand and contract, thus tearing the fine rootlets apart. They are under-laided.

It is said that in 1859 Chicago will export less wheat and flour than in 1858. This will probably be the case. Farmers are discouraged from the high prices of transit because of the scarcity of money during the panic. Prices have now fallen to the Eastern markets, and a large a portion of the result has been held for its transit, and so much is there on the way.

During the Crimean war prices were high, and attracted attention to the growing of wheat. The result has been enormous, has been a reaction, and present low prices are likely to deter many growers.

The wheat crops of New York, Ohio, etc., are reduced from time, and in many cases from exhaustion, to an average of less than twelve. There are many causes of this depletion. Among the most important are the following: Sowing wheat, subject to late cities, wastage of blood in the rivers, loss of horses, cattle and sheep, and many on the line winter to be floated off in spring. Even the Genesee and Mohawk valleys are much impoverished. The result of this is that large grain-growers, on sterile soils—say New Hampshire—several thousand acres annually to buy fifty bushels a cart for stable manure. What a vast difference between now and the time when the studies were reserved landowners in the manure to be used, is easy easier to remove the former than the large accumulations of the latter! The whole of Alaska slope is being depleted, and is renovated in spots only by the offal arising from the consumption of food by the dense populations of the cities. Western wheat can now not be renovated, and "prevention is better than cure."

The wheat crop has rapidly fallen off in Ohio. There was an average to the acre of 17 bushels in 1850, 17 in 1855, and scarcely 12 in 1858.

The States given below yielded as follows:

States.	No. of Bushels in 1850.	No. of Bushels in 1858.
Connecticut	87,000	81,000
Massachusetts	1,000	1,000
Rhode Island	12,000	12,000
New Hampshire	420,194	165,000
Maine	948,582	948,582
Vermont	400,000	535,000
Total	2,014,776	1,742,582
Tennessee	4,669,092	1,619,386
Kentucky	4,840,152	1,745,022
Virginia	5,211,000	2,000,000
Alabama	838,032	224,544
Total	15,561,276	5,144,152

In the six New England States we find in ten years a decrease of one million of bushels, and this, too, notwithstanding that their population has rapidly increased. In Virginia, Kentucky, Georgia, and Alabama there was upward of six millions of bushels of wheat more in 1850 than in 1858, many increasing the plowing of the soil a little deeper would increase the crop one-fourth; but the treasures of the subsoil are, in these localities, all undistressed as they were ages before Columbus was born.

The three principal meat-producing animals pouring in from the Great West to our large cities, carry with them, in their bones, vast quantities of phosphate of lime, and other valuable elements, which are, in most instances, lost to the soil which fed those animals. Grain is carried to the cities, and the substances that made it are far away from their original source. The wheat crop of 1858 robbed the soil of more than thirty millions of pounds of potash, and sixty millions of pounds of phosphoric acid. But a small proportion of these elements are sent back to the soil. In Nature's economy nothing is lost; but when man displaces things he should put them back again in their own places. A wise nation looks well to its agriculture, the great source of wealth. England dug the field of Waterloo for human bones to enrich her soil. She sent her ships to foreign nations to bring home fertilizers. In our agriculture we are a wasteful and soil-exhausting people. We are tenants of the soil for life; others will come after us.

There is a great deal of spring wheat sown in Illinois, and other parts of the West. In favorable seasons spring wheat does well, but when it has not time enough to grow. This was especially the case of that sown last year, which was not wet, prevented the crop being sown early. Short crops has been the result. Rie is sometimes a good plan to sow on soils that are liable to exposure to frost the seed early in spring on full-plowed land, when the soil is thawed sometimes during winter ing, but not so much as to let ecen or horses sink deeply into it. This hastens spring work greatly, and enables one to sow land which is not dry in the spring, might not be seeded in time. It is very desirable to sow winter wheat early, else it will not have time to grow.

All through the rich prairies of the West there is a great abundance of organic matter conducive to the growth of rank straw; thus causing great expense in the cutting, gathering and housing of the crop. Wheat is grown year after year on the same ground. This is a mistake, with the hope of getting a finer sample of grain. The soil is not in balance; there is an excess of straw-making food. This is the kind of food which Ireland grows to grow luxuriantly!

The failure or success of winter wheat greatly depends on the fall of genial rain at the time of putting in the crop, the presence or absence of warm or cold weather, and the severity or severity of the winter. It is almost impossible to plow in some heavy clay soils in the autumn when it is made mellow by a sprightly dash of rain; but too much rain, when the ground should be seeded, renders the plowing difficult at all; the grain will not have time to take strong hold in the soil, and thus defy the severe freezings and thaws of winter. This is a reason why the crop is "winter killed." Another is the very shallow plowing practiced in many wheat-growing districts, on soils that might with the greatest advantage be plowed deeply. Some farmers plow in the seed with a shallow furrow, the land, perhaps, having given wheat for many successive years—a bad way to do—and sometimes no fallow, no manure, no clever crop plowed in. These facts are true of clays and clayey loams all over the country. On such soils the best plowing is of a clever crop is equal to deep plowing, because as long roots—the best—penetrate deeply they lead them to bring up food; and when the stems and leaves are plowed down, and the roots are turned in, the elements of food are left near the top soil in the surface soil. The farmer does this when he plows deep. The elements of food in the lower crop are in an advanced condition, having served a purpose in organic nature, and are ready to be assimilated by the young plant. The mechanical manner not taken by the clover from the air is put into the soil, making it more fertile, thereby than increasing its capacity to absorb solar heat, and improving its mechanical condition. The decaying roots help to enrich the soil, the composition of clover and wheat, and the reasons given, show why it is that the latter, grown after the first, and the latter, causes, under favorable circumstances, a remarkable large crop of grain. Every farmer knows a good, heavily-timbered lands, where roots of trees in the surface soil prevent plowing, crops of good wheat are grown, and in the spring-time "a rich sample." The ground is prepared and the seed covered by a common "harrow" or "drag." These soils often yield forty bushels of wheat per acre. Bear in mind the value of the ashes of the timber burned when it was felled.

That crops of wheat are so grown is no argument against deep plowing in some places, and high farming in others; against dibbling, drilling, and ridging for wheat is no argument against the seed-drill for many districts throughout this vast country, while it would be impossible to use it in others; and against special fertilizers in special cases.

ON A TEAR

Which a spotless observed upon my nose on Christmas Day at bed-time.

What though a silent tear may fall
Adorn this cheated nose,
Deem not that I cast spirit small,
Or weep for mortal woes.

A future sadness bids me mourn,
And sense of anguish dire,
As when one little one's favorite corn
Demands some fell cure.

Think not in what has caused my grief
That thou hast wet my fact!
Would not suffer that belief
To wound thy loving heart.

Think not a toe tight boot my woes
So cramps I fain would cry!
It is not this that gone my nose,
And dims my glowering eye.

A lovelier cause, 'tis sweet you hear
O'erwhelms my aching breast;
I've eaten too much pudding, dear!
And fear I will spoil my hose!

HON. JOHN COCHRANE, OF NEW YORK.

HON. JOHN COCHRANE, the subject of this week's illustration, has for some years ranked among the public men whose sayings and doings find a ludicrous upon the popular records of daily events. Perhaps this notoriety may exert an unfavorable influence upon the character of its subjects; but the taste of the public has become too confirmed to admit of change, and what was once but the publisher's recourse for an interesting and attractive paragraph has now grown to be a usage so long and firmly established that an attempt at its discontinuance would be in vain. So they who would indulge in the sweets of public life must fain be content to submit themselves, with what of equanimity they can summon, to the inevitable ordeal of the public press. Mr. Cochrane seems, thus far, to have withstood its dangerous influences with a good degree of composure, and with no accession of personal conceit. His friends, we think, may therefore fairly infer on a reasonable probability of his safe escape from its damaging effects. A brief biographical sketch, it is thought, will not be inappropriate to the present occasion.

Mr. Cochrane, though ranking with the more youthful aspirants for political honors, has probably passed into the shade of the forties. He is a native of Montgomery County, in the State of New York. His father, Walter L. Cochrane, was the son of Doctor John Cochrane, Surgeon-General and Director-in-Chief of the Hospitals of the Northern Department of the Army of the Revolution. Doctor Cochrane intermarried with Gertrude, the only sister of Major-General Philip Schuyler, of distinguished Revolutionary memory. His grandson has, therefore, imposed upon him the honorable obligations of a patriotic ancestry, and should he impelled by the incentive of duty to service and sacrifices for their country to a generous emulation of their illustrious example. The extraction of Mr. Cochrane's remote paternal ancestry is derivable from the Scotch Cochranes, who, during the latter part of the sixteenth century, emigrated from Paisley, in Scotland, to the North of Ireland. Remaining there for a number of years, a portion of them proceeded thence to America, and settled at Cochranesville, in Pennsylvania, where many of their descendants still reside. Doctor John Cochrane, to whom allusion has above been made, left the paternal roof without the parental permission, and, prosecuting the profession of his choice, served as a surgeon, with credit, during the first French war, and subsequently, at the opening of the Revolution, devoted his fortune and his unremitted efforts to the cause of his country. Thus, it will be seen, Mr. Cochrane traces his descent from a Scotch, through Scoto-Irish origin, down through various intermarriages of his immediate progenitors, in America, with the good old stock of the Netherlands Dutch. At the early age of eighteen he received his graduating diploma from Hamilton College, in the western part of the State of New York. He had previously, however, spent a portion of his collegiate career at Union College, in Schenectady, under the general care and tuition of the venerable Doctor Nott. He studied the profession of law at Oswego, in this State; was admitted to its practice at the age of twenty-one; and from that to the time when he was called more prominently into political life, prosecuted his profession, with energy and success, at Oswego, Schenectady, and in the city of New York. During this period, however, the life of the lawyer was occasionally varied with the pursuits of the politician. At local meetings, and in county and State conventions, his voice was frequently and intensively heard in support of the principles he had espoused.

At length, in the midst of a lucrative law-business in this city, and when possessed of an enviable reputation, both as a sound lawyer and able advocate, was he withdrawn from his profession by the unsolicited and unexpected proffer of President Pierce, in the year 1853, of the office of Surveyor of the Port of New York. From that time Mr. Cochrane's attention has been more exclusively directed to public life. While the incumbent of the office tendered to him, it is supposed that the burden of the political dispensation of the Customhouse was incurred and supported by him. From that position he was transferred by the popular voice to a seat in the present Congress of the United States as the representative of the Sixth Congressional District of the State of New York. One session of his term has already expired, and the earnest afforded by his conduct, thus far, is such as to warrant his fellow-citizens in the belief that he will reflect honor upon those who conferred on him the important trust. Perhaps it is not expected that this sketch shall be otherwise terminated than with a summary of Mr. Cochrane's public characteristics and qualities. He brought with him into public life those rare gifts of nature, the copious diction, the graceful action, and the spirit of the orator. While his mind is imbued with a graceful refinement—the offspring of early familiarity with the classics—its philosophical tendencies subject its action duly to the discipline of logic. The properties of his voice are unusual and remarkable. Its sonorous volume and harmonious cadence recommend most pleasantly to the sense of the hearer what the speaker desires to be impressed upon the judgment. His forensic abilities conferred on him a deserved reputation, both as a reasoner and as an advocate. Occasional efforts of his are still remembered by the city bar as appertaining to the higher grades of eloquence, and equal to the best standard of oratorical achievement. The language which flows easily from his lips, while conferring upon him the power of presenting a subject in all its various aspects, enables him to adapt it, with equal facility, to the fluctuating moods of a popular audience. Hence Mr. Cochrane's excellence as an extemporaneous speaker, and hence, too, his force before a promiscuous audience. He has not yet been thoroughly tried in Senatorial effort. In the few rare instances in which he has tought the ear of the House he is described as having been eminently successful; but as yet he seems not to have attempted any elitinct trial of his powers in the production of a deliberately and finally-ordered set speech. He seems wisely to have remitted himself to the careful preparation of the business intrusted to the important Committee of which he is the chairman—the Committee on Commerce. When accepted by the House as reliable authority upon commercial subjects, Mr. Cochrane seems to think that then will his words and opinions be listened to with the most favor, and be invested with the greatest efficiency; and then, too, will be the time when he will probably produce prepared and finished speeches.

HON. JOHN COCHRANE, MEMBER OF CONGRESS.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

Mr. Cochrane may be justly considered as a man whose past gives assurance of something good in his future.

A STORY OF OUR FAMILY.

TOLD BY MASTER RALPH FISHER'S OWN MAN. TWENTY-TWO YEARS AND SEVEN MONTHS IN THIS COUNTRY.

My name is Willis, James Willis. I came from the town of Chatham, in the County of Kent, Great Britain. When I came from the old country I brought forty pound, which I placed in the Savings' Bank, where, with interest, it still remains to hand, with a trifle of other money which I have added since. This was twenty-two years and seven months ago. I did not like America at first, but I am getting gradually used to the ways, and except as it was his son's, that I should be specially Master Ralph's own man, as thereby there would be one that would watch faithfully over him, and see, as far as in me went, that no harm come to the young master.

When Master Ralph was eighteen it came into his head that he would like to travel; and accordingly we travelled. There was no hesitation in trusting the young gentleman in my hands, and I am sure I felt the responsibility. My vigilance was unceasing, and Master Ralph's wildness excessive. I am sorry to say, in recalling the circumstances of those days, that we frequently clashed, and that Master Ralph would always have his way. We visited the principal cities of this country; we hunted (meaning Master Ralph) on the Western prairies; we fished on the Northern lakes and the Atlantic coast, and, all such things considered, enjoyed ourselves. And then, after over a year's absence, we came back to New York, and prepared for our European tour. As a token of his approbation of my conduct generally, by, Mr. Ralph Fisher, Sen., presented me with an outfit and one hundred dollars in money.

We went to Europe. Master Ralph carried good letters, and we soon found our way into most unimpeachable society. Master Ralph was handsome, and no lack of money or style. I can not, therefore, regret it as in the least degree strange if we soon found ourselves quite lionized—in fact, overrun. I had great difficulty in getting the young master away from London, in which I was more than commonly anxious, as I knew it was the special wish of his father that he should visit some old and particular correspondents of his, who had retired from business, and were living upon their estates in the country. Among these was one within ten miles of my native place, Chatham; and I knew that when Master Ralph came to that spot I should have leave of absence to visit my relatives, and my dear old mother, whom I had not seen for now over five years. All this may be thought selfish in me, but I could not help it; and as I had a trifle of presents for the old lady, I was anxious to relieve my mind and my trunk of that part of the matter.—Well, in good time we came to Chatham, after making one or two other short visits on the way; and I saw my old mother, who looked charmingly, and a whole kit of cousins, to say nothing of the reading of five years' batch of letters from brother Bob, who went to Cape o' Good Hope when I was but a lad, and was now, as he wrote, quite considerable of a farmer there, with seven children. And a pretty jolly time of it I had for a month, until I began to be thinking it was about time we were going again. Not that I was anxious to get away on my own account, but there was something singular in the contented manner Master Ralph seemed to stay about that stupid old-fogy and town. I was uneasy; for I felt sure that when Master Ralph staid too long in one place there was some trouble brewing. He did not seem to spend much time at the spot where he first visited in the neighborhood. In fact only he had withdrawn altogether, and staid in the town of Chatham at Wright's Tavern, or, as you Americans would say, a Hotel. I had up to this passed but little of my time with Master Ralph since my arrival at home—a circumstance for which I shall always blame myself, as, perhaps, had I been more attentive the unhappy affair might not have occurred: but I will not anticipate. I had several times noticed Master Ralph walking and riding with a quite pretty genteel girl. To speak the truth without prejudice, she was more than pretty; but it always struck me when I saw her that there was a knowing look about her which some would call cunning. At first I thought the young fool was the squire's daughter where Master Ralph was visiting; but when he came to stay at Chatham I felt sure I was right with him, I found she was the daughter of the landlord of the tavern, and her name was Brewa; and then I knew that Master Ralph had no business with her, and I felt it my stern duty, regardless of results, to break off this acquaintance.

Such a step is never easy to accomplish. It is now over twenty year since I entered the service of Master Ralph, yet even at the time I was with his father, and this is the only instance in which he ever threatened me with violence. Then, he threatened to kick me if I refused. I cared for a broken head when I felt that I was doing my duty. I did not strike, but told him my opinion, and then, finding I could have no effect, I gracefully folded my robe about me and retired from the contest. And the thing went on day after day, but there was more in it than I could see, for Master Ralph was taking to ways that were not his custom; he would walk up and down his room for hours together, and drink by himself. This was entirely new. And sometimes, when I would come into his room in the morning at the time he usually rose, I would find him sitting by the table leaning his head on his hands, and he would start, and speak excessively rough. Master Ralph never was a rough man, naturally. I remember one time when I so entered he looked up and asked me, "What the devil do you want?" I simply told him the hour, when he apologized, saying that he was not aware of the time. I never harbored any ill feeling, for I knew the cause very well in the slightest degree inquisitive; but all this stared me in the face, and I would have given my right hand to have got him out of Chatham, which was simply hoping against hope, for he would not leave Chatham. Then, day to day, and hour to hour, we took, we staid at Chatham, and I am obliged to confess that I was getting very happy, when I was so beastie in showing it to Master Ralph. A very unpleasant circumstance happened in connection with this my folly, to which I do not hesitate to tell, as it was the only time in all those twenty years that Master Ralph ever hinted at my position. One day that I had by unmistakable actions shown my master that I was not pleased, he came to me.

"James," he called me James in those days, of late years he calls me Willis—"James," said he, "you don't seem well; is there anything the matter with you?"

"The sir, Sir," says I, "doesn't agree with me."

"Ah" he answered, raising his eyes out of the copy-book which he was at—"I suppose so." I thought you had settled your constitution on the air of this town."

I said to him that the air of that town was particularly offensive to me just at that time, and I was obliged to confess my anxiety to escape it.

He was very quiet on the subject; I thought he couldn't be: he only said,

"In that case you can leave it as soon as possible; you are entirely your own master from this moment." And with that he bows me to the counter, drawing out his pocket-book.

Why, the fact was he was discharging me. Me! the best friend he had in the world. At first I was naturally indignant, but the tears went up in my eyes, and I swore by right and justice to him that I declined to accept. And from that time nothing more was said on the subject, until the time when I shall give you a remembrance above all other days, and which I think has blighted our life and made us grow old years before our time.

It was getting to be late in the fall, when one morning, as I came in with Master Ralph's breakfast, he said to me,

"James,"

"Sir," says I.

"You will make ready for our departure this evening."

It was a mercy that I had the breakfast-waiter on the table: had I held it, I certainly should have dropped it. I was so delighted. I never packed his trunks more joyfully—a duty which he left entirely to myself, leaving by most of the time of my having vacantly on, without offering either orders or assistance, which was much against his general way. The trunks were packed and all ready. I had laidna my old mother "Good-by," with very little hope of ever seeing her again this side of the grave, which fact was realized exactly four years and two months after by her death, for which I have no remorse, being, as far as my humble savings could go, smoothed her downward path—which is another time, and no unpleasant portion of my story. But, as I was saying, we were all ready, and away we went in a post-chaise—mile and mile on mile we sat moving on, and not a word did we put out over they were. I had a feeling of exhilaration that I could scarcely account for at the moment, feeling away in the dusk of the evening, and was just composing myself for a nap in the rumble, when what should I hear but a shout which brought all to all sleep out me in an instant. I thought with in a second that I had been dreaming, or mistaken in this, but I was soon undeceived. The shout came very distinct out of a bit of wood that lay along the roadside, and said "Sir Fisher!" and the carriage stopped as by magic, and Master Ralph putting his head out of the window said, in rather a surprised voice, "All right." And with this I saw a small lane or side road leading away from the highway, and down this lane I could see a gig. I did not belong to think on all this, for in less than a minute up came two persons, and a gentleman got into the gig. Without a word spoken the lady was put into our chaise, Mr. Ralph squeezed the hand of the old gentleman—you have heard me say that I did not say we bowled again at the rate of twelve mile an hour at least. Master was as silent as myself all my life. No more naps for me that night. All hours through I sat out on that rumble, and heard no voice save the chaise; and it did not take me long to conclude who the lady was, though I could not hear her face, and I knew right well who the gist into the chaise. It was Miss Brown, the fisherman's daughter, and every word she spoke went to my heart like a bullet. I was in a most long thinking what I had best do, and when the morning dawned and we were riding through London, I was just as undecided as ever. Within half an hour after our arrival at Mivart's, where my master took rooms while in London, I answered his bell. As I came into the room Miss Brown sat there, looking as pretty as a picture, and Master Ralph said:

"James, this is your mistress." I bowed very stiffly, and he spoke again as though correcting himself from the first introduction.

"I mean you are to Mrs. Fisher as little cause to find fault, and as much to like you, as you have always given her husband."

O Lord! O Lord! O Lord! how I got out of that room, and down stairs, to call for a pint of ale and drink it, I don't know.

It would be perfectly useless to enter upon the details of this matter: one thing was positive, that Master Ralph was married. He rang me up that evening, and then and there, with no doubt my lady listening in the next room, told me plainly that he had always the greatest confidence in me—and he hoped in that instance he should not be disappointed—that he had not communicated his marriage to his friends in New York, and should not do so, but the next morning at daylight we were to be off for Italy. And the next morning we were off for Italy, where we lived two years. In one thing this marriage was a wonderful change to Master Ralph; he no longer drank or gave way to any wildness. A more steady, upright man never was—I wish I could say the same for his wife. One thing was certain, she was very fond of society, and Master Ralph did not seem inclined to mortify her, or, rather, he did not deny her certain society. And society would be the ruination of my countrymen to the house, nor yet all his English friends. Mr. Ralph was very fond of society, but he did not rest much. And while Master Ralph would be sitting with all that occurred there, and longer, until I was startled entirely out of my propriety, and actually cringing with fear at every thing to tell him, but for an unforeseen circumstance. Master Ralph was summoned immediately to London on business, and left his wife with me to self know the purport. He only had two hours' consideration before he started, and he was then hurried to take care of my lady during his absence. And never since the day I was born did a more unpleasant duty fall to my lot. I felt like a fool, and scarcely been gone one week when I was summoned into my lady's room, and found that she knew that I knew it, and offered me money, which I spurned and told her so. I told her then and there that I was poor but honest, and though my education had been sadly neglected, yet my mother's teaching in my younger days gave confidence in raising me to the position which I now occupied, and that I would not atone that confidence once. Then I left the room, and came me with flushing eyes and reddened cheeks, and said, "I will not stay." Which were the first the ever addressed to me. And I did take care, for it is part of my theory that a bad woman will be my thing, but a good woman, poor husband, or a man; and is that country I knew how little a woman can be trusted, and how little she can turn his removal, and to look care.

It was on that very sunn evening I was lounging along a picturesque road, and I jumped Mrs. Fisher. She stood deathly pale, grasping the arm of the window sill, and looking out upon the sea where lay the dead man. One look only she gave; that, I suppose, satisfied her that he was dead, and without the least leaving me, and the poor woman put her knees before him. I am obliged to tell the truth, however unfavorable it may be to my character. I must therefore say, that when Mrs. Fisher dropped on her knees before Master Ralph, he thrust his foot, which was not of the smallest, far beyond her, and she fell fainting on the floor. I am not altogether sure whether it was right or wrong. Somebody, however, picked her up and put her back in the cabriolet, and it drove away. My impression very great, and I thought for few days, reading in the Paris newspapers the account of one of the most mysterious murders that had not been able to get hold of my master's name; but making a finish of the account by asserting that the murderer had been frightened, and turned had thrown herself the same evening into the Seine, from which spot he had been taken, secured, and was then lying in the Morgue for a claiming out. Master Ralph did not believe the last part of the story. I did. I could not. I thought he went as agent to Paris to examine into its truth or falsehood, as was his usual custom, and for a few days and we had confirmation of its truth. Our agent identified the body of Mrs. Fisher, and a coroner's inquest, very investigated, found that the spot where the remains were laid at Père la Chaise.

From this time a decided change came over Master Ralph. He went no longer into society; completely retired from the world, and seemed to the age growing on him every day. Soon we went home, back again to the old house at Chatham, and Master Ralph's life first passed into his father's room I saw signs of feeling I had not seen for many years. He was very much affected at the death of the old gentleman sat so many years, and burst into a sobbing cry. I was glad to see it, as I thought it would do him good. He did not seem to mind my presence, as I cried a little myself. I suppose it was on the principle that "misery likes companionship." From that time forth Master Ralph always called me Willis, and I fancied that from the day of the same home he seemed to cheer up and be more lively, though always after he was a sad man. And many a time, when a smile would spread over his face and bring back that old pleasant look I remembered on him as a lad, he would, as it were, check himself, and the hard, wiry, grey look would come back and chill every thing again. Master Ralph was at this time only twenty-three years old—a mere boy, but yet he had the look and gravity of an old man. Curls and invitations came pouring in with us from all friends of our family, but we did not care to go out; an occasional dinner quietly with a friend, or a party of one or two at our own house, was all we got out of. And this way we lived on quietly for years. And in the year 1848 Master Ralph had finished making a name in the world, and his example induced me to do the same; and I am happy to say that, in a literary way, I have met with considerable success, though as yet I have not published. Excuse this digression.

Five years passed away, and Master Ralph was going out a little more, and my lady was getting to be coming more careful in his clothes, more like what he once was. And I heard rumors that he had been known before to—but what was the matter is now thing—and that he had been seen at the opera with a young lady with a peculiarly fine figure, and the street I had seen him myself with her; and I am sure she did great credit to his taste, for a more charming, angelic face, and quiet, subdued manner, I never saw. After this I had a letter appointment of judging, Master Ralph requesting me several times to her house with messages and letters. The last of which was the lady, having sent for me into the library where she was sitting alone as I came in, and in a very sweet, musical way, said, "Is Willis, I believe?" I bowed and replied, "Mr. Fisher has often spoken to me of you, Willis; and I am sure you will be glad to hear that I am not note?" Now there was very little in this, but—Well, there is no use in my defining the matter; every body understands it. My lady knew that she was a lady, and there was no rubbing it out. I took a deep interest in her from that moment, and found, upon inquiry, that her family and position were unimpeachable. Miss Marion Powell was an only daughter; her grandfather had been a merchant in the days when it was respectable to be a merchant. I will not dwell upon the next few years; he had no occasion, His time losing fully occupied in managing his estate. There can be no necessity for me to state the solitude in which they knew that Miss Marion Powell was to to Miss. Ralph Fisher ... common report, and at the time my Master Ralph said to me, as I had finished speaking him to dress—

"Willis, I am about to be married." He said it very gravely, and, as I thought at the time, perhaps it was a little sorrowfully. I answered him a little; but I looked him right in the face and smiled outright, saying,

"I am very glad to hear it, Sir. Let me congratulate you, and wish you all the happiness you deserve."

There was no allusion made to the past. This subject was not to be touched upon between us more since the day we came back home—no word or hint ever passing between us about it.

Then Master Ralph went out more at his ease, telling me that his wife was to be Miss Marion Powell, and that they were to be married on the 15th of the following month, which was May, and that they would make their wedding tour to Italy, and I was to be left to stay at the house principal tend the refitting of the house and have it ready for their return.

Over the wedding I will not dwell. The account can be found in the newspaper of the day, under the head of "Marriage in High Life." It was a splendid affair, reflecting great credit on the taste of Miss Marion's family. Some few days I had never seen Master Ralph so happy, and looking so like himself as when he bade me "Good-by," and I was left to stay at the house.

I took charge of the house, and saw that the workmen done their duty, and in about the next two months after their departure I received a letter from Master Ralph saying they would be back in the next steamer. The letter showed him a rose in summer; and to carry out the look, I ordered for the morning of their return a bouquet of the rarest flowers, which I put every where; for its interest that was to be the first meeting of the bride and bridegroom, wishing to look nice, that a prejudice might come to her mind the first thing. And it did. When she came in she looked at the decoration every where, and ran up stairs and down, asking for all the world like a child, evidently skimming through a well-kept garden, and making little exclamations of delight, and then she popped her head into the drawing-room door, saw me and shook my hand, and said to me, "How have you been?" to which I replied, "Very well and very happy:" and I was well and happy, never better in my life. And I got to love that charming lady with a true devotion, and I am happy to say my love for Master Ralph, for they both deserved it.

Now we had a gay time indeed—a terrible kind of parties, and a style about them, too, that showed the lady and gentleman. I must digress here for an explanation. I have a strong dislike to call any charming lady by her surname. Mrs. Ralph Fisher, for the reason that the same name I used to another who shall not be mentioned. I will therefore, use the name by which Master Ralph called her when in a merry mood, Madame Marion. And she was a charming one, and no more unaffected, child-like, loving creature, thinking her home the best place on earth. And how dearly they loved each other! Ah! well, this is beyond my telling. Soon the parties had to cease, and Madame Marion went no more abroad but in their evening walks, or her drives. It was whispered, in a very joyful way, that a new face would soon be among the family party, and we were all happy about it and hoped for a boy. Excuse the expression. And the time were gradually to close that the carriage stood ready in the stable night and day, and the horses were kept constantly on the horses to be ready at a moment's notice to bring the great doctor who was to attend Madame. At last it came; the alarm, I mean, and to the great credit of John, the coachman, be it spoken, only four minutes elapsed from the time he was called out of his sleep, for it was just about midnight, to the time when the carriage dashed away to bring Doctor M——. Master Ralph was with Madame, and I walked the lower hall to be ready at a moment to open the street door and admit the Doctor as soon as the wheels of the carriage should be heard. It was not long, but long the time seemed an age until I heard the carriage draw up at the door. My master heard it as quickly as myself, for he was coming down stairs, and as I threw open the door stood just behind me.

O God! shall I ever forget it? Ghastly, dirty, with sunken eyes and tangled hair, drabbled and torn, there stood, at the outer door of my house, Mrs. Ralph Fisher, the living woman, the dead wife. I shrieked—I could not help it—and staggered back into my master's arms. I cast one glance at him, and saw there in his face that stern, gray immobility that came upon him that day he shot the man at Versailles, and which now for years I had not seen. He said one word to me, in a whisper, and it wished me, as it were, from the dead. He said, "Silence!" and then I would have died before I would have uttered a word to make suspicion. But while all this was rushing through my mind the woman had rushed in the face forward into the entry; and my master had ordered the servants to take her and carry her up stairs into a bedroom, which was then occupied by an astonished look. He did not touch her himself; nor did I; for we were against the wall in the entry, and I was obliged to keep it there, that I might be able to stand upright; and as hard job I had of it, even at that. All this took but a few minutes, and the Doctor had gone up stairs, while a servant had run out for another physician for the woman. He came in a few minutes, and I went up to the room with Master Ralph. Master Ralph had gone into Madame's room. When I came into the apartment where lay the woman I thought at first she was dead; but on examination I found that it was not so. The doctor looked at her for a few moments with shaking his head, and I had seen the gave some stimulant, and went away, leaving some more. I was alone with the woman, telling the servants she had been in the room that I would watch by her for the night. They did not want the job, and willingly left me alone with her, when I think of it, I know how base it was! but the Lord will forgive me when he considers all! I was alone then, and I thought of a plan of my own mind how easy it would be to put my hand over that woman's mouth, as she lay there, and take the vital breath of that one who, but a few short years before, would have more than willingly have stopped mine. But, I thank God, I resisted the dreadful thought, and gave her the medicine promptly and faithfully, watching her every movement. In about an hour she opened her eyes, and, as I fancy, looked at me; and in a moment after she made some singular gritting noise with her teeth, and straightened out her limbs, and then I saw that she was in convulsions, and I believed dying; so I opened the door and called a servant, whom I took up for Miss Ralph; and in a moment my master came; and in less than five minutes from that time the woman was dead; and my master, kneeling at the foot of the bed, prayed aloud—something which I had never before known him to—but he prayed very fervently.

Within half an hour after this the little cry of an infant sounded from the room of Madame Marion; and it was a boy! I was glad to hear that I was glad to hear that I was directly up to my own room, and said a small prayer myself, in which I hope I was successful; and then I cried heartily, whether for joy or for sorrow I can not tell; but from that day I have had no occasion to cry any more.

The real reasons of Mrs. Ralph Fisher in the Greenwood, under a name without incurring the doctor giving the certificate of burial as a woman, "name unknown," who died from exhaustion, superinduced, as was believed, by cold. What this one was that was identified and buried from the Morgues, in making out the certificate of death, what had been her life since that day of the dual was known only, perhaps, to herself and God.

Mother and child are doing well. A fine boy is the young Master Ralph (to say nothing of his two younger sisters). I am learning him to ride. I often bear Madame speak of the night of his birth, and the singular circumstance, as she calls it, of the poor woman. She thinks it brought a blessing on the boy; that his father should have taken in the poor woman so, instead of sending her to the hospital. I think so, too.

ROBERT BURNS.

BY JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

A BURDEN rests! they're quickly fled,
With all their sad and sorry,
Their dead leaves steal upon the dead,
Their flesh nods over by sorrow;
And still the patient seasons bring
Their change of sun and shadow,
New birds still sing with every spring,
New violets spot the meadow.

A hundred years! and Nature's power,
So green and ever lessened!
They saw no flowers more sweet than ours,
No fairer nor sweeter crocus;
If this world treat us pests so,
Would so from winter free us,
And set our slow old sap slow
To sprout in fresh blue!

Alas! I think, what worth of parts
Have brought no love compelling
To speak what darts in mystical hearts
With Burns's memory healing;
A theme like this would Heaven choose,
Lonsfellow, Holmes, or Whittier:
If my poor muse can't fit their shoes,
Pray pardon her and pity her.

As I sat musing what to say
And how my verse to number,
Some elf in play passed by that way
And sank my fife in slumber;
And on my sleep a vision stole
Which I will put in metre,
Of Burns's soul at the wickedhole
Where sits the good St. Peter.

The saint, methought, had left his post
That day to Holy Willie,
Who swore, "Each gust that comes shall toast
In brimstone, will my bill."
There's once not hope with pleasure fan
Their cooler to wish good luck,
I'll chalk a sign, to save their tryin'—
A hand pint for you!"

Alas! no soil's too cold or dry
For spiritual small potatoes,
Stringed hearts will not be made to ply
Of diddell somehows.
Who by best lyre in the penance stood
Where Mercy sprouts a cushion,
They've just one cure for knave or fool—
It saves so much confession.

So, when Burns knocked, Will knit his brows,
His window-pane scoring,
And said, 'Or some tho other house,
We'll judge wi' Tam O'Shanter
Wreidge;' laughed Burns, 'now, well I see
Death not so still as Nature;
No human fen but thinks that he
May spoil his fun at pleasure.

"But Willie, friend, don't turn me forth,
Auld Cronies needs no gauger,
And if ye wish I'll tell you worth,
You've let a worse, I'se wager!"
"No, none but me," says Will,
But found me hard as wiuestane,
Threw's chanter and his pipes used to get
Wi' Auld Nick, gaugin' brimstane."

Meanwhile the "unco' guid" had ta'en
Its place in every parish,
Flattening in vain so many a pane
Their discontented faces,
Remember, please, 'tis all a dream,
One can't consider but through eyes
Through slop that stream with wayward gleam
Like midnight fireflies.

Old Willie's tone grew sharp's a knife,
"Impertinit, I insite ye
For quittin' me in my hot water o' life
And preferrin' spare nits."
Then roared a voice with lusty din,
Like a skipper's when 'tis blowy,
'If that's a fact, we're for ye in,
As sure as my name's Noah!"

Sly Willie turned another half—
"There's many a waur," he heard ye,
To the pan and grief o' true belief,
Say Lord bless me!' and prayer
Then rang a clear tone over all—
"Gae plan for some other ye,
I once heard call from o'er me, 'Sink,
Ye'll get no more frae me!'"

To the next charge vexed Willie turned
And, sighing, wiped his glasses—
"I'm much worried, sir, to see ye yourself
O'er warmly tow'rd the lasses!"
But David cried, "Your bidget shot,
Ye'll Aiken Drum!"
And hearts close shut with ill and bad,
If safe, are sure to sour.

When sudden glory round me broke
And ten revolving planets
Of wings whose strokes to splendor woke
Creation's farthest verges;
Across strained music's pulse, secure
From earth to heaven's own portal,
Thereby God's ear with thanks sure,
Climbed up to pause immortal;

I heard a voice within me say
(With my heart I seemed to hear it),
Fall out with no man, sin or pray,
Like grace of the heavenly spirit;
As sweet as now shall then be
The cross of new-made mother,
The voice began: "Sore-tempted one!"
Then, passing further, "my brother?"

If but a sparrow falls, unless
The Father sees and says yes,
Think! rocks be his his his form express?
The wind may not breathe
If only dear to him the strong
Think never trip nor weaken,
Then were the Power whose morning song
Thrills his blue arches yonder

Do reckon pow'r-steeped, young-hinged,
To his true service render,
And they who will not look to lead,
Find they his heart untender?
Through all your various ranks and fates
Of life's long journey,
And be that waits there at your gates
Was servant of the Master.

The earth must richer sap secrete
In God, could you but know it!),
Most joies concrete with fiercer heat
Ere she can make her poet;
These large hearts must feel the rolls
Of eternity wave tempestuous,
Where sea and sky resound one voice
Bear scenes of tragic passion.

Her change from sea to land she gives
She raises under glasses,
But scans into Heaven's heritages,
Spring sketcheries as grasses,
He loved much! that is Gospel good,
Heaven will pay in proportion.
From common wood the cross was hewed,
By it we have salvation sanctified.

If scant his service at the kirk,
He pores humbly, and sees
From chairs that lark in hedge and birk—
From thankful text from meets;
The covering moves, poor wounded thing!
In him found Mercy's angel;
The daisy's flag, humbly upright pretty,
To him Faith's fresh evangel!

Not he the threatening text who deals
In highest 'mong the preachers,
But he who feels the woes and weals
Of all God's wandering creatures:
He doth good work when heart can find
The spirit 'neath the letter;
He makes the kind of happier mind,
Leaves wiser men and better.

They make Religion be abhorred
Who round with darkness gird her,
And think no word can please the Lord
Unless it smell of sulphur;
Dear Poet-heart, that children guessed
The Father's loving-kindness,
Come now to rest thou didst he best,
If haply 'twas in blindness!"

Then leapt heaven's portals wide apart,
And, at their glorious slander,
With sudden start I woke, my heart
Still trembling with its wonder.
"Father," I said, "tis known to thee
How thou hast saints pursued,
But this I see—Saint Charity
Is still the first of virtues!"

Dear Bard and Brother! let who may
Against thy faults be railing!
(Though Sir, I, Poet, am afraid to say Thou never knew a failing!)
One boast I give, and dare not long,
Which thou wouldst pledge if present:
To him whose heart is free from wrong,
Makes man of prince and peasant!

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

"Dun I hurt you?" said a lady the other day, when she trod on a gentleman's toe.

"No, madam, I thank you, seeing it is you. If it were any body else, I would have hollered out lustily."

A gentleman was threatening to beat a dog, which barked indefinitely.

"Why," exclaimed an Irishman, "would you beat the dumb brute for telling the truth?"

It was a bright thought that of Smithson, when he was dying of an unknown complaint. Smithson had but five fortune, and left it to found a hospital somewhere that his disease might be brought to a speedy and patient end.

Calling them "dumb brutes" is polite to most animals, but not to a mule. A mule is not dumb.

"My friends," said Mr. Mule, in a public speech, "imitation, and find out what ails me, for really I have heard such braying in the assemblies on the subject, that I am dying to know what the disease is myself."

"Wasn't that a waste of powder?" said an Irishman to a Kentuckian, after the latter had fired a coin to the ground, with his rifle, from a large tree.

"Why no, Pat," was the reply; "not a bit."

"Sure, the ball would have still time."

It is said that the "army" boldly supports independence. A Philadelphia old "brick," lying, a day or two since, in the gutter in a very pitiful condition, was relieved, in a friendly way, to economize, as "flour was going up."

"Let it alone, Bill," said a friend; "it's a fat gift as high' as flour kin, any day."

Mike and Pat were moving. Pat was seized one morning with a violent fit of the cramp. Mike ran, and was immediately seized with a fit of the cramp. "Why, Mike, are you taken, too?" "Faith, and I am, honey; it's harm's way. While Pat was whisking himself off, I thought I'd have one of them fits on the blind side of his face, and Mike perceiving it, called out,

"Pat, have you him there?"

"Yes, Mike, I have him safe enough."

"Well," says Mike, "kape him there, and God bless ye!"

Louis XIV. asked Count Mahoney if he understood Italian? "Yes, please your Majesty," said the Count, "if it is spoken slowly."

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

New York, Saturday, Jan. 29, 1859.

The Wholesale Dry Goods trade has improved considerably during the week for Breadstuffs, which have been in steady demand, and Provisions, which have most inquired for, mainly by speculators.... Cotton, Provisions, Groceries, Hides, Leather, Oils, Naval Stores, Tobacco, and Wool have generally been in very good demand.... Ashes, Coal, Hay, Hops, and Metals have been only moderately active.... Naval Stores have fallen off in prices. The value of the week's imports of Dry Goods has been $1,000,000 larger than in the same week last year. The imports since January 1 have been $10,816,497 against $11,814,144 same time last year.... The movement in other commodities have not been productive of any remarkable changes.... We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN REPOSITORY, Saturday, Jan. 29, 1859.

The event of the week in financial circles has been the arrival of the Arctic, which will increase the specie premium of $2 40, the lowest successful bids being at $2 42½. Exchange on London at $9 40 premium. As yet the loan was taken for home consumption, the foreign bankers having apparently abandoned the negotiating. About one third of the whole amount has already been paid into the Sub-Treasury at $9 40 premium. The rates for money have risen; paper which was done at 4 a now commands without difficulty 6 per cent. Most of the call loans are made at the same figure. It is anticipated that the stringency in the money market will be but temporary, but at the rate the imports are increasing there can not be a large accumulation of specie in the country. Foreign ships have arrived which will not only consume a small profit on the export of specie. A sum of over $1,700,000 was received from California on Friday.

Stocks have declined since last week. Latterly, the operations of the Bulls and Bears have been pretty fairly square. The news from Europe is not calculated to inspire confidence in speculative purchases. The rise in Illinois Central Stock and Canada Southern Bonds, which adapted to inferior parties to buy railway stocks or bonds.

THE

LAND AND THE BOOK;

OR,

BIBLICAL ILLUSTRATIONS DRAWN FROM THE MANNERS AND CUSTOMS, THE SCENES AND SCENERY OF THE HOLY LAND.

BY W. M. THOMPSON, D.D.

Twenty-five Years a Missionary of the A.B.C.F.M. in Syria and Palestine.

With two elaborate Maps of Palestine, an accurate Plan of Jerusalem, and several finished Engravings, representing the Scenery, Topography, and Productions of the Holy Land, its Costumes, Manuscripts, and Habitats of the People. 2 Large 12mo Volumes.

PRICE THREE DOLLARS PER COPY CENTS.

The work of Dr. W. M. THOMSON, entitled "The Land and the Book," has been prepared under the rare advantages of a long residence in the Holy Land, and for special facilities for travel and exploration, a familiar knowledge of the manners and customs, and the most thorough acquaintance of the country, and the most extensive Biblical and customs illustrative of the word of God. If reproduces to the eye and the mind of the reader, the living realities, the physical characteristics and the social and domestic habits of the land in which the Bible was written, and with which it is permanently associated. This is done with extraordinary accuracy, with fidelity to the sacred text, and at the same time in a popular and engaging style. The work will prove a most valuable aid in the study of the Bible, and will greatly enrich the stores of those who read it for pleasure. For sale by booksellers or its Publishers.

Dr. Thomson's observation of the Holy Land and its people, and customs extended over a period of fifteen years of the Land and its every-day life here presented, are both graphic and minute, and evidently constituted the work to all who seek a better understanding of the sacred Scriptures.

"A genuine contribution to the treasures of Christian literature. Its minute and immensely varied contribution of the geniuliness of the Scriptures, and of the explanation of their meaning, from local customs and natural scenery and phenomena, is unparalleled."—Boston Post.

We must halt its appearance as one of the signs of the times."—Boston Traveller.

"Here is found in a form almost entirely new the effect of traveling hastily through the sacred land. Ever page is full of information, and the style is one of the roughest and roughest that we have seen. It is calculated to bring up to the imagination real scenes and living men. Very similar in kind was the effect of Stanley's book."—Boston Traveller.

HUMPHREYS'
Specific Homœopathic Remedies,
For Domestic and Private Use,

Stand confessedly at the head of remedial means for the use of the people. They are sales removed from the poisonous, dangerous, and repulsive dones of quackery, or old-school practice, the inconvenience of water-cure, of the intricate and perplexing obscurities of the usual Homœopathic books and medicines. Consisting of simple specifics of proven virtue (known by the figures and numbers), put up in the form of single sugar pellets; and are the most convenient, portable, and reliable remedies to buy and administer that have ever been offered to the people, and are the comfort of the unqualifying or invalid.

They possess these grand qualities above all: They are harmless; no injury can arise from their use. They are simple; you always know what to take, and how to take it. They are convenient; you can give the proper Sugar Pill at a moment's warning, without hesitation or doubt. They are efficient; in thousands of cases disease is arrested at once, and the system relieved promptly, safely, and permanently.

LIST OF SPECIFIC REMEDIES.

No. 1. Fever Pills—For Fever, Congestion, and Inflammation, Leading Cold.

No. 2. Worm Pills—For Worm Fever, Worm Colic, Worms, Worm Convulsions.

No. 3. Colic Pills—For Colic, Crying, Teething and Wakefulness of Infants.

No. 4. Diarrhœa Pills—For Diarrhœa, Colic, Infantum, and Summer Complaint.

No. 5. Dysentery Pills—For Colic, Griping, Dysentery or Bloody Flux.

No. 6. Cholera Pills—For Cholera, Cholera Morbus, Nausea, and Vomiting.

No. 7. Coughs Pills—For Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Influenza, and Sore Throat.

No. 8. Toothache Pills—For Toothache, Faceache, and Neuralgia.

No. 9. Headache Pills—For Headache, Vertigo, Heat, and Sunstroke.

No. 10. Dyspepsia Pills—For Weak and Deranged Stomach, Indigestion, and Bilious Complaint.

No. 11. For Female Irregularities—Scanty, Painful, or Suppressed Menses.

No. 12. Female Pills—For Leucorrhœa, Profuse Menses, and Excessive Flow.

No. 13. Croup Pills—For Croup, Hoarse Cough, Bad Breathing.

No. 14. Salt Rheum Pills—For Erysipelas, Eruptions, Pimples, and Blotches.

OF
NATURAL HISTORY.
12mo, muslin, illustrated. Price $1 25.

From the London Edition.

"In Natural History, as well as in other researches, it is too much the practice to speak of the wonders we learn from printed books, the volumes of nature herself being unopened. It has been the aim of the author of the present little volume to supply this want, facts with which, under his own eyes, at the same time not neglecting the numerous works and letters of celebrated naturalists, and the book before us is probably the most complete and interesting collection of curiosities of nature, and interesting subject of Natural History which has ever appeared."

ETHEL'S LOVE-LIFE.

A New England Novel. By Mrs. M. J. M. Sweat. 12mo, muslin.

From the N. Y. Evening Post.

"It is by no means an unreadable story, considering, in a sort of love letters, the history of the growth of an earnest and honest-minded girl, and the author's efforts to personify the psychological analysis, the faculty of which the writer possesses in an eminent degree. She evidently thoroughly understands that fascinating mystery—a woman's heart."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.—The fifty-two numbers of this attractive Journal, which have been issued during the last year, have been gathered into a single volume, and we have counted them together, we are surprised at its variety, the agribilities, and the value of the contents. There is a complete history of one of the political events of the year—there are ample dissertations on the leading topics of the day—the graceful efforts of fiction, and, however, but profoundly instructive of the Loungers—the record of the progress of the arts and sciences—the record of the events of the week—and, above all, there are those striking wood-cut representations of passing events, which, together, tell every fashion, and of customs and countries—all contained within a small compass, and we had for a year's file a grand picture-book of the human life of the ministerial century, in all its phases, and in most striking form. BOSTON, DECEMBER, 1858.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The undersigned, having been greatly injured by certain unprincipled manufacturers, beg leave to call your attention at once to the fact, in relation to an article called "COCOAINE."

After years of effort, and many costly experiments, we have succeeded in forming a compound, which combines with pure Cocoa-nut oil a quantity of peculiar vegetable tonic, sufficient to produce a healthy action of the cuticle, preventing the hair from falling out, giving it strength and promoting its growth, while, at the same time, it is recognized as an article for dressing the hair.

The materials and the mode of preparing the COCOAINE are known only to ourselves, and we venture to say, that it is the embodiment of a discovery in chemical pharmacy, by which an object long sought for in vain has been for the first time accomplished.

We have not secured our right by a Patent, because the articles compounded so change their apparent character by chemical action upon each other, as to escape detection by the nicest analysis, and we have felt sure confident of retaining the fruit of our invention by keeping the secret, than by exposing it through the Patent Office.

To guard against imposition on the public or ourselves, we have invented and adopted the word "COCOAINE," both as it addresses the eye and the ear, as our trade mark, and have never sold a bottle, unless accompanied by a special notice to that effect. It has always been manufactured under our personal supervision, so that the public and dealers might have the assurance that the article is of uniform quality and perfection. It is recommended by Physicians, Chemists, and men of science, and is, we believe, the leading article of the kind in the United States.

We have invested many thousand dollars in the cost of experiments, and in a thorough and systematic course of advertising, and although the demand for it is constantly increasing and the market extending, yet we are largely in arrears of expenses.

Our object has been to place the COCOAINE in qualities and price beyond competition; relying for our remuneration on very extensive sales, and honorable treatment from others engaged in our line of business.

We have just discovered that certain persons in New York have manufactured and put forth a compound which they call "COCOINE;" a name the only change being the omission of the letter A) obviously adapted to deceive the unwary. This compound, if mistaken for ours, will tend to break down and destroy the well-earned reputation of the genuine article.

Feeling confident that no honorable dealer, that no lady or gentleman among our patrons, after learning these facts, will aid or abet a dishonorable attempt to pirate our trade mark, to rob us of the fruit of our labor and capital, or become the willing dupes of any one, we feel justified in addressing this appeal to the Public.

ENGAGEMENT OF FELIX DARLEY

BY THE

NEW YORK MERCURY.

The proprietors of the NEW YORK MERCURY realize a just pride and pleasure in announcing the engagement of the world-renowned and inimitable master of the humorous and graphic art,

FELIX O. C. DARLEY,

who will hereafter employ his magic pencil in illustrating the Series of First-Class Novelettes, by the best writers in America, which will be published in the columns of the

NEW YORK MERCURY.

The engagement of Mr. Darley, which was only accomplished after much urgent solicitation, and the offer of the most liberal inducements, will invest the Mercury with

LYON'S MAGNETIC POWDERS

Will destroy Garden Insects, Cockroaches, Bedbugs, Fleas, Ants, Moths, and all pests of the Domestic Kind.

The importance of a reliable article of this kind is incalculable. In this powder is found the most certain and unerring agent. This powder is the only article ever discovered which will exterminate them. It consists of botanists, from the Horticultural Society of Paris, while amidst the forms of Asia, observed that all insects lighting upon a certain kind of plant were soon dropped dead. This fact was made use of to guard their night camps from those intruders. Quantities of the plant were brought home by Mr. E. Lyon, and found, a goodtime assert deceiving every experiment. It is simply a powdered leaf, chemically prepared to resist the effect of age and climate. Medals and Letters Patent have been obtained from the governments of England, France, Germany, and the United States. Read the following numerous testimonials, and be convinced and satisfied:

Letter from the President of the U. S.

WASHINGTON, CITY OF WASHINGTON, JAN. 1858.

MR. EDWARD LYON.—DEAR SIR:—I have the pleasure to inform you that the Royal Commission of the World's Fair at London have awarded you a Medal and Certificate for the great value of your Magnetical Powders, &c.

JAMES C. BOYER, M.D., Chemist, N. Y. Hospital."

Mr. Edward Lyon, Superintendent of the New York Hospital, says, "he has repeated all the bugs, ants, roaches, moths, &c., with Lyon's Powder, and made it of immediate effect."

Every gardener and housekeeper must have a direct interest in ridding himself of the following pests, so much to the Aster, St. Nicholas, and Metropolitan Hotels; to Judge Mason, Secretary of the American Institute; James Gordon Bennett, Gen. Winfield Scott, Cyrus W. Field, and all of the Editors of Nebia Magazine, &c., &c. Judge Mason says, "This discovery of Prof. Lyon's is one of the greatest of the age." Hundreds of others could be added, but it will suffice to say that Bedbugs, Ants, moths, bugs, and all vermin. Garden Insects, can be destroyed by Lyon's Magnetic Powders.

Arrangements are now made through MESSRS. BARNES & PARR, of this city, to supply the trade throughout the world. Many worthless imitations are advertised. Be careful Burnett's Cocoaine.

TESTIMONIAL.

BOSTON, July 28, 1857.

☞ MESSRS. J. BURNETT & CO.—I am not reluctant to state the benefit I have derived from the use of your excellent Hair Oil—Cocoaine.

My former scanty hair has become thick and full; I was fearful of losing it entirely. The skin upon my head becomes gradually more and more inflamed, so that I could not touch it without pain. This irritated condition I attributed to the use of various advertised hair washes which I have since been told contain camphene spirit.

By the advice of my physician, to whom you had shown your process of purifying the Oil, I commenced to use the last week in June. The first application allayed the itching and irritation. In three or four days the relaxed skin began to contract, the hair ceased to fall, and in a short time, with the use of your Cocoaine alone, similarly afflicted, will be induced to try the same remedy. Yours, very truly,

THE HISTORIAN PRESCOTT.

WE fulfill a duty to the public in engraving on this page a head of the late William H. Prescott, the historian; and we subjoin, in connection with the portrait, an engraving of the mechanical contrivance by the aid of which that eminent man overcame the infirmity of blindness, and continued, under circumstances of extraordinary difficulty, to compose works which will live as long as our language exists.

William H. Prescott was born at Boston, Massachusetts, in 1796. His father was an eminent Massachusetts lawyer, who filled various State offices with credit and honor, leaving at his death as ample a fortune that his son never required to concern himself about money. The grandfather of the historian was the famous Colonel Prescott, whose name is inseparably connected with the glorious battle of Bunker Hill. Another grandfather fought on the British side in that dire conflict: a sailor, commanding a British vessel, he spent the day in shelling and bombarding the American position. It is to these two men that Thackeray refers in the opening lines of the "Virginians," where he says:

> "On the library wall of one of the most famous writers of America there hang two rude swords, which his relatives wore in the great War of Independence. The one sword was gallantly drawn in the service of the king; the other was the weapon of a brave and honorable gentleman soldier. The possessor of the harmless trophy laid earned for himself a more noble harvest in his secretary's country and his own, where genius such as his has always a peaceful crown."

William H. Prescott was intended for the bar, and was educated with care; he graduated at Harvard at the age of nineteen, in 1814. Unhappily, a fellow-student struck recklessly there a crust of bread across a room at him, accidentally deprived one of his eyes of sight; the mischief-maker left him to abandon the career he had chosen, and he resolved to devote himself to letters. Shortly after he attained manhood he went abroad, and spent many years in close study, occasionally diversifying his labors by the composition of a critical essay for a Boston periodical, and devoting so much time to reading and writing that he brought on a disease of his remaining eye. Inflammation of it, and necessity compelled him to give the diseased organ entire repose. Even then he could not abandon his darling pursuit. He engaged secretaries familiar with various languages, and read and wrote with other men's eyes. In 1837 his first great work, the "History of Ferdinand and Isabella," was ready for the press. With what labor and at what cost this and his subsequent works were completed the following well-known passage from his writings sufficiently explains:

> "I obtained the services of a reader whose acquaintance with modern and ancient tongues supplied, so far as it could be supplied, the deficiency of eyesight on my part. But, though in this way I could examine various authorities, it was not easy to arrange in my mind the results of my reading, drawn from different and often contradictory sources. To do this I dictated copious notes as I went along; and when I had read enough for a chapter—from thirty to forty, and sometimes fifty, pages in length—I had a mass of memoranda in my own language which would easily bring before me at a view the fruits of my researches. These notes were carefully read to me; and while my recent studies were fresh in my recollection I ran over the whole of my intended chapter in my mind. This process I repeated the least half a dozen times, so that when I finally put my pen to paper it ran off pretty glibly, for it was on effort of memory rather than creation. This method had the advantage of saving me from the perplexity of frequently referring to the scattered passages in the originals. It enabled me to make the corrections in my own mind which are usually made to the manuscript, and which with my mode of writing—as I shall explain—would have been embarrassed me. Yet I found when I had this method of composition, when the chapter was very long, was too long a strain on the memory to be altogether recommended.
> "Writing presented not a difficulty even greater than reading. Tairey, the famous blind historian of the Norman Conquest, advised me to cultivate dictation; but I have usually preferred a substitute that I found in a writing-case made for the blind, which I procured in London forty years since. It is a simple apparatus, often described by me for the benefit of persons whose vision is imperfect. It consists of a frame of the size of a sheet of paper, traversed by wires not so many as lines are wanted on the page, and a sheet of pasteboard or paper, such as is used for getting duplicates, pasted on the reverse side. With an ivory or agate stylus the writer traces his characters between the wires on the outheated sheet, making indelible marks, which he can not see, on the white page below. This tread-mill operation has its defects; and I have repeatedly supposed I had accomplished a good page, and was proceeding in all the glow of composition to go ahead, when I found I had forgotten to insert a sheet of my writing paper below, that my labor had been all thrown away, and that the leaf looked as blank as myself. Notwithstanding these and other whimsical distresses of the kind, I have found my writing-case my best friend in my lonely hours, and with it have written nearly all that I have sent into the world the last forty years.

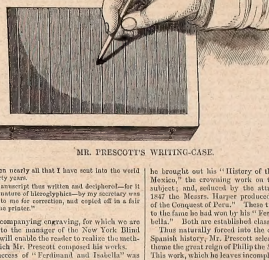
> "The manuscript thus written not deciphered—for it was in the nature of hieroglyphics—by my secretary was then read to me for correction, and copied off in a fair hand for the printer."

The accompanying engraving, for which we are indebted to the manager of the New York Blind Asylum, will enable the reader to realize the method by which Mr. Prescott composed his works.

The success of "Ferdinand and Isabella" was instantaneous and decisive. The most distinguished literary and historical institutes and academies hastened to enroll him among their members, and the capacity of the printers was taxed to the utmost to supply the demand for the book, not only in this country and in England, but in France, Germany, and Spain, in each of which countries translations appeared shortly after the publication of the original.

Five years elapsed before Mr. Prescott again appeared before the public as an author. In 1843 he brought out his "History of the Conquest of Mexico," the crowning work on that interesting subject; and, seduced by the attractive field, in 1847 the Messrs. Harper produced his "History of the Conquest of Peru." These two works added to the fame he had won by his "Ferdinand and Isabella." Both are established classics.



MR. PRESCOTT'S WRITING-CASE.

Most naturally forced into the closest study of Spanish history, Mr. Prescott selected as his next theme the great reign of Philip the Second of Spain. This work, which he leaves incomplete, was intended to be less a history of the monarch whose title it bears, or even of the court of which he was the head, than a comprehensive view of the active and stirring age in which he lived, and in which he was so conspicuous a personage. The first volume was published in 1855, the third a few weeks ago; the remaining volumes will, no doubt, be finished by some stranger.

Mr. Prescott enjoyed remarkable advantages. His wealth enabled him to disregard those debasing considerations of lucre which paralyze so many fine minds. Very few of his works, profitable as they have proved, yielded him enough to reimburse the cost of his material. His rank and hereditary distinction introduced him at once to the best society of Europe, and gave him access to sources of information which men of obscurer origin might have sighed for in vain. The archives of all the courts of Europe were laid open to him; the ablest and most learned men of the old continent were only too happy to lay the treasures of their knowledge at his feet. He composed his works with the amplest material before him; and his concern for pecuniary considerations was so slight that he always had his works printed privately for his own reading before he gave them to the publisher.

Mr. Prescott was married a generation since, and leaves a widow and three children, two of whom are married. Of his inner life one who knew him well writes as follows in the New York Herald:

> "Mr. Prescott's earlier studies were pursued at the mansion house of his father in Bedford street, a stately edifice filled with reminiscences of the olden time. It was such a house as is rarely seen in America, and was admirably suited to the requirements of a literary recluse. Our historian was married early in life, and afterward set up his own establishment, a few houses in Beacon Street, overlooking the Boston Common. Here his days flowed on in diligent attention to his literary pursuits. Fame, wealth, and honors came to him; children smiled around his hearth. His lives were cast in pleasant places. It was his to appreciate the calm tranquillity described by the poet:
> "Sed ubi delicias est bene quum mentis tenere
> Edita doctrina sapientum templa serena
> Despicere, unde queas alios passimque videre
> Errare, atque viam palantis quærere vitæ."

"In addition to the Boston home he had his family estate at Pepperell, and a charming spot at Nahant, and divided his time between the three residences. His temperament was peculiarly fitted for these retreats for nature as well as by birth and education. Like many all our forefathers, he brought with him the spirit entirely aloof from politics or even local affairs. But for the matter of that, Mr. Prescott was no more known lived in Florence as in Boston—in Italy as in Massachusetts. In truth, he was chiefly in the Editorial, in spirit if not in body."

It gives us pleasure to be able to add to the above meagre sketch of Mr. Prescott's literary history, addressed to the Messrs. Harper by the Rev. Mr. Milburn, latter known as the "blind preacher." We have reason to know that a common misfortune had generated a more than ordinary sympathy between the elegant and wealthy historian and the eloquent preacher. Mr. Prescott would constantly—by those who complimented him on the perseverance with which he surmounted the difficulties of his position—refer to Mr. Milburn, as an example of greater difficulties overcome, under circumstances far more trying. Mr. Milburn writes:

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS:

"GENTLEMEN,—Before suggesting to be to Boston on Wednesday last, I called to pay my respects to Mr. Prescott. Forgetting his hours, I reached the door at five minutes past one, when I learned from the servant that, as was his custom, he had left the house at two o'clock precisely, to take his daily walk. I called again after tea, and was shown into the library, the gathering-place for the family at that hour. This beautiful room is, after the fashion of Boston houses, on the second floor, in the rear of the drawing-rooms; it is perhaps thirty feet long, by twenty wide; at the western end there is a large bow window, over which are suspended the swords worn by the grandfathers of Mr. and Mrs. Prescott, at the battle of Bunker Hill. Colonel Prescott commanding the American forces, and Mrs. Prescott's grandfather, Captain Linzee, commanding the sloop Falcon, engaged in throwing shells upon the American redoubts. By the two long walls of the room are arranged handsome cases, I think of maple, on which are shelved about 5000 volumes of well-selected and handsomely bound books. On the left side of the room, as you face the window, a door is painted in exact imitation of shelves with books, so that the visitor is startled when he is invited into the fictitious entrance. This door opens upon a staircase, which leads to the room above, by which also the ladies of the family enter. Between many of the shelves are many choice and exquisite volumes, presentation copies from literary friends abroad and at home. One shelf of the library, he told me, was its most expensive and important feature, as it contained the transcripts of documents in the Royal Archives of Simancas and Madrid, made for him there; arranged in a large number of volumes handsomely bound; and which had then (for this was several years ago) cost him over five thousand dollars. The room throughout is furnished in perfect taste, and is at the same time the perfection of comfort; a characteristic of the libraries of the gentlemen of leisure.

"Mr. Prescott's house is filled with engravings, pictures, busts, statuettes, and medallions, the tokens of admiring regard from friends in every part of Europe and North and South America. Behind the door, in the hall, hangs a full-length portrait of Hernando Cortés, in full armor; and on the opposite wall is a striking likeness of Philip II., both copies of originals, sent him by friends, the first from Mexico, the other from Spain.

"On the evening in question, Wednesday, January 26, Mr. Prescott entered the room with a slower and heavier step than when I had been in the habit of seeing his own before; but his mode of address and his manner manifested simplicity and cordial warmth. Whether a stranger would have perceived it I can not say, but on my first interview with the party, at once detected the work of paralysis in an occasional shuffling of the speech. I had a little difficulty in perfect articulation now and then. Among his very first inquiries was a particular one concerning the members of your own family, your health, the state and prospects of your business, etc., manifesting the deepest interest; adding the remark that, through all the years of his business and personal connection with your firm, he had never experienced any thing but the greatest kindness and consideration at your hands; that his enjoyment of your success was undiminished, and that he felt particularly grateful for the kindly mention which had been made of his personal affliction last year in your paper, and for the obituary notice of the third volume of his Philip II. in the current number of your Magazine.

"He then proceeded to a mention of various mutual friends that had passed away since our last meeting; especially of the Hon. Abbott Lawrence and Francis C. Gray, Esq., at whose dinner tables we had often met, and then of some of the more living friends, especially of George Tichnor, Esq., who, he said, had shortened and brightened his life just for him, as he had been many a sad and weary hour; and of Mr. Agassiz, concerning whose museum he expressed the liveliest interest. He remarked that the eyes of the latter had suffered greatly from his work, and that he would not be much lacked in his presents, that he was also to find relief in manifold manipulating labors. This led him naturally to speak of his sickness and disability, which were about equal in degree; and of the different lives we had led; his, of a retired study, mine, of travel and active toil.

"He added: 'I suppose that Tichnor will never write another book; that he has been doing the world better for the community and posterity by devoting himself for several years to the investigation of the life of his City Library, which may be taken in good part as his work—and a more valuable contribution to the good of the people his address could not be. It is a rare thing for such an institution to get a man so rarely qualified for the task, knowing as he does no splitsheet to bore after its interests with such energy and patience.'

"Of Mr. Gray he observed: 'Poor Gray! I think he was the most remarkable man I ever knew for variety and fullness of information, and for perfect command of it. He was a walking encyclopedia. I have seen many men who had excellent memories, persons who could go to their books for their libraries to get the information you wanted; but no man to whom the subject you spoke of was his knowledge was at his fingers' ends, and entered at your service.'

"He then led the conversation to his English friends, to some of whom he had given me letters on my recent visit to that country. He had known, of Lady Lyell, the wife of the celebrated geologist. 'She is one of the most charming people I have ever seen,' he said. 'When she married Sir Charles she knew nothing of geology; but finding that her life was to be passed among persons who set herself to work to make friends of them, and has done so to perfection. She is in thorough sympathy with all her husband's pursuits, and goes with the companion of his journeys; oftentimes his amanuensis. Her husband has written many of his books; and the delight and cheer of his whole life. Unaffected, genial, accomplished, and delightful to an unusual accomplished extent, she is one of the rarest women you can meet. And,' he continued, 'you saw my friend Sir Henry Holland. He is an admirable person in his! I had a letter from him only a day or two since, to which he gave an interesting account of the opening of the Crystal Palace, St. Paul's, to the popular Sunday evening preachings—an attempt which has enlisted all the sympathies of the Bishop of London and of himself. He has been a prodigiously hard worker, and so has acquired a prodigiously old look. A physician, and an historian, divine, poet, and man of letters, he is at the same time among the most accomplished and finished men of society I saw in England.'

"'Did you see Dean Trench?' he proceeded. Upon my replying in the negative, he added: 'I am sorry never to have seen him; I have heard such pleasant testimony concerning him. He was the favor some time since to send me his Cobleron, which I enjoyed greatly.' Replying to the assertive to my inquiry as to whether he had read the Dean's books on Words, etc., he said, 'They shall be the very next books I read.'

"'England's a glorious country,' he said; 'isn't it? What a green and noble-spirited people! I can not show an American's heart warms toward them after he has been there once and found them out in their hospitable homes.'

"I said: 'Mr. Prescott, aren't you coming to New York? We shall all be very glad to see you there.' 'No,' he replied; 'I suppose that the days of my long journeys are over. I must content myself, like Horace, with my three houses. You know I go at the commencement of summer to my cottage by the sea-side at Lynn Beach; and at autumn to my patrimonial acres at Pepperell, which has been in our family for two hundred years, to sit under the old trees I sat under when a boy; and then, with winter, come to town to hibernate in this house. This is the only traveling, I suppose, that I shall do until I go to my long home. Do you remember the delightful summer you spent with us at Lynn, two or three years ago? I wish you would come and repeat it next summer.'

"In another part of the conversation he said: 'These men with eyes have an at a serious disadvantage, haven't they? While they may, no one only limp. But I have nothing to complain of, nor have you. Providence has singularly taken care of us both, and by compensation keeps the balance even.'

"He then spoke with entire calmness of the shock which his system had received from his first attack of paralysis; last year; said that, while he considered him a good deal, but was very grateful that he was yet enabled to ply his pen with ease; that he was able to write, although confined to square diet, and not allowed to touch meat or any thing of a stimulating nature. Concerning Motley, over, to keep up his literary labors. 'I have always made my literary pursuits,' he said, 'a relaxation from labor, and hope to do so with the remainder of Philip, as I am yet able to work but a few hours consecutively, and then only.' He stated that his eye had suffered considerably from the labor, and while he talked he rubbed it strongly as he spoke his face. In the course of the conversation we were joined by the ladies of the family, Mrs. Prescott, Miss Lucy, Miss Prescott, and daughter-in-law. He then spoke in glowing and grateful terms of the kind hospitalities offered for his health throughout the country, to the kindness which he had invariably experienced at the hands of his countrymen. 'I can never,' he said, 'be sufficiently grateful for the tokens of esteem, regard, and affection which I have received from them all the years of my literary career. True, it makes me feel like an old man to see my fifteen volumes standing in a row; but I am glad to have set it ever was to enjoy the love which the country has ever shown me.' When I asked if any one thing or a man to know he had given so much happiness as he had done by his books, he said that he was his most fervent hope that he had been able to confer it. He said he hoped to live to finish Philip, and then to complete his Ferdinand. As I took him good-by, I said, 'God bless you, Mr. Prescott; I know I breathe the prayer of the country when I say every one of the best years for many years, to add volume after volume to the fifteen.' He replied, 'My prayer is that the love of my friends and their appreciation of my labors.'

"Little did I think that the hand which so warmly grasped mine as he led me down the stairs would, ere night-fall, be powerless in death, so cold and stiff in death. Peace to the memory of one of the sweetest and noblest men that ever lived!

"Yours very truly,

"WILLIAM H. MILBURN."

From an obituary notice pronounced before the Historical Society by the Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, we extract the following interesting particulars respecting Mr. Prescott's personal habits:

"His habits were methodical to exact, entering early at an early hour, he rose early alike in winter and in summer at the appointed moment, rousing himself instantly, and was in the study exactly at the first note of his alarm bell; never giving indulgence to laziness or delay. To the hours of study, he was, of course, quite as adhered as scrupulously as possible, never beginning them but to be interfered with by nothing but to do reader; now dictating what was to be written; now taking his own pen and writing it himself. He was helped by the aid of simple machinery devised for those who are in darkness, among which, as thoughtfully as ingeniously, his guest thought. For this reason, at the period of his life when he was writing on horseback—and he was exceedingly fond of that exercise—it was his choice and his habit to go alone; and, as he had no companion to talk to, he might be sure that, when by himself, his mind was shaping out the text for the rest of the day. He was also fortunate in his mode of life, he preceded onward, and with onward, till the eyes of the world were turned in admiration on the genial scholar, who, with placid calmness, contemplated mingled sympathy and admiration, and gained the first place among his countrymen as the historic instructor of mankind.

"The prominent argument itself was singularly pleasing, and was for him every where in advance a welcome guest. Always entertained hospitably, and always received with the beautiful dictates' that hovers on that of the guest. Both were happy in the visit, both were happy and gentle and humane. His voice was like music, and his conversation was the very strength of it. Enthusiastic reached and animated all about him. He could indulge in playfulness, and could also be serious without any formality; but he knew not how to be ungracious or pedantic. He was, indeed, a man of the most delightful and unequaled, he so united the rich stores of memory with the warmth of a heart in fraternal love with all."

"In his friendships he was most faithful; true to them always, true to the last. Of his generosity it would seem to be as much as ruffled by the noisy clamors of calumny, by a single act of ungenerous conduct. Indeed, the encouragement of his affairs he was prudent and considerate: In his expenditures liberal to all about him, not only to his own, but equally generous, having an open hand, but doing good without observation. His affections centered early and long upon the companion of his youth, and the rosy light of his youth, never dimmed by a cloud, went with him all his way through life."

It will not unnaturally be expected that this journal should contain some allusion to the business relations which have existed for many years between Mr. Prescott and Messrs. Harper & Brothers. Mr. Prescott's first work, the "History of Ferdinand and Isabella," was originally published in Boston. His succeeding histories—"The Conquest of Mexico," and "The Conquest of Peru"—were born from the first, the imprint of the Harpers. Some years after the appearance of the latter work he offers so advantageous, apparently, were made to Mr. Prescott by a Boston house, for the privilege of publishing his works, that the Messrs. Harper coincided with his other friends in advising him to accept them.

So pleasant had been the intercourse between Mr. Prescott and the Messrs. Harper, that the severance of their business relations was a source of more than usual regret to the latter; and it is with no ordinary satisfaction that they remember that these feelings were shared by the illustrious historian.

The Messrs. Harper believe that at the present moment, when so much interest attaches to every thing relating to Mr. Prescott, they are violating no confidence in publishing the following letters, which, to the general reader, will remark would never have seen the light so long as their writer lived:

"LYNN, July 19, 1851.

"Messrs. Harper & Brothers:

"DEAR SIRS,—I duly received yours of the 10th instant, and read its contents with sincere regret, as it announced the dangerous illness of one of the most relations that have so long subsisted between us.

"I should have replied to it before, but I have unavoidably delayed in bringing my arrangements with the other house to a close; and I thought it was better to wait until I could write to you that my new associates before communicating again with you.

"I have arranged with them for the publication of my new history of 'Philip the Second,' and for that of the former history simultaneously.

"And now allow me to say this is one of the most unpleasant letters I ever wrote in my life, since it is to break off a long and pleasant intercourse between us, which, I trust, will only be changed any words but those of kindness and regard. And these feelings will not be lessened, I am sure, between us. For you will have the candor to admit that it would be too great a sacrifice to my interest for me to decline any offer which secure to me the certain payment of fifty thousand dollars, independent of the future contingency of the sales of the octavo editions of the old histories.

"As I dislike mysteries, I should mention the name of the house last this I have been required not to do for the present.

"Believe me, my dear Sirs.

"Very sincerely yours,

"WM. H. PRESCOTT."

A year afterward Mr. Prescott wrote:

"LYNN, July 24, 1852.

"Messrs. Harper & Brothers:

"DEAR SIRS,—* * * I am entering on a new enterprise in my arrangements with the Boston house. How it will turn out time will show. But whatever it is, I am sure it will be with the kind and pleasant relations I have had with you, in which the good understanding and the cordial feeling between author and publisher has not been interrupted for a moment. Every year of our connection has confirmed me in the opinion that I performed of the high and honorable character of your house, for every member of which I beg to express sentiments of the sincere regard.

"Believe me, dear Sirs,

"Very truly your friend,

"WM. H. PRESCOTT."

And again, in Mr. Prescott's last letter to the Messrs. Harper, he says:

"BOSTON, March 1, 1858.

"Messrs. Harper & Brothers:

"DEAR SIRS,—* * * It is most grateful to my feelings to find that our long—and, to me at least, most agreeable—intercourse, has left such kind impressions upon you, as will naturally reciprocate your good wishes by expressing those which I have ever felt for your prosperity and happiness.

"Believe me, gentlemen,

"Very sincerely your friend,

"WM. H. PRESCOTT."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1859.

THE WOLF AT THE DOOR.

THE act of 1858 has now been exhausted, and the United States Government has bowed all the money that can be borrowed without fresh authority from Congress. According to the most reliable calculations, the receipts for the fiscal year 1858–'59 will fall short of the expenditure by at least sixteen millions of dollars. This deficit may—has probably will not—be increased by any extra appropriations by Congress. It does not include some twenty millions of Treasury notes now in circulation, and to be forthwith provided for either by a reissue or by the passage of an act funding them.

Some members of Congress, and some members of the Administration likewise, appear to think that the Government revenue from customs is increasing fast enough to meet this deficiency. This is an error. This spring the merchants are importing very heavily, more heavily than ever did during the same months of theirs grows out of the stagnation of 1858. During that year every merchant expected his neighbor to import largely, and the consequence was that no one imported at all. Now the importers rush into the opposite extreme. Every one, calculating on the want of goods throughout the country, and on the probable abstinence of his neighbor, is importing to the extent of his means; and the consequence is that in a few weeks this market will be glutted.

But a successful trade implies a demand for as well as a supply of goods. No adequate demand for foreign merchandise can now be reasonably expected. New York, as a rule, has no great markets for her imports—the South and the West. The one depends on cotton, the other on corn. Experience teaches that the Western or corn country is, at least, twice as valuable a market as the Southern or cotton country. Of these two sections the latter only can now be relied on as a market for New York imports. The South is rich, and can afford to buy. To the extent of the necessities of the Southern country, a demand for foreign merchandise may reasonably be anticipated. As with regard to the West no such reliance can be entertained. The West is at the present moment largely indebted to the East. Western merchants, as a rule, have no means to invest in foreign merchandise. Every Western grower—looking to the harvest—has debt due to him by farmers. Under ordinary circumstances Western merchants might fairly expect to obtain a fresh supply of goods by remitting their real estate in favor of New York merchants or Western bankers; but the peculiar condition of the West, that is to say, the universality of its prospects in that region between 1850 and 1857, and the speculative value set on real property of all kinds, will render this a very precarious means of this resource. Nearly all the property in the West is already mortgaged for more than it would command if brought to the hammer. Furthermore, the legislation of various Western States, especially in reference to home mortgages, is not calculated to induce prudent men to advance money on any pledge of real estate in that section of country. Several cities in the West have openly violated the flag of repudiation, and in at least one State the farmers who collectively represent a large majority of voters in certain public bonds, have banded themselves together in a sort of ribbon association for the purpose of evading the payment of taxes, by which nothing could be more lawfully binding on them. All this is not calculated to encourage people in the East to entrust any of their goods on the faith of Western bonds and mortgages.

We infer, therefore, on the whole, considering the prevailing poverty of the West, and the difficulties (arising from excessive speculation and loose currency) which environ the trade, and the way of the successful negotiation of Western mortgage bonds, that the Western market can not be relied on for a more than ordinary share of the foreign imports of 1858. And it follows, as a matter of course, that if the early importers of the spring of 1859 are unable to sell their goods to good advantage, the importations will fall off, and the customs revenue will decline accordingly.

We are a people of extremes. We seem destined to oscillate perpetually between indulgence and misery, plethora and bankruptcy, excessive speculation and absolute inaction. In the spring of 1857 the resources of the United States would have sufficed for sixty millions of people. In the spring and fall of 1858, the importations did not exceed the wants of seven of the people of the State of New York. In the spring of 1859 we shall again import enough for fifty or sixty millions of consumers of a foreign produce. In the fall of the year, according to present appearances, we shall again cease to take off the hands of manufactur dent to discuss matters of taste, which are subject to no fixed canon, and can be decided by no established precedent. But we may observe that, for the last forty years, mankind has required a certain expansion in female skirts. Rightly or wrongly, the esthetic eye requires that the female figure shall be broader at the base than at any other point; and this is impossible without expanded skirts. Before the invention of hoops the desired effect was attained by the multiplication of skirts, which, as every lady remembers, were unwieldy, inconvenient, expensive, and unhealthy. Hoops superseded these, providing the requisite expansion without either inconveniencing the wearer or endangering her health. They achieve the purpose which was utterly sought by heaping skirt on skirt; and they do no mischief.

It is much easier to laugh at hoops than to invent a substitute for them, or prove their uselessness. Certainly, according to the prevailing notions of the beautiful, a woman without hoops, with garments clinging to her person, and exposing, in the wind, the contour of every limb, is neither graceful nor modestly attired.

As to moral considerations, it is difficult to discover what they have to do with hoops. The priests, bishops, and professors who have denounced hoops as sinful were doubtless prepared with arguments to make good their position; but it is to be feared that they kept their reasoning to themselves. Awkward girls will ill-made skirts may wear hoops to disadvantage; but really, what the beast of grave men blushing at the shocking consequences of the hoop, one involuntarily recalls Tartuffe's exclamation,

"Couvrez ce sein que je ne saurais voir!"

The verdict of truly ladylike women is, that hoops, properly worn, save their modesty far more than the lower style of dress.

Hoops have been accused of causing accidents by fire, and increasing the mortality among female fowls and small quadrupeds. These are objections which are well-founded. Wearers of hoops must exercise extreme caution in approaching fire more than they used to do before hoops were worn; and ladies attired in the prevailing fashion will require new means of protecting themselves against cold. But, after all, these are simple matters. Flannel is not beyond the reach of ordinary purses; and it is giving our women little credit for common sense to say that they can not help sticking their skirts in the fire. If these objections be weighed in the balance against the obvious advantages of the hoop fashion—in respect of health, elegance, economy, and comfort—there can be no question but the advantages will carry the day.

AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP AND FOREIGN DESPOTISM.

We are glad to see, at last, that Senator Pugh, of Ohio, has called for the correspondence between our Minister to Berlin and the State Department in reference to the compulsory enlistment of United States citizens in the Prussian army.

We believe that this journal was the first to call for an inquiry into this subject. We had evidence before us that Prussian officials were not only in the habit of impressing American citizens who had left the fatherland to live and been born Prussians, and to return to Prussia on a visit after their naturalization here; they not unfrequently added to this the impressment of citizens of Prussian birth in adjoining States. Under these circumstances we inquired—with some justice, we think—whether our State relations were worth preserving if such outrages could not be prevented?

Under Mr. Webster an effort was made to establish the principle that an American citizen, wherever born, was entitled to the protection of the United States Government. Mr. Marcy, in the first enthusiasm of power, went further, and shielded a foreigner who had simply declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States. General Cass will not interpose to protect a citizen of the United States from being pressed into the Prussian service. He holds that no man has a right to become a citizen of the United States unless he has discharged all the duties which his birth involves to the Government under which he was born. In respect of natives of countries therefore, where every male is liable to military service, as in Prussia, Mr. Cass holds that even a naturalization as citizen of the United States can not discharge the original obligation.

This, of course, is not the American view of the question. We allow foreigners from every country to our shores. We offer them every inducement to become citizens of the United States. We desire that they should become citizens. And when they have complied with our desire, we know no distinction between them and native-born citizens.

Prussia only needs a sharp reminder of our intentions to relax her policy. An embargo on the trade between Prussia and the United States would break half the manufacturers of Prussia, and would speedily humble the Government. Let Mr. Pugh persevere, and follow up his motion with a resolution to suspend all trade with Prussia until her present policy is abandoned, and we shall hear no more of the impressment of American citizens.

PRESCOTT.

No reader familiar with modern literature but will be sad to learn that the accomplished and fine historian Prescott is dead. Some months since we spoke of a sudden illness, a slight paralysis, which had befallen him. Such an event is but a touch of a solemn finger, which beckons and points forward. It is, therefore, not altogether with surprise that the papers reported his death on Friday, January 28.

In the circumstances of his life, well known to the world by his simple relation of them, and in the delightful manner in which he has told them, there was such a genuine kindliness that the man was loved as the author was respected.

He was born in Salem, Massachusetts, in 1796, and was, therefore, about sixty-two years old when he died. At the end of his college life a chance crumb thrown at him by a companion at table struck one of his eyes and destroyed the sight. The other eye was weakened so that he became almost wholly blind. His subsequent career is familiar to his friend, Mr. Ticknor, the historian of Spanish Literature, in Duyckinck's Cyclopedia of American Literature, and from that we learn that, although this case happened among the most popular and learned of historians. The Histories of the Conquest of Mexico and Peru followed, and the third volume of a History of Philip the Second was issued at the close of the last year. Ticknor tells us that Prescott was the husband in unceasingly; he dealt with original materials, and while he was engaged in several at once, he kept his usual public sympathy, the publication of its results was hailed with hearty applause; and in the last ten years, in 1850, his rich talents will hardly be written again.

Prescott's literary kind have been freely lavished upon him here and elsewhere. He went to England, and England offered him its most generous hospitality. If there was this surprising, for there is something peculiarly English in the calmness and firmness of his character, there was also the English ardor. At home he was surrounded by old friends, and his last years were made as happy as the social enjoyments in Boston or at Nahant and the shores of Massachusetts Bay.

His life is a plain narrative, none the less remarkable because he was not obliged to work for his bread. Many a scholarly young man, under circumstances much more favorable, fully justified in the general opinion for retiring from every kind of fashionable activity, would not have produced what Prescott in college. Nor is it to be regarded as altogether a fancy that his misfortune should have left a shade of sadness apparent in the general character of thoughtful kindness, calmness, and sweetness which pervade all his writings. If there was a shade, how brilliant, and his style is pleasant rather than picturesque. Very rarely have an author's personal sympathies with his story been so entirely unobtrusive. He is not a great philosophic historian; he is a charming chronicler. He is the engaging narrator of a most romantic story, rather than the analysis of their causes and the influence of human character upon them, which forms the philosophic history.

But if any man is fortunate who writes a book that shall be a delight to every body, he is doubly so whose work inspires personal regard as well as general admiration? Prescott did both—literally speaking—his work was done. But when the sailor sinks with his ship, or the patriot falls in the front of the battle, the sudden pang of grief or death upon his desk, we feel that it is fit, that it does not come with the full regret of duty and of labor in the proper place to die.

THE BURNS CENTENARY.

THE Burns birth-night celebration was the most universal literary festival ever known. In most of the cities and towns in the northern states societies of every nation under the auspices of Scotchmen; and the heart of the world beat responsive to the memory of the poet who has enthralled it so long.

And of all poets, Burns was the one who would naturally inspire such a general feast. For he is the song-writer as truly as Homer is the epic and Shakespeare the dramatic poet. And as the songs deal directly with the cardinal emotions of humanity; they are sentiments that flower out of no poet, no individual, no peculiar experience, but they spring out of the great common heart, as grass springs out of the ground. Burns is the voice of the poet of the universal heart in its domestic and affectionate aspects. He is the singer of love as no man that sweet as a singer. He is naturally "Robin" and "Bobbie" to all who think of him, or hear his name, or sing his songs. His life was so sad that we think of it with pain, but, happily, his own music clears away the tears that cloud our eyes as we remember it.

It is curious, as we have before hinted, that two Scotchmen should be the most personally beloved of authors, but curious only because the proverbial characteristic of the Scotch genius is sober thrift. Robert Burns and Walter Scott are the two personal favorites of Humanity and Poetry and Art.

Yet all who love a genuine, old-fashioned novel, full of love and adventure—resulting as the heart always implicates that it will result—will enjoy profoundly Bulwer's last novel.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"MR. LOUNGER,—You have had much to say about fashions in your columns; so perhaps you can decide a question we have been debating.

"In, or is it not, toolyfum for high-bred, independent females to say the silly words of some fellow-writer about 'Mrs. Lounger's pleasant, solid, and domestic qualities?' Some of us consider that the second intention of going out to buy her husband some shirts, as having all her own or its late excellence, is big enough? Are honest constituency be most lavish? And, Query III. Did Dr. Dodge's last sermon, would each trouble have appeared in the aforesaid newspaper?

"CRATCHITA."

—The Lounger does not understand why his letter-writers cited the particular purchase as an indication of the qualities they commended; and unscholarly, indeed, Dr. Dodge's last sermon, the letter-writers would have gossiped of the wives of eminent successful candidates—if they would have gossiped. The Junkins style of Washington correspondence is undoubtedly the most popular of any. Abstemiosity of every kind is always entertaining to the general reader; and as every newspaper aims to please every body, when each of twenty is copied into a reputable journal, it does not necessarily prove toadyishness upon the part of the printer. Nor is every letter of a series of a lioness to exist. A lady is one who flatters, in the hope that flattery will spur from the flattered; but in the case supposed CRATCHITA will see that there is no such expectation.

—RAYMOND, Georgetown, District of Columbia, wishes to know

"What is the difference between a rare fighter and a fair writer?—One rejoices in fights done, the other in fights to do."

"What is the difference between a lady's riding-dress and a lawyer's brief by days?—One is a hiding exists, the other a riding habit."

—J. H., Boston, says that he and his friends have been much puzzled by the following questions:

"Is idiocy a defect in the mind, or in the organ of the mind, the brain? Is the mind the direct gift of the Creator, or is it the result of the organ, the brain? Is the mind a unit and the brain compound, or the reverse? Is it the action of the mind, as grounded by phrenology, based on truth?"

None of these questions can be positively and finally answered. We know that idiocy is caused not only by means of its "organ," and we know that it is by means of, or influenced, or perhaps wholly formed, idiocy is the result. But we know nothing of defects in the mind. The reply to the second question is answered in this. And the last is met up the world like a watch. What we call nature is only the mental idea of the material universe. It is human senses and faculties. The third question involves an impossible comparison of spirit and matter. To the fourth the Lounger answers frankly that all the old jokers have a certain qualification in experience. Phrenology, as it stands to-day, is no science as Lavater made it, but every body is impressed, pleasantly or otherwise, by various developments of character which are the result of a fool. So with phrenology. It may not be certain and infallible in the details of its theories, but nothing from the combination of qualities indicated by the cranium, but there can be no doubt that certain swellings of some of the skull indicate certain general tendencies. Phrenology does not pretend to be anything more than a philosophy of it. In the science of a particular result and expression of the character of some man. There is a fascination in discussing these problems of "Fate, freewill, foreknowledge absolute—"

but they are not in our streets. They are the matter into very cold or very hot water.

—The friend in Wilmington, North Carolina, who asks the Lounger about the property "in the Saturday Post" will find that the property is Home Ivi, I. 45),

"though I am native here
And to the manner born."

—J. L., Baltimore, takes the Lounger's reply to his request to furnish questions for Lyceum debate most seriously than the Lounger does. He declares that, after avarice, irritability is one of the worst things a man can do. Peevishness, fretfulness, &c., he no longer mount as faults. The Lyceum discuss a question that was recently discussed in a Lyceum in Baltimore. "Ought a man to obey a law which his conscience condemns?" To the mind of the Lounger there is no question at all as to the propriety of obeying a law which can be gravely debate it. Then let the Lyceum discuss "Is the present Congress of Europe likely to aid the democratic principle?" Then, "Is it a desirable law?" Then, "Is a profitable question?" Then, "Is desirable?" Absurdity, that is, of the law.

These are multitudes of such questions, which will be of considerable interest to the people, as well as republican citizens, and upon which we ought all to know the reasons of our opinions. Should a series of these questions be discussed, will J. L. please send the Lounger the number of each? Perhaps the Lounger will promise not to offend with his trivial fun any more.

—In the Lounger's Letter-Box of December 18, 1858, there was "a charade for fast young ladies by a slow young man," by H. D. Will H. D. please to appease the eager curiosity of W. E. S., Boston, and A. BERNE INCOGNITA, by sending the Lounger the answer?

—W. C. B., Louisville, Kentucky, gives the Lounger permission to light his pipe with some lines upon a "Moonlight Night Strolle;" and with many thanks, and granting that they display great ease and facility, the Lounger has done so.

A SKATING SCENE.

SKATING.

NEVER was there such a rage for skating throughout the United States as this winter. Before the age of steamboats, when the ice used to "take" smoothly and broadly every winter on the East and North rivers, the New Yorkers were proverbially fond of skating. But, for the last thirty years or so, the want of suitable ice has deprived the Gothamites of the pastime. This winter a bold and successful effort to repair the deficiency has been made by the Commissioners of the Central Park, who have turned their ponds and swamps to good use, by flooding them every cold night, and inviting skaters to try them in the morning. The idea has been a hit. Thousands of persons of both sexes have for the past month, whenever the weather suited, spent an hour or two every day on skates in the Park—with no small advantage, it is to be hoped, to their health and spirits.

Our illustration represents a skating scene in the country. Throughout the North and East skating has long been a favorite amusement with ladies as well as men. At Boston most of the young ladies skate, and skate well. Throughout the Canadas skating ranks as a domestic and a popular institution. No doubt much of the health and fresh complexion which distinguish Northern belles arise from this favorite pursuit.

A FRAZER RIVER LOVE STORY.

WE arrived on our station, at the mouth of the Frazer River, in Oregon Territory, with the ship, officers, and ship's company, all in the very best of health and spirits.

It was a glorious day. We had contrived to get the ship over the bar, and were lying about two miles up, surrounded on all sides by forest-clad hills and grassy valleys. Not far from us was a fort belonging to the Hudson Bay Company, to the officers of which the herds of half-wild horses that pastured in the valleys belonged. The woods teemed with game, and the water with fish; so that we never wanted a day's sport, nor a delicious addition to the dinner-table.

For some time I gave myself up to a sporting-life. The officers of the Company had kindly given leave and assistance to catch and break as many horses as we pleased, and I, with a couple of smart nags—on which my servant attended as groom—my gun and my rod, with an occasional excursion into the land of poesy, was as happy as the day was long.

Many of our fellows used to visit at the fort; but I, being of a bashful and retiring nature, contented myself with making my own cigar with the inhabitants, and then returned to my former amusements. I had become accustomed to the absence of ladies' society from necessity, and should have gone on happily and prosperously until we left the place, had it not been for one unlucky day, and one deceitful purser.

The niece of the commanding officer had lately arrived at the fort, and taken all hearts by storm. She was a blue-eyed, cherry-lipped, peach-cheeked, dimpled-faced damsel of seventeen, with clustering bright brown curls.

The purser and I were the first favorites with the young lady, and the rest were nowhere. I could come on shore oftener than he could, and, taking advantage of this, I was most assiduous in my attentions. I danced with her, I walked with her, I sang with her, I read poetry with her, and I began to touch her dressing. All went smoothly as a marriage-bell. The perfidious purser had scarcely the ghost of a chance; and I felt sure that the sight of me in my full uniform, when she came off to church, on Sunday, had completely finished him. But "Man proposes, and Providence disposes." Let me hasten to a conclusion before my feelings get the better of me.

"OH! DO CATCH IT FOR ME—THE LITTLE BEAUTY."

A picnic party had been got up, mainly through my exertions. We mustered about fifteen, including Miss Edwardson. The scene of our rural festivities was to be a small grassy glade in the thick forest, just where a fine headlong trout-stream came dashing down into the bay—about as delightful a spot as can well be imagined; and right merrily did we enjoy ourselves. Among the crowd of admirers that surrounded her (there were always eight or ten), Miss Edwardson distinguished none but me. The purser looked at me savagely—at her, dismally; and despite his natural buoyancy of spirits, was either silent, or spoke in monosyllables. As I observed his spirits declining, so did mine rise, until at last I had become quite the lion of the party. My wit sparkled under the approving eyes of that sweet girl; and as the wine passed round after our dinner, beside that glorious stream, I kept the table, or rather the table-cloth, in a roar; or, as the humor seized me, I got them into a sentimental mood, and set them thinking of their absent loves.

We got to singing. The purser sang a song, the refrain of which was, "There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip." Ah—h—h! I remember it but too well. Many other fellows sang; and when it came, I gave them a beautiful little thing I had composed for the occasion, beginning,

O no! we never mention her;
She lovely—she's sublime, etc.

Only I could not manage to keep out of "Ben Backstay" and "Cease, rude Boreas," into which two songs I was constantly tumbling, owing to a defective, or perhaps, a too retentive memory, assisted by sundry glasses of Champagne, which I had taken to get my courage up to the popping-point. At last Miss Edwardson was prevailed upon to favor us, and she was getting on delightfully with "Love on, love on," occasionally sending me up to the seventh heaven by a tender glance in the strong passages, when she suddenly broke off and exclaimed:

"Oh, oh! Oh, the darling! the love! Oh, the sweet pet! the beautiful creature! Oh, the little beauty!"

She was either looking at me or over my shoulder. For a moment I really was am enough to believe that her passion for me had turned her brain; but seeing Williams rise from the grass rather hastily, and observing that he was intently regarding some object behind my back as I reclined beside my charming lady-love, I looked round, and there saw the cause of her exclamations. It was a beautiful little animal of the ermine species—at least so I thought, though its coat was pure white, and it had no black tip to its bushy tail. The impudent little wretch looked at us for a minute, and took it so easy that I began to think it must have been some escaped pet; and when Ellen rung out again: "Oh, Mr. Guthrie—oh, see how tame it is! —oh, do catch it for me, please—oh, do!" I rose at once to do so. At the same moment all the others rose. I saw that perfidious purser sign to them, and thought they were coming to assist. I did not notice till afterward that they had all retreated in an opposite direction.

The little beast had taken up his station at the foot of a grand old tree. His stern was turned toward us, and he was quietly and complacently surveying us over his shoulder. I made a run at him, and my hand was nearly on him, when—Ah me! the remembrance of my reception by that abominable animal I shall never forget. The love, the darling, the pet, the beautiful little creature, was neither more nor less than a SKUNK! I was almost suffocated. I was entirely beside myself with rage. I fell down, I yelled, I rolled in the grass, I rubbed the skin off my face. I held my nose, but the terrible effluvium got in at my mouth; I shut my mouth, and it rushed in at my nose. I screamed for help, and one or two of the less experienced of our party came running down toward me; but no sooner had they got within fifty yards than, simultaneously gripping their noses, they ran as if the Old Gentleman was after them. I rushed after the nasty wretch, still valiantly holding my nose; but no sooner did I approach than the horrible stench met me with redoubled force.

I had been there some time, when I heard a voice hailing. It was the purser's, and he was evidently holding his nose.

"Hi, Tommy, where are you?"

"Here," I answered, in a most doleful tone—here, under the water-fall."

"That was a skunk you tried to catch," he called out, keeping a respectful distance, and still holding his nose.

"Don't I know it, you confounded booby!"

"Oh, I thought you might like to know the creature's name, in case you should ever fall in with another. Pretty thing, isn't it? Can I do any thing for you?"

"No," I replied, savagely. "I'm going on board."

"On board!" exclaimed Williams. "Why, man, you'd clear the ship. Nothing can live within fifty yards of you, nor won't be able to for a fortnight to come. You don't know how strong you are."

"Don't I, though!" I thought, feeling at the same time that I was strong enough to smother another person, to give him a good thrashing, if I could only get near but that was hopeless.

How queer you look there, under glancing water—quite like a jolly old river-god. Well, look here. You can't go on board; you had better walk round the head of the bay until you come to a half-drained hut which is there. There you will have to stay for a fortnight at three weeks; and if you keep in the water all the time, you will probably have ceased to be aromatic. At present, you know, you are dreadful. I'll send you round clean clothes, grub, liquor, and any other necessaries. Good-by: take care of yourself. You'll have a very quiet life; I almost envy you. Good-by."

I am almost sure I heard him stifling a laugh. Could I have proved it, this world should not have held me both much longer.

Three mortal weeks did I exist, a miserable outcast, in that wretched hut. At the end of the second week, a messenger, holding his nose, presented me with a small packet. On opening it, I found it to contain a small portion of cake, and two cards tied together with white ribbon. On the small one was the name they turned and ran as if for the bare life.

"UNDER THE WATERFALL—LIKE A JOLLY OLD RIVER GOD."

I was intolerable to myself. The dreadful perfume nearly suffocated me. All my washing and scrubbing only took the skin off, without giving me any relief. I tore off my coat and waistcoat, and rushed into the stream. There was a steep fall close at hand; and there, under the dashing water, with just my nose and mouth out of air, I sat. I dared not move out. Only when covered with water was existence tolerable.

I had been there some time, when I heard a voice hailing. It was the purser's, and he was evidently holding his nose.

"Hi, Tommy, where are you?"

"Here," I answered, in a most doleful tone—here, under the water-fall."

LITERARY.

Whether the speck of war on the northern horizon grows larger or not, it is very plain to us that no one can fail to be interested in a clear and intelligible account of Paraguay and the River La Plata, whether our sympathies lay more to the mixed republics or to the Empire. The expedition of the Water Witch, in 1853, '54, '55, and '56, possesses special interest, and we therefore have great confidence in the ability of Commander Thomas J. Page's narrative of the expedition, which Harper & Brothers are publishing in a splendid octavo, entitled LA PLATA, THE ARGENTINE CONFEDERATION, AND PARAGUAY, illustrated abundantly with engravings and maps.

The account of Commander Page is spirited and attractive. You take it with the impression that travel itself, for every thing is novel, instructive, and entertaining.

Every one is taking up the book will turn first to the story as the cutting on the Water Witch, and, if the judgment of our author is entitled to any credit, there was never a grosser instance of insult to a national flag than this, or one which demanded of more summary and condign punishment. The Administration is always in a delicate position when such occurrences take place. Its own interests reveal a first into or bearded on the high seas, and the Administration do not brilliantly declare war against the aggressor than a feeling rises in the country and the opposition presses loud there with charges of cowardice, weakness, and all sorts of thefts. If, as in the present instance, they send a fleet to demand reparation, there is always a party ready against the wisdom of the course. Let any man read the volume before us and say whether a greater insult was ever offered.

It was notorious on the Parana and throughout Paraguay that the Water Witch was engaged in a peaceful exploring expedition. It was notorious that the river was never the property of Paraguay, but was a public highway for all. The right of the vessel to ascend it was undisputed, indisputable. She was fired into by a Paraguay fort, and the lieutenant was killed and the ship damaged! was an act absolutely without excuse, an unprovoked injury and an intentional insult. Commander Page may well be indignant as he is, even in the opening of the pages before us and we join Americans to read this book carefully and judge of the propriety of the arguments which are elsewhere urged against admitting this aggression to be insults a pretexts and friendly flag.

We have no space for an extended notice of the work, and have allowed the matter of the war proper to take too much of our room. It constitutes but a small part of the book. The narrative contains lively accounts of men and manners, customs and curiosities. It gives a new page of geography as well as of human nature, to our eyes and ears. The maps are of particular value at present, and the illustrations of the first character. The style is, by-the-way, an amusing page of illustrations. One of these is French Legoa a league on the river and the spot where the Water Witch was fired upon; the other is a correct drawing by the surveyor. The two together look as much like a view of the Bosphorus and Isle of Cake George as slightly resembles the other. The Paraguay Legoa fights as he sketches, it will be a battle of shadows with Paraguay.

James Clarke & Son, Philadelphia, have in press A New History of the Conquest of Mexico, by Robert A. Wilson, Esq., of which the advance sheets have been placed in our hands. Mr. Wilson does not believe in the romance of Mexican history. On the contrary, he has studied it as well the country and its topography as its veritable history, comparing one with the other, and, in not infrequently shows that received accounts of some adventures of Cortés can not, from the nature of things, be true.

Few writers so well appreciate these portions of the romance of history which immortal pens and the all classes of readers as Miss Pardoe. Hence her Episodes of French History, published by Harper & Brothers, is one of the books which, without sending, we should be safe in recommending. It is just a glance over the pages dipped here and there than a cursory examination, and we take it up only to lay it down with regret and wish unread. The period selected is that strange and eventful one of the coronation and empire of the great Napoleon. The characters are the heroes and heroines of the age of both. The charm that invests all accounts of the men and women of that day, was surrounded the child of destiny in his career, this charm is felt by Miss Pardoe and admirably rendered. Here are seen Josephine as no one has before seen her—magnificent stories of Josephine and her beautiful court, and her rivals are revealed, as she says in the preface, "hidden motives for public measures, indications of character which serve to explain seeming anomalies in apparently consistent lives, and will especially attract the lover of the strange, exciting, and marvellous, here are recounts of the secret workings of many of Napoleon's great movers, the warmth and the bold and brilliant diplomacy, private, but most important, negotiations, and interviews, plans and plots, which sound, indeed, like romance—some of the most important of which are claimed by the author with the undoubted seal of truth. The book is emphatically absorbing in interest. Miss Pardoe has the English ideas of Josephine and Madame Tallien, and does not attempt to conceal her belief of the beauty both in their early years.

Volume II of Vol. 3, which separately, is two fine books, the two series of Abbott's Illustrated Rooms. They are noble stories of men of great talents, and will be interesting as well as useful subjects as their authorship. They form, in fact, a complete history of modern science in these columns of the lives of the men who have done most to advance it.

Volume II fields from the 47th and 48th volumes of their Household Waverley, and two more volumes will complete this collection, which we have no hesitation in pronouncing the most tasteful, choice, and elegant edition extant, not excepting even the great Abbotsford.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, 31st January, in the Senate, Senator Bigler introduced a resolution to the effect that the duties ought to be restored. Various petitions and memorials were presented; among others, one from the Naval Committee recommending that the Navy shall consist of what should be the best that can be constructed. A discussion followed on the Utah and Pacific Railroad bills. Messrs. Bell and Crittenden made speeches. The Indian Appropriation Bill was then taken up, and some amendments of no general interest were passed.—In the House, various petitions and bills of a private nature were presented. Mr. Stephens sought, but did not obtain, leave to appropriate certain days to the consideration of territorial business. Mr. Millson moved to suspend the rule in order to introduce certain obligations and resolutions relative to the slave-trade; but the motion sought leave to introduce a bill to enable the President to employ the Army and Navy to put it in force. On motion of Mr. Bliss, it was resolved that for the ensuing week the House would sit from 11 A.M. to 5 P.M. Long speeches on the acquisition of Cuba were made by Messrs. Quitman, Barksdale, and Smith, of Tennessee.

On Tuesday, 1st February, in the Senate, Senator Seward offered a petition of 1,800 persons in favor of the slavery interest. Senator Wade moved to take up the bill for the admission of Kansas, which was opposed by Senators Gwin, Stuart, and Pugh, after which the Senate proceeded to the Indian Appropriation Bill, and the Homestead Bill was postponed till the 14th. Mr. Bigler spoke in favor of the Homestead Bill, and Mr. Hunter replied that any claims of the United States, if any could be found, would not be affected by becoming such, but be entitled to enter any quarter-section of unappropriated land. Mr. Bigler made an ovation of actual settlement. The French Spoliation Bill was taken up on motion of Mr. Bayard, and after speeches by Messrs. Darrington, Lesher, Wade, Hunter, and Bigler, was by the latter moved to be postponed indefinitely, which was carried by the House, referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the Union.

On Wednesday, 2d, in the Senate, various reports and memorials were presented. Senator Wade introduced a letter Pugh calling for all correspondence relative to the transaction of the Commissioners to Japan and the Chinese service. The Agricultural College Bill was reconsidered, and after a long discussion was postponed indefinitely. The Homestead Bill was then taken up, and in the House, a bill was reported by Mr. Greenwood providing for the appointment of Surveyors-General of Territories in the Sioux-ux Indians. The naturalization clause was, after a long discussion, struck out of the bill, and was then lost by a majority. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Indian Appropriation Bill, and speeches on the general financial condition of the country were made by Messrs. Phelps, Giddings, Kelly, Bingham, Phillips, Kelsey, Dodd, Cox, Pendleton, Sherman, Hickman, Stanton, and Davis.

On Thursday, 3d, in the Senate, memorials were presented for a change of time of the sessions between New York and Newport, and for the appointment of a port harbor. Mr. Bigler, from the Committee on Claims reported unfavorably to the claim of Messrs. Gray & M'Carty for relief in addition as compensation. Senator Houston introduced a bill to unite the two Judicial Districts of Texas. Senator Green moved to take up the bill to prevent polygamy in the Territories. Various private bills were reported from committees. The House then went into Committee on the Legislative, Judicial, and Executive Appropriation Bill, and various speeches were made on the subject by Messrs. Stanton, Crawford, Trippe, Millson, Moore, Washburn, Kunkel, Curtis, Wright, and others.

On Friday, 4th, in the Senate, Senator Green reported the bill to prevent polygamy in the Territories, and ordered to be printed. Senator Seward called the information with regard to the Japan Expedition. The bill for the Homestead Bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands. A petition was presented from the citizens of Captain and crew of the brig General Armstrong was presented by Mr. Crittenden. The Consular Bill was reported in favor of Mr. Chapman's right to a rent or debt from the Government. The Senate then went into executive session.

On Saturday, 5th, in the Senate, a resolution was passed to accept the offer of Mr. Corcoran for the Land Bill, the discussion of which was deferred. Mr. Green presented a memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State to vote for the passage of the bill of postage. Senator Seward also presented a memorial of citizens of Alabama, from the Committee on Commerce, Mr. Clay, of Alabama, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a substitute for the bill relative to the Treasury's evidence or retrenchment. The bill prepared by the Committee on Commerce for the better collection of the revenue. The Pennsylvania Avenue Railroad Bill was then discussed by Messrs. Bigler, Wade, Pugh, Brown, Jay, Trumbull, and others. Every notice that he would, on the 7th, move to take up the Homestead Bill.

Mr. Stanton, from the North Carolina Legislature, relative to Naval Affairs, reported a joint resolution of thanks to Lieutenant Maury for his services to the navy of the United States. The joint resolution giving permission to Lieutenant Maury to accept a complimentary medal made from the Bardstown Government was passed, and the House adjourned.

THE LAST PRESIDENTIAL RECEPTION.

The Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge, England's reception and Tuesday night and no overflowing attendance. As to the reception, it was a failure. Everybody can make no satisfactory estimate, not having been invited on the 5th of January, and not having been invited and then quitting as soon as possible for a less distinguished but more agreeable party. Mrs. Buchanan was likewise. Getting out of the carriage, the writer was met by a gentleman in full dress, accompanied by a large room of stairs, at the door of which he found Mr. Buchanan, Mrs. Buchanan, Miss Lane, and a few other friends, and a number of strictly Congressmen. This is Mr. Nobody. Mr. Buchanan received his guests with his usual courtesy and politeness. Mrs. Buchanan and Miss Lane could Magdalene gave a gracious smile, and the light that lighted up her countenance when she saw the writer, the easy kid rather hung in the fingers as the hand of our beloved and honored friend. Mrs. Buchanan, by the way, to whom—as he always is to women—the President was particularly affable; and the writer pleased on through yellow rooms and blue rooms to perfect chokers nothing of drapery and furniture, until he at last gained standing ground in the fragrance and drawing room, where the last object of this place was disappointing some acquaintance for other attending assemblies.

THE FIRST LADY IN THE LAND.

"Of the noble animals congregated here, we had, of course, the most interest in the Ladies. Many of them were in uniform and men in evening dress; men with swords and men without swords; bald-headed men, and men with spectacles; diplomatists and doctors; pale students and florid men of the world; members of the Army and Navy; members of the Church; Governors, Governor's aides, contractors, public paupers or officials; Cabinet Ministers, and Fifth Century people, lobby agents, and judges in all stages of impeachment, together with the unspeakable conglomeration of representatives from Bedlam; long-haired men and fuzzy-haired men; men with extinct whiskers, and men with prodigious beards; men to contest their lives, and want of lines, beneath a chair table scuff.

"Of the gentler sex we had countless and some very magnificent displays. Ladies lovely as Eve, and a good deal fonder of apples; ladies quarrelsome and homely as Xantippe, and a good deal fonder of apples; ladies of all ages, and all sizes, with every variety of hair and complexion, and their white arms flashing back a golden ether in the sunlight—a sight to make the angels weep for envy. There were girls from the Western States, with black and blue eyes and golden locks, sitting opposite to dark-eyed and hooplets thin-waisted skirts; women painted in every conceivable color, from the lily and the rose to the damson or two girls from Pike County, with faces so white and pure that you could imagine yourself in a snow-storm in the absence of any other relief, had dipped them, head and shoulders, in a pot of rouge. Girls with short hair and short and tall, fat and skinny women and girls, with every thing about them that could be seen, and a great deal that could not be seen, all dressed in every variety of beads, plaits, frights, heads, wreaths, and other inconceivables that nothing but the fertile brain and fruitful ed' of delicate hair give satisfaction to the multitude."

IS SURGEON COMING TO THE UNITED STATES?

The following is a letter from Mr. Surgeon: "The news by the last steamer tells us that Mrs. Mr. Surgeon is coming to the United States, and will arrive in time for the Spring Season. Mr. Surgeon is the Astonishing Surgeon of the day. The true state of the case is probably this: Mr. Surgeon is a Mr. Surgeon's Assistant Surgeon in London, but now in Europe. It is not known before he left that it was his intention to visit the Surgeons in the United States, and with him, or at least to visit New York, and preach in the Surgeon's pulpit. Mr. Surgeon is the first man in his place in the home field of the modern Wheelbird. How many of Surgeon's sermons will be published in Harper's Bazaar. But rumor has it that Mr. Carey is to fill the place of Surgeon's pulpit at so much per year, that is to say, up the round sum of $10,000 to pay the star preacher. Mr. Surgeon will preach in the Academy of Music, and hold a concert on Twelfth Street, which was sold to the Surgeon.

He holds a levee at the house of Mr. Astor in Madison at Paris, in the aristocratic portion of that artistic quarter, Fifth Avenue. Mrs. Astor is said to be Episcopalian. His congregation, not large, now occupy the church Mission House, on Broadway, Twenty-second Street. And no one has learned that he has made much money or gathered many converts in his present position. Now, following in the wake of Messrs. Barnum and Ullman, he has engaged the services of the great star of the old world, and intends to show him up to the good people of this country. Mr. Surgeon is a man of great talent, and is a good preacher, and will be received with open arms. But if he should come as a paid star, he will be disappointed. He will find that the Christian spirit attracts, for immense sum of money, the public would gape and stare, and the gold would roll in, but that the $10,000 blazing on his forehead would sink the miserable and will be a failure in the United States."

A REMARKABLE SUICIDE.

The New Orleans Delta of the 23d gives the following remarkable story of a suicide: "A private for years, 21 years ago, was, during a storm, struck by a blade a ship-carpenter, lived with his wife and two children in a house on the corner of Bayou Road and Derbigny street, then prevailing, counted among its virtues the youngest children in the whole neighborhood, being about four years old, and the particular pet of the father. He was a man of steady habits, and was much respected. Not able to buy a tomb, he had the child buried in the ground in front of the house, and had a little mound built up upon him. It was his only thought; and being out of work, he employed his time in cultivating a garden of grief. He bought a bottle but, and most bricks and oyster-shells, and made a walk to the little mound, and planted flowers around the child. He had not the means to make the tomb a stylish one; so in its mouth, or, enclosure, he fixed a marble slab, and upon the slab he fixed a piece of board, and secured it with screws in the four corners. Upon the board he had painted in large wash its face of the usual brick and mortar or marble slab, he had written and sprig with the usual form and scription of his child. The tomb finished, he disinterred the child's body and placed it in the tomb, screwed the board with screws, in order that he might afterward have the trouble in opening it, and then left it to the world and the decaying remains of his child. This employment kept him busy for several months, and he was often seen sitting by the child's grave. Last night he had procured a screw-driver in his pocket with which to unscrew and replace the board, and he was found dead upon the lid of the coffin. Neither the haggard aspect of the lamenting father nor the grief of the wife and mother could repel him in his morbid grief. His visits were frequent, and his sorrow was deep and sincere. He frequently complained to her that he could not get work, and that building up the tomb was a labor of love, which was drawing him to death. He frequently spoke of having no friends, and of his life as a death-in-life thing.

HOW HE GOT INTO THE TOMB.

"On Wednesday he went to the cemetery with two friends which he had purchased, and paid them for the first of the tomb. On Thursday, when he left home, he told his wife that he was going to the cemetery to finish work she would never see him again. He also said something relative to his children, and left the house. Not seeing or that night—for no one saw him in his gloomy mood—his wife supposed he had gone to the cemetery, as usual, to work. Yesterday morning, about half-past six, the watchman, on his usual round, discovered the board with screws, in the tomb, with the body of the child in the coffin, with marble slab, and the board with screws, in their proper places, and their ends flush

The Evening Post's Washington correspondent says that the announcement that the Cuba question would be debated in the Senate on Monday attracted Lord Napier in the Chamber. He was accompanied by Mr. Scott, of South Carolina, and soon after entering the Chamber engaged in close conversation with Senator Clingman, from the same State.

Mr. Prescott's mother soon showed his room to the Rev. Mr. Frothingham, and said to him: "This is where Mr. Prescott will be sure to stay months in after death. It is all burning secure, and the property is to be endured, and our hearts were ready to fall us for fear, I assure you, that the property would be lost, and we should be left in the street; but it is all safe now, and we can go home with some hearty expression of good cheer." Such is a simple instance of the way in which the property is put in place to comfort us." No word of complaint throughout the whole funeral period; no weeping or sighing or regret. He was not content even with the perfect silence of an unmarried life; he had a meaning in that confinement and night. Was this not a representative example?

A curious suit has been brought in Machias, Maine, to one to-gether and a half miles distant. It is a case for the recovery of a gold watch claimed by the defendant to be his property. For plaintiff it was testified in court by Capegal. In the testimony, it appeared that the watch was not to be paid if the plaintiff preached politics, which the defendant believed he did, and consequently withheld payment. The jury failed to agree after being out five hours.

PRISON DISCIPLINE IN LONDON.

Ex-Queen-Sarrow Rose, urging, through the columns of a contemporary, the necessity of providing for the discharge appropriate to women, observes: "In one room I have seen confined Mrs. Wright, a woman—Mary Ann Alice Soaps, by name—who had beaten her step-child to death under circumstances of the most revolting cruelty. The process of murder occupied some considerable time; but I can not relate the details, and it would be sickening to read them. She was a clever, cunning woman, and had taken care to do her work when no one was by to see her relating to it, but when she had the harvest of the officials, and full of grievance. Mr. G., the late Secretary of State for the Home Department, would not remove her from Newgate on account of a supposed delicacy of health, and the other prisoners, guilty of petty rages committed by this woman in prison was a threat to put her tormentress from Newgate. Certainly not to the one Celestina Somner, also well educated; convicted of cutting the throat of her child, ten years old, in a fit of collar, with a carving-knife, and whose conviction was secured by the evidence of a servant-girl, who had slept soundly in or on a bed in the kitchen, through which the child had been dragged by the hair of the head. Celestina in the same room with Mrs. Wright, who, although hurt the bumper in the act of murder informing her that she was ready to finish the—we will say—job with a servant-girl—her servant system strung in all agony of fear—because she could not get the child to sit still. The three, carving-knife in hand, came to Rachel's bed in turn her over and ascertain whether she was asleep or only pretended to be. "I did not go to sleep," said this witness at the trial, "I was afraid to do so." Such were some of the scenes of prison associations on the heart of Celestina Somner may be inferred when she described some of the evil companions that she was sorry she had not finished. Mrs. Wright was one of the worst of them. One of the three companions was a woman who had killed her husband, had three children, who, wishing to visit a prisoner in the solitary cellular that she might tell her her offspring forget, but I think not), and finding the expense of moving them to the prison too great, she deliberately took two of her children down to a canal, and held them under water until they were dead. A woman before her trial transgressed up a deliberate lie with elaborate circumstantial detail, and then committed it to her into custody, which she adhered to after trial and before execution. The imminent prospect of death could also admonished this woman in her. Those three were the companions of Celestina Somner, who was convicted of cruelty and neglect of her child, and not of murder, and the more so, the worse the crime and the more notorious the criminal. It was very attended by the ministry of the clergyman, the governor, the matron, the visiting magistrates, the chaplain, the schoolmaster, and the female visitors, who are privileged, some daily and some weekly, to walk quiet conversation to the inmates and receive complaints and grievances. More, much more might be added, but this be enough to show that Newgate wants further improvement."

The Times correspondent writes: "Mr. Charles Dickens is becoming a sort of rival in amusement to Mr. Albert Smith. His readings from his own works are crowded every night, at St. Martin's Hall, with fashionable and distinguished audiences. Two friends of mine, who were in the country unable to get tickets for the readings, found it impossible to obtain tickets for the stalls, every one of which, in the language of the box-office keeper, was 'taken for the season.' A friend of a friend, who was, however, accommodated with two extra chairs. He used the charm of his conversation and his influence with the authorities, who are privileged, some daily and some weekly, to walk quiet conversation to the inmates and receive complaints and grievances. More, much more might be added, but this be enough to show that Newgate wants further improvement."

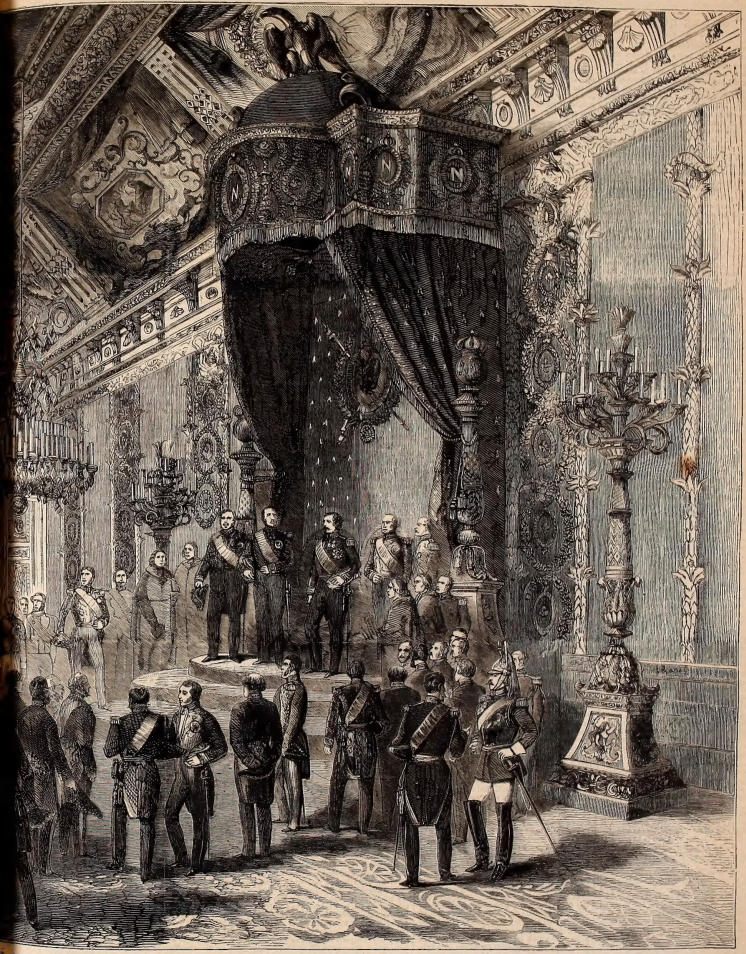
THE RECEPTION BY THE EMPEROR N

THE RECEPTION AT THE TUILERIES ON NEW-YEAR'S DAY.

On New-Year's Day the Emperor Napoleon the Third convulsed the financial world of Europe and America by receiving Baron Hubner, the Austrian Minister, with a sharp quip instead of the formal New Year's compliment. The Emperor regretted—so the newspapers say—that the relations of France with Austria were not as good as they had been. As it is possible that war and all its consequences may grow out of the complications of which the unusual remark was an incidental symptom, we have thought our readers would like to see the scene. Should the liberation of Italy result from the contest to which the Emperor's speech appears to have been intended as a prelude, the accompanying engraving will rise to the dignity of historic art.

The custom of receiving foreign embassadors and ministers of state at the Tuileries on New-Year's Day has always been observed by French sovereigns. Strange to say, the first visitors of the day, under the reign of the Citizen King, were not unfrequently deputations of trades-people, among whom washer-women and market girls—femmes de la halle—were used to predominate. In those days the King sought democratic popularity; the officers of the ceremonies were instructed to introduce to the royal presence any deputation, however ragged and dirty, provided they were bona fide representatives of any well-defined category of the citizens of France.

Under his majesty the Emperor, washer-women, dames de la halle, barbers, and chiffoniers enjoy less liberty. It is not considered necessary to receive them at the Tuileries. Whatever civilities it is deemed prudent to grant to them are awarded privately, out of sight of the tilted aristocracy. On



F AT THE TUILERIES ON NEW-YEAR'S DAY.

New-Year's Day, and on similar grand occasions, the Court of the French Emperor yields in no respect to the oldest court of Europe. Around the Emperor stand, first, his blood relations, and next, the principal ministers of state. He stands on an elevated platform, overlooking the whole room. The visitor is put to the inconvenience of marching up to the foot of the platform on which the throne is erected, and there making his obeisance, uttering his complimentary speech, and receiving the monarch's reply. Never, even at a court in Siam or Cochin China, has foreign diplomatist been put at a greater disadvantage. Never has imperial ill-breeding been more manifest. Never has our common manhood endured a severer shock.

If the famous speech to Baron Hubner should, in reality, prove the first symptom of a war between Piedmont and Austria, ending in the expulsion of the latter from Italy, we outside barbarians, who look to practical results, and care little about outside forms, will be inclined to forgive the priggism of the Emperor of the French. Italian freedom would be cheaply purchased at the self-imposed degradation of a few ambassadors.

But if the speech of the 1st January should turn out to have meant nothing; if we should have to record, once more, that the French sovereign has trifled with the feelings of a noble people, and made sport of the sympathies of the civilized world, for no other reason than to create a sensation, and divert popular opinion from the career of despotism which he is pursuing, the judgment of the world will be very different, and not a few will sneer, with perfect justice, at the absurd affectation of ceremony and old regime frivolities by the notorious parvenu Louis Napoleon.

One of the London papers calculates that the decline in the value of public stocks caused by the speech was equal to £40,000,000: the real injury would be under-estimated at twice this sum.

POUDRE ROSE.

CHAPTER I.

A DARK winter day, in the year of grace 1839. We are closing upon the final scene of one of those tragedies of real life which would be affecting, were they not, in France at least, of such everyday occurrence. Eugène Beaudésert, the direct representative of a long line of courtiers, warriors, diplomatists, commencing with the Merovingian kings, and now for some time schoolmaster in Lyon, was dying in a mean apartment au troisième of a house in an obscure street of that wealthy and splendid city. It was no longer ago than the month of September, 1837, that the birth of Eugène Beaudésert, the first-born of a distinguished general of that name, and Estelle, his wife, née Sorrentino, had been duly celebrated in that city with much pomp and éclat. Clouds quickly overgrew and darkened the brilliant future that seemed to await the child. General Beaudésert was killed at Marengo; and soon after the guardianship of the last male issue of the ancient house of Beaudésert was transferred to his aunt, Madame de Vautyé. She discharged her self-imposed duties, every body agreed, in the most liberal, exemplary manner. Eugène Beaudésert's education was conducted by the first masters; his purse was supplied without stint or grudge; and he had but just completed his eighteenth year, when Madame de Vautyé obtained the high favor and honor of a commission in the Garde Royale for her nephew. Everything Eugène Beaudésert was in his twentieth year, when he contracted against his aunt's will a marriage with the pretty daughter of a Paris shopkeeper.

Madame la Baronne de Vautyé was informed of the marriage of Eugène Beaudésert with Adrienne Chemffort by a long and eloquent letter from the bridegroom; to which no immediate answer was returned, inclosing a draft for ten thousand francs, and briefly stating that Madame de Vautyé, Madame Monsieur and Madame Beaudésert happiness, in the state of life they had chosen for themselves; but, as Monsieur Beaudésert had been left so emphatically warned would be the case, Madame de Vautyé no longer looked upon that gentleman as her nephew, or as one possessing the slightest further claim upon her.

Thus, step by step, poverty came upon the rash couple; the poverty, armed with serpent stings, that treads upon the heels of reckless and improvident, and which, but for Captain Chemffort's pension—a rather considerable one for his position, he being an inferior member of the Legion of Honor —would soon have been destitution; for Eugène Beaudésert, with all his worthy relative's birthprivileges, persisted in keeping himself fiercely aloof from the contamination of *mésal*liances, mean, and none other, than obtainable.

In 1836, Eugène, reared to opaonolic exertion, left his wife and young child at Paris, and went off and set out on foot with his daughter, dreamy Adrienne, for the Chateau d'Ein, where Madame de Vautyé had for many years consecutively, and, but which, but for Captain Chemffort's pension—a rather considerable one for his position, he being an inferior member of the Legion of Honor —would soon have been destitution; for Eugène Beaudésert, with all his worthy relative's birthprivileges, persisted in keeping himself fiercely aloof from the contamination of mésal emphyteusem, and none other

"Cest, c'est! I look to be rewarded by money, not by compliments, Monsieur Delpech."

"Claude Simonet," said Jules Delpech, with a wry grimace, meant for a complimentary smile, "Claude Simonet won't be the father of fools, if his children take after his pretty wife."

"Ha won't, in that case, be the father of dupes," was the retort: "a fact which, I repeat, the Delpeche, father and son, will do well to bear in mind. Bonjour, monsieur.

"Au plaisir, Mademoiselle Mendon," responded Jules Delpech: adding, with a savage snap of his teeth as the door closed, "Au diable, rather! I should like, instead of a dowry, to accommodate her with a—" What, he did not say; but one might have seen from his looks it was something which Lisette Moudon would have decidedly demurred to as the substitute for a handsome marriage-portion.

The child-heart of Mademoiselle Beaudésert beat suddenly, and a vague feeling of terror possessed her, upon approaching the appointed rendezvous on the following day, that she was upon the point of turning back and abandoning her purpose. "It was the last effort," she afterward said, "of my guardian angel to make me look into the precipice to which I was madly hastening. It was made in vain. I shook off the warning impulse, as those will remain where he was for a few minutes, and hastened on."

Jules Delpech would have made a capital actor, if one might judge by his natural assumption of surprise and unfeminine alarm, as Mademoiselle Beaudésert, blushing and painfully agitated, stood before him. It was some time before he appeared able to even utter words out for expression of the confused, hurried sentences in which it was expressed. At last he seemed to catch it, but still uncertainly.

"Mademoiselle Beaudésert wishes to know if it is there in any truth in the reports circulated affected by the poudre rosé. Do I rightly comprehend her?"

"Yes, that is the question I wish to put; and if —if; but perhaps it is all an idle tale."

"It is not an idle tale," replied Delpech, with well-smelled gravity and earnestness. "The miraculous properties of the pouding rosé have been proved over and over again; but mademoiselle is, perhaps, not aware that to dispense it is to act in contravention of the law, though not of humanity?"

"Oh no, I had not thought of that; and I would not for the world that—"

"If mademoiselle," interrupted Delpech, "will tell me frankly for what purpose she requires the poudre rosé, the wish to serve a daughter of the noble-minded victim who once became a martyr in the name of friend, will, if I see a probability of doing so effectively, render me indifferent to any legal penalties I may incur."

"Ah! monsieur," said Adrienne, her soft eyes filling with tears as she spoke, "I will tell you, for it is because you were his friend that I wished to consult you, knowing that I should not be either deceived or exposed to ridicule. It is for my father to try the effect of poudre rosé upon—upon Madame de Vautrey!"

"Madame de Vautrey!" ejaculated Jules Delpech, in a tone and with a start that would not have disgraced Talma. "Madame de Vautrey! For what purpose, in the name of Heaven?"

Adrienne explained, with blushing face the while, as she subsequently recalled to mind, though too agitated and confused at the moment to appreciate its strange significance, Jules Delpech's hint, in saying the while into her eyes with a piercing intensity, as if more desirous of reading there the secret of her soul than of listening to the words of her mouth.

"I understand you, Mademoiselle Beaudésert," said Delpech, with slow, stage-solemnity of speech. "The poudre rosé will effect your purpose in giving it to Madame de Vautrey."

"Seriously, I am so glad; for, do you know, Monsieur Delpech, I felt almost afraid to ask you, would say it was a childish, absurd illusion."

"Then shall I place it in mademoiselle's hands?" inquired Delpech.

"To-morrow, if you please, at this place and hour."

"It is so, mademoiselle. I will be punctual and ponctuel."

"Almost a woman, and a charming one, too, in truth," muttered Delpech, looking after Mademoiselle Beaudésert as she hurried down the lane to where she had left the valet; "in mind, the veriest child! The aristocratic vanity may prompt a deed which very well for heaven, but certainly they do not succeed in fitting them to deal with this wicked world. After all, Paul will make a fine and excellent husband; and if, which is quite possible, we have deceived ourselves, and the poudre rosé is spiritually for him, or at least that it is so decided at the time her to stop to a union with him from the height whereon we grow by it, why, so be it; we will see her placed, it will require the iron link which I have so mysteriously begun to forge, to be sure and bind her prideful will. As yet, at all events, I can say bona fide, bien fait; and, best of all, should our audacious project, as it is sure to be called, fail, neither Paul nor I shall be seriously compromised, as I will manage, if it do so, that ours not fall."

Madame Beaudésert and her daughter Clarisse had passed the stipulated number of hours at the Château d'Em, and were seated at breakfast with Madame de Vautrey, Mlle. Morlaix, and another, which repast concluded, the two visitors would be conveyed, in a carriage already in waiting, to the Messageries Royales, Lyon, en route for Chalcy. Mlle. Morlaix could not help remarking that Adrienne was very much more restless, perturbed, ill at ease, than on the like former occasions. And why were the burning eyes of the pale, spiritual girl turned with such intense, sudden scrutiny upon Madame de Vautrey's countenance when Madame and Clarisse Beaudésert should descend to the salon? Was it that Adrienne's solicitude was awakened by the signs of recent and severe suffering visible there, for Madame de Vautrey had passed a much worse night than usual, and at her own request had received the sacrament soon after rising?

The abbé would fain have believed so, but could not, knowing what he did. He was rather, he greatly feared, that that young and, as he once thought, guileless, unworldly heart was agitated by criminal hopes, which those signs of probably mortal disease had quickened and inflamed.

Such was the unfavorable conclusion to judgment! Poor Adrienne's criminal hopes were, in sooth, limited to the natural effect produced by the poudre rosé. Certainly, Madame de Vautrey's demeanor was more gracious toward her mother and sister than was its former wont, and something resembling condescension!—suffering and feeble as she was. Madame la Baronne could accompany them on a second stairs to the entrance-hall; had shaken hands with Madame Beaudésert, and was about, apparently, to extend her hand to Adrienne, when suddenly, cause unknown, she fell backward upon her chair, and fell heavily upon the tesselated pavement, before a hand could be stretched forth to save her. A medical gentleman, who had resided for several weeks at the château, was quickly on the spot, and pronounced, after a few drops of dark blood flowed, and, at the end of a few incredibly short minutes, the man of science announced, in a grave whisper, that Madame de Vautrey was dead—dead of apoplexy!

"Dead of apoplexy! Is it possibly, of apoplexy?" said the abbé, addressing the surgeon, but with that stern glance in his eyes, that searching countenance, till she, overcome by a rush of contending emotion, lost her senses, and sank, with a low moaning cry, into her mother's arms.

CHAPTER III.

TOWARD evening on the same day Mademoiselle Adrienne was still in a manner stunned by the suddenness and magnitude of the event which had accepted the poudre rosé. The death of a near kinsman from the Abbé Morlaix, requesting to see her immediately, and alone. She obeyed the summons, and was received in a small ante-room which was in the abbé's presence. He wore his priest's garb, and a velvet cushion had been placed beside the chair.

"I have sent for you, Adrienne Beaudésert," said he, "on this day in which the Church hands are the issues of life and death, his visited this house with such a message as this, that I feel confidence, that, at such a solemn moment, you will not refuse or delay to lay bare your whole heart to God."

The abbé's words and tone wounded the susceptibility of the young girl, who, in her natural inspired by conscious purity and innocence, answered that she had no present intention of placing her soul before mortal eye, save that which was its superintendence. The abbé was enraged beyond all bounds by such a reply, which, in the excitement of his anger gave partial vent to the dreadful suspicion that had arisen in his mind. Madame Beaudésert, however, was not to be overawed in his angry, menacing language and reproach, that she would have taken a solemn oath of her innocence of the deed with which she was charged. Adrienne stood her ground, and, when the abbé paused afterward the obstinate, to seek counsel as to what course, under the circumstances, he was bound to take.

Whatever that counsel may have been remained unknown to those most interested in its import, conferred, since it was not, visibly, at least, developed in action. The result of the chateau went on as before, on the appointed day Mlle. Morlaix and Madame la Baronne de Vautrey was borne in state to the vaults of the family of the deceased husband of laid by the side of that of her nephew. The funeral display was yet more splendid—its catafalque more gorgeously decorated—the pageant of the day rotting beneath its imposing upholstery, the crowd more numerous that followed the corpse into the former occasion: albeit the essentials of the show were identically the same in both cases: the same clerical array, only more splendidly habited—the same crowd in larger numbers; the same exclamation of admiration: "What splendid a badge for a serpent shall bite him!" skilfully amplified to include certain special and personal allusions to the deceased. Only one conscience, if it might be fairly so inferred from the convulsive sobbing of, apparently, the most overwhelmed by the weight of seeming mourners! The spectators whispered to each other that Madame Beaudésert must be most profoundly affected than at her father's funeral and some others, of the more observing sort, remarked that the abbé Morlaix was not in the Paris was again recognized by Madame de Vautrey's grandniece, as she left the church by the side of her mother, a shudder, a chrisen suffusion of face and neck, rendered more striking by the instantly succeeding pallor, from a terrible thought associated with the flashing looks interchanged by the father and son?

The death-rites duly celebrated, the affairs of life regained regard and prominence; and it was found that the Abbé Morlaix was the heir to the bulk of the property was then devolved had been executed only about three months previously.

The brilliant future that had so long eluded the grasp and mocked the hopes of Madame Beaudésert was now in a manner realized, to the great delight, unbounded exultation; and it was not very long before the dark, fitful fancies that haunted the imagination of mademoiselle, her daughter, were chased away, or superseded by the excitement attendant upon the novel and dazzling position to which Madame la Baronne's death had placed her.

After three months' enjoyment of home splendors, however, even began to arise, and a lengthened tour was projected by the latter, through Switzerland and Italy.

During these three months the Delpechs had made no demonstration whatever. The father's timidity of temperament had operated to suspend the blow, the possible recoil of which might bring about his own destruction. Rights—yes; but not the brain strained to unnatural, guiding power. After all, nothing could be wanting to insure success but Fortune, et encore de Fondeur.

"Here then it is, we have run that very well," brilliantly exclaimed Paul, who had heard that soliloquy, or one very like it, whispered from sister to sister, "but when the moment of action arrives your heart is to be found in your shoes, if any where. It was worth while, truly, to venture so far, only to stop short when the prize was in sight—within handling distance. Had I not been long to speak to me," added the young man, bitterly, "for it is quite certain the Beaudésert leave France for one, perhaps two years, but whether one or two, I assure mesielle will not return, we may fully assure ourselves, was a female bloodcurdling simplicity on she is, or, more correctly, has been."

"Ah! Paul, you have not been that very well," gently exclaimed Paul, who had heard that soliloquy, or one very like it, whispered from sister to sister, "but when the moment of action arrives your heart is to be found in your shoes, if any where. It was worth while, truly, to venture so far, only to stop short when the prize was in sight—within handling distance. Had I not been long to speak to me," added the young man, bitterly, "for it is quite certain the Beaudésert leave France for one, perhaps two years, but whether one or two, I assure mesielle will not return, we may fully assure ourselves, was a female bloodcurdling simplicity on she is, or, more correctly, has been."

"I have seen Lisette Moudon, who, through me, returns the three Napoleons you once lent her, with her compliments and a polite intimation that, for the future, she must decline the honor of our acquaintance."

"The insolent baggage!"

"That polite and peremptory intimation," continued Paul, "does not prevent her from coming with me upon the not blight to my hopes caused by the discovery that mademoiselle Beaudésert cares no more for my fascinating self than for any other of the country clods upon which the light of her countenance may have occasionally shone."

"And what, pray, may be the meaning of all this mystery?"

"The meaning is plain enough: la demoiselle Moudon, thanks to the powerful interposition of the mysterious, will of Madame Claudine Simonet, is at two: elevated, therefore, above our position in life—and, consequently, is true, too," added Paul Delpech, with an explosion of savage temper.

"True! Surely, Paul—"

"True—yes, certainly it is true," interrupted the youth, with a look and tone that he feigned he had been drinking; "but it shall not be for long. Hear, now, my unalterable resolve, if you please, Sir Paul Delpech! Not by having myself to wife, at least will not hesitate at the final leap or plunge; and since you are so fond of the sex, and so well acquired over Adrienne Beaudésert, I will do to myself; and but a few hours shall have passed before I shall be ready to make a confession to the stand that the sole choice left her is between marriage with Paul Delpech and public exposure, followed by shameful death!"

"You would fail, Paul—utterly fail," resulted from such a threat as that," replied his father, "and you are so resolved, will set about the—the business with more caution and circumspection than hints, awakening preludes to the else overwhelming thunder-burst. Don't you think it will be best to do so?"

"As you please; only, if possible, get rid of that accursed Lisette. A look, determined look at least win; but a shaking hand will lose both fortune and fair lady, skillfully as the dice have been thrown."

Thus urged, Jules Delpech managed to screw his courage to the sticking-point, and, accompanied by Mademoiselle, while busied with preparations for the impending journey; was surprised and startled by the receipt of several brief notes, from time to time, but indirectly menacing in their import, soliciting an interview. Mademoiselle said disporting itself in a parterre of gorgeous flowers, from amidst which a serpent suddenly reared its head, and hissed forth, "Why only be attractive?" Di! that must mean Delpech." What can he want of me?" Then she half left it.

It was difficult to say. Lisette was unfortunately absent—just set off upon a wedding-trip of a week or two's duration; and after mature deliberation, arising from an unacknowledged dread lest the young, shadowy terrors which the latter had excited in her own mind, should, were those letters submitted to the clearer, stronger, vision of others, assume tangible shape and substance, Adrienne Beaudésert determined upon showing them to her father and mother.

"How absurdly nervous you are, Adrienne!" said Madame Beaudésert, after running them over; "and how very silly and unfeminine indeed that precious poudre rosé, waste to be handsomely paid for, should have, from a wholesome regard for the law, does not choose to distinctly specify the nature of its demand. Voila tout, chere fille!"

"I hope so," said Adrienne, only partly reassured: "and yet, would that Lisette were here, that she could consult her affair at once. Madame Beaudésert remarked that Lisette would be back again in quite sufficient time to attend to such a trifling matter, and changed the conversation to other topics.

The unhappy maiden, not to be so consulted even by clever and zealous Lisette, as the following note, received the next day, too plainly showed:

"Mademoiselle Beaudésert.—I have already sent you three letters, which, though only signed by the initial letter of my surname, must have been perfectly intelligible to you, requesting an interview at an address indicated. That you have not condescended to reply to them is no ambiguity raised, peradventure upon the interpretation of your silence.

"Mademoiselle Beaudésert, you are not to be of a refusal to accord, in the only manner reward is possible, the love, the devotion—at what cost entered Mademoiselle Beaudésert to well knows—of that man? I must, then, for the last time, a strictly private interview with Mademoiselle Beaudésert, to take place within the next twenty-four hours. JULES DELPECH."

"What, woman—what mean those wild looks, this pale face?" gasped Adrienne, as her mother, having glanced over the letter, stood transfixed as by the stroke of a dagger. "Speak, or I—"

"My child—unfortunate, unhappy child," interrupted the mother, clasping, straining Adrienne in her embrace, with terrified, convulsive tenderness; "I see it, understand it all. It is the fate of whom you had the—the poudre rosé, means, O God!—means to assert that you are—you, Adrienne—you, sweet, sinless child—knowingly obtained—obtained, under the pretense of pouring it into a flower, to be given to the father in human, such things be!"

"What things?" exclaimed Clarisse. "Speak, mother. You are killing Adrienne."

But—but Adrienne obtained a drug of him who—to shorten the life of Madame de Vautrey!"

With those words the flame-crested serpent leaped at Adrienne's throat, and stung her to the heart. It was long before the distracted mother and sister could recall her to consciousness, and to what consciousness when succeeded! What did she think, that she, Adrienne Beaudésert, was the murderess of her father's and benefactress's, for, though not, blessed be God! in purpose—that she had her life, soul, (without fear of bitter consequence) the splendid position which had so suddenly been opened to her by her father's death, and which was now closed against her by the stern, unrelenting decree of the abbé Morlaix, that she was to be cast forth upon the world, to be spurned by her mother and her kindred, to be pointed at by the finger of scorn, to be overwhelmed with the ignominy of a public trial, and, perhaps, to die the death of a felon?

Such were the thoughts that, for a time, overwhelmed the unhappy girl, and, when she was sufficiently recovered to be capable of reflection, she was left alone, for Madame Beaudésert and Clarisse had hastened to the abbé Morlaix, to implore his counsel and assistance.

"Alone, then, I am to be alone," said Adrienne, with a wild, bitter laugh, as she rose from the floor, on which she had fallen, and paced the room, "alone, as I have been from my childhood, and shall be to the end. Alone, then, be it! Let me not, in the hour of my desolation, be guilty of the sin of self-murder, but, rather, let me live, that I may suffer, and, in suffering, expiate the crime of which I am innocent!"

Such was the resolve of the unhappy girl, when, after a few hours' solitude men, and, all too late, find Dulpech's assertions confirmed! Impossible—utterly impossible to incur that tremendous risk—to desperately stake character, life, the innocent life of her child, upon that fearful issue!

Finally—for the suggestions of unreasoning fear prevailed, and Adrienne Beaudésert was at last subdued—terrorized into consenting to a compromise, by which it was settled that the civil and legally binding form of marriage was to be gone through by her and Dulpech—the blessing of the Church, unessential to the validity of the contract, she would not ask for such constrained, unnatural ways—accordingly after the civil rite, and in accordance with the provisions of a solemn instrument signed, sealed, and attested beforehand, the nominal wife and husband were to separate and remain strangers to each other forever. Adrienne—till such time as arrangements could be made, without attracting too much public attention, for her seclusion for life in a convent—was to inhabit her relatives one wing of the château—the Dulpechs the other; and the disposition of the property was settled by the same instrument, which Jules Dulpech drew up in imposing wordy form. It was formally executed, and the civil marriage, at a neighboring should take place on that day but next night.

In the mean time, it had been industriously understood that the visitation of Mademoiselle Beaudésert, the anxiety and consternation observable in the demeanor of her mother and sister were caused by the thwarted but obstinate determination of the young lady to wed one so far beneath her in station as Paul Dulpech, with whom, it was stated, she had all along been upon terms of secret love-intelligence—one not to be subjected to her by any means, appointing a private interview, had been seen by Madame Sabin, a most respectable person—and was Madame Sabin, and a housewifing; and her inquisitive, affectionate recognition of the elder Delpech amidst the crowd in the Church of the Assumption at her father's funeral, was cited as corroborative proof, if any were wanting, of the truth of the general statement—which had gained strength and intensity with every day of her life! Scarcely any thing else would any one be sure, in the world of or written about by the gossips in the vicinage of the Château d'Em; and it thus fell out that Madame Claude Simonin, at Lisette, as I may continue to call her, heard, in Paris, of the astounding marriage on the very day when the intelligence reached M. Morlaix; the immediate result being that Lisette and her husband, and the sable one's new finery returned to the house of the Lyon diligence, and were fellow, and exceedingly communicative, passengers with Monsieur Morlaix.

Instantly upon reaching the Château d'Em, M. Morlaix demanded an audience of Mademoiselle Beaudésert. It was promptly refused, in accordance with an understanding come to with the Delpechs; and this refusal reached the ears of the extract from Madame and Clarisse Beaudésert that Adrienne was determined upon the marriage, and would not suffer herself to be importuned upon the subject. M. Morlaix had next recourse to the lawyer, with equally unsatisfactory result—the mother's consent, he was informed, being quite sufficient satisfaction of legal requirements. And from the same cause, unconscious in her efforts to obtain speech of her former mistress, were Lisette's ferociously enraged threnot. But what to the purpose could be effected even by her sharp eyes and sharper tongue? She did not know, by what hook even to guess at the true motives prompting Mademoiselle Beaudésert's sudden and fatal decision. She, however, quickly undeceived good Madame Sabin, wife of the medical gentleman who attended Madame by virtue of her last illness, as to the note supposed to have been addressed to Paul Dulpech by Adrienne Beaudésert, containing the shame and ceaseless iteration, that that was her own scheming handiwork. Lisette, moreover, loudly proclaimed her determination to see justice plein à Dieu, at the Hôtel de Ville, and have cause conservation, immediately before the abominable ceremony was proceeded with.

The affair were the same menacing aspect on the afternoon of the preceding day, when Lisette was to witness the successful consummation of the Delpech conspiracy. It was the month of December, and growing so dark that Adrienne Beaudésert, still prostrate as well in body as in mind, could no longer read the contents of the document she had, been drawn up and signed by the contracting parties, and with the same persusing, and never expecting, in order to more completely satisfy herself that its clauses had been so plainly framed that there could be no after-denial of their import and meaning. Madame and Clarisse Beaudésert were present; and the latter, more by word of breaking the silence by saying something than influenced by any serious apprehension, said:

"I suppose, dear Adrienne, that the condition of immediate separation, conceded and subscribed to by those high-born Delpechs, is one of necessity, by legally inforced?"

Lightning could not leap at the remark from Adrienne darkened heavy eyes, and she glared at Clarisse as if the words had stabbed her. Mastering herself, she turned and hid her face in the pillows of the couch upon which she was reclining, was soon apparently asleep; and Madame Beaudésert withdrew with Clarisse upon tiptoe. They were no sooner gone than Adrienne started up, made her way only to the library, and, before the Lyon directory, made a memorandum with her pencil, and then ringing the bell, desired the unswering servant to have a close carriage in waiting at the back entrance to the château within ten minutes.

"La Rue St. Martin, Numéro 19—do you know it? The residence of M. l'Avocat Dufresne?" said Mademoiselle Beaudésert, in answer to the questioning bow of the coachman; and was immediately driven off.

M. l'Avocat Dufresne's new and interesting client was so thickly veiled and muffled up that, had she been personally known to him, he would have failed to recognize her, as she placed a heavy fee upon the table, and in a low, trembling voice recited the conditions of the signed accord, suppressing names, of course, and asked if such a process-tract could be inforced against the possible opposition of the husband.

"Certainly not, mademoiselle. An accord, stipulating that a husband shall not be a husband, is not worth the paper it is written upon. That, then, is no doubt, very well known to some, at least, of the high-born Delpechs described by the accord—"

"Thank you, monsieur; that is all I require to know."

Adrienne's mind was made up from that moment, nor did she feel the slightest trepidation as to the course she would follow. And her whole-sooner it might; to a shameful death, there could be little doubt, for the bullied Delpechs would, in their rage, be sure to denounce her instead of criminal complicity in their dreadful crime; and circumstances would, it was almost certain, arise declaring from herself, give color and coherence to all they said. For all that, she would, and she exulted to think it was still possible to say she would now do her duty, leaving the result to God.

Adrienne spent the late that night, busily occupied in writing; slept soundly the first time for many days; and rising with the dawn, sent her packet of letters, addressed to Dulpech, to the Rue Abbé Morlaix. The three ladies breakfasted as usual in Adrienne's chamber; and Madame and Clarisse Beaudésert were both struck—shocked, almost, by the cheerfulness visible in the aspect of the suppressed trifle, in that which they had seen the morning. Little, however, was said, and that little was relative to the matter presently unavoidably upon their minds, till a message was brought, announcing that the Messieurs Delpech were arrived, and waiting in the salon. Then, to the last determined, I should state, with the municipal authorities, that, in consideration of Mademoiselle Beaudésert's delicate state of health, the marriage formalities should be gone through at the château.

Madame Beaudésert, Clarisse, and Adrienne, trembling in every limb with terror and horror, obeyed the imperial summons; Adrienne promising to follow almost immediately. They found the two Delpechs, as stated, in the grand salon, both evidently in a state of the most excited preparation—the father more especially; and a moment after their own entrance, Jules Dulpech, the bridegroom and her husband, came in from a further door. No sooner did Jules Delpech perceive the last comer, than, surprised by the sight, he started back from the door by which he had entered, with the apparent purpose of retreating. Adrienne paused to fix to his thereby greatly increased consternation, that it was locked on the outside! "What can all this mean?" he muttered, as he hurried over, and stood out in large drops upon his forehead, as he again, profane, Protestant though he was, impressed by the silent entrance of Adrienne Beaudésert, who, pale, calm, lustrous as Parian marble, took a seat between her and Madame Delpech, and made her difficult to interpret the expression of Lisette's flushed features? "What can all this mean?" the sternly countenance was unmistakably grave, earnest, solemn.

"What is the purport of all this dumb show?" exclaimed the younger Delpech, assuming, with some success, a tone of defiance. "Have you ren the municipal officials? A priest is not required at these espousals?"

"Not that I see no espousals," replied the adult, "between you, Paul Delpech, and Adrienne Beaudésert, now my cousin, Jules."

His! Does, then, Mademoiselle Beaudésert dare—dare, I say, refuse to ratify her promise?"

"She does not refuse—does not refuse to do so, the peril, you know, of her life. I know all, and from her."

This announcement elicited cries of terror and dismay from Madame and Clarisse Beaudésert; Paul Dulpech changed to a bitter whiteness, and his fear-smeared father again distractedly essayed to open the door, close which he had remained standing. Adrienne alone was calm, unmoved; but as for Lisette, she was only kept from instantly flying to denounce by a heavy, threatening gesture from the sable and her husband's eager remonstrance: "Your denunciation, madame, however thy turn will come presently, never fear!"

"It appears," resumed M. Morlaix, "from the papers I have in my hand, that Jules and Paul Delpech, across Adrienne Beaudésert of having obtained, by means of a forged letter, for the occasion, poudre roi, by which she destroyed the life of her aged relative, Madame de Vaulpré, of Lyon."

"First, Monsieur l'Abbé," exclaimed Paul Delpech, whose courage was evidently increased by drink, early as it was, "tell us by what right or authority you presume to ask such insolent questions?"

"I ask them in order to ascertain, before invoking justice, whether it be necessary to act in an invention."

"Who shall say nothing," hastily interposed Delpech, forestalling his son's reply. He fancied the abbé was desirous of hushing up the matter, and thereby relieving Mademoiselle Beaudésert's conscience of the burden that oppressed it. This thought gave him momentary courage.

"Are you aware that the examination of the gallows awaits those who, for the sake of obtaining some pecuniary advantage, plot a cool-and-cruel false accusations?"

"Prove any accusation we have made to be false," retorted Paul Delpech; "and let my assure you, Monsieur l'Abbé, that you are playing with the life of your fair protégée. We should not, in any case, go to the scaffold alone, take my word for it."

"That is not so certain," replied the abbé, with unmoved sternness. "Your wicked design may have miscarried; in fact, it did miscarry—in proof whereof, I have to inform you, that a post-mortem examination, performed, at my instance, within twenty-four hours of death, clearly established the fact that Madame de Vaulpré died from natural causes only."

A cry, a shout, a scream of women echoed those blessed words: Adrienne was in a moment clinging to the reverend speaker's knees; Madame Beaudésert seemed inclined to cast herself into his arms; Lisette, in a state of intense inflammation, shook her little fists at the cowering Delpechs, preventing only from transforming her threats into deeds by the restraining hand of her husband, and iterated, "Dunot—disconcert, Lisette; it will be thy turn presently, you know!"

"Calm yourself, my child," said the abbé, as soon as he could make himself heard, and raising Adrienne, "and you, Madame Beaudésert; the end of this matter is not yet."

Paul Dulpech, stunned, overborne for a while, reassumed, by a violent effort, his previous effrontery, and said, in a sneering tone: "Then, Monsieur l'Abbé, your accusation, which you shall fully considered, the poudre roi was but an innocent, harmless powder after all; have it, so, if you will—and now, nos pire, you and I may as well leave this good company—for a time."

"Not a time, if you please; your intention may I repeat, have been evil enough—the poudre roi you so facetiously, as a pleasantry, that is quite another question, upon which Madame Claude Simonin here can throw some light."

"I?" cried Lisette, "I?" shouted Claude; "now look to yourselves."

"Vraiment, Monsieur l'avocat Lisette; "this what I have to say. For certain reasons I had come to entertain strong suspicions of Messieurs Delpech, and, in order to put them to proof, as I did, the packet of poudre roi, nicely sealed up, from Paul Delpech to Lisette, my gift, then had persuaded thy unsuspecting young mistress to have secret dealings with two good-for-nothings—if there be any in the world—and, in short, to receive, in an honest girl, to see no harm comes of it. Why leaves you not to the law, and to Lisette, the poudre roi? Not, too, Lisette; and there, for, to avoid all chance of evil, keep the sealed packet carefully, and, as I have said, remember, I asks thee for the magical poudre roi, give her instead—well, what you try?—some of her own red dentifrice.' Ha! ha! Messieurs les Empoisonneurs, that disarranges your fine plans, does it? And look you, Monsieur l'Abbé, I, Claude, fumbling over with exultation!—here is your precious packet, Delpechs, unopened. Take, give it me! and I hope, for your sakes, it will be found enough to poison a thousand horses!"

The consternation with which this speech must be left to the imagination, as well as Claude's obstreperous exultation at having outwitted.

"There is nothing in the packet," said the elder Delpech, hoarsely, "nothing but bean-flour. Let us go, Jules."

"That fact must be first ascertained," replied the abbé, "and you will be sent for to your bedchateau. And now, dear child, and you, my friends, let us retire, and return God thanks for this great deliverance."

The poudre roi was nothing but colored bean-flour; the Delpechs were, nevertheless, prosecuted for the conspiracy, and sentenced to severe punishments. Of the further domestic history of the distinguished Beaudésert family mixed in the south of France, of which the foregoing narrative supplies a hastily-sketched outline, I find the following extract from the French journals, wherein I have read of two marriages, and, I think, five births, but not, as yet, one dying, as having occurred among the descendants of the Beaudéserts.

WINTER NIGHT.

BY E. H. STODDARD.

It is a cold winter night,
And the stilly earth is white
With the blowing of the lilies of the snow!
I hear it wail and sigh
With the roses sunmer shed,
But the roses died with summer long ago!

I'll sing a song of Spring
In the jolly days of June,
And we danced above the garden in the light
Of her Fetzenzie's eyes,
And our hearts are dark, and dumb,
As the bubble o'er the embers here tonight!

PARIS, January 18, 1859.

TEN weeks come quickly round, but so quickly as events of interest in this wonderful city, where every day seems to bring something of excitement, even to the most jaded of pleasure-seekers. Rumors of war, discoveries of plots, threats of insurrection—panic and hunger threatening—have one and all risen in the funds because the King said that"—rise in the funds because the King said that"—each hour brings its quota of excitement, and they will not, perhaps, contradict you, if you tell them that Paris is the city of sensations.

It is, no doubt, from this cause that those accustomed to live in Paris find it so difficult to take pleasure in any other abode. This is as remarkable in strangers as in the native born population. Rumors of war, discoveries of plots, threats of insurrection—panic and hunger threatening—have never said that "rise in the funds because the King said that"—each hour bring its quota of excitement, they will not, perhaps, contradict you, if you tell them that Paris is the city of sensations.

It is, no doubt, from this cause that those accustomed to live in Paris find it so difficult to take pleasure in any other abode. This is as remarkable in strangers as in the native born population, who, from the highest to the lowest, look upon all beyond its limits as a vast desert of ennui and discomfort. It is in vain to speak to one of these of life elsewhere as agreeable, or commodious, or luxurious. They will not, perhaps, contradict you, but they will reply with an incredulous shrug of the shoulders, and a "C'est possible?" which is even more provoking. They are confirmed in these ideas by the eagerness with which Paris is sought, not only by the "savage" Americans (that, perhaps, they would not think so much of), nor even the Russian princes should, for its attractions, quit their frozen homes and imperfect civilization; but there is Milor Anglais, with his fabulous wealth, his palaces and his parks, his hunters and his hounds, and his boundless stables, and all to the government of his country! The Parisian sees all these relinquished for an existence here comparatively but trifling—for an existence which, in spite of a suspicion—a kind carriage, and three or four servants, in place of a cabriolet and a "bonne à tout faire," at Paris can always also well, hear the best music, see the best acting, and learn the earliest intelligence of the world's doings, which have a much value for all the great European family.

The incident that I started with, the visit of one of the Emperor's remark to the Austrian Embassador, has, as you will see, borne much fruit in newspaper articles, and I suppose it is all in die all sorts. The belief in inevitable war is every day gaining ground, and it is a pitiful sight to those who had accustomed themselves to hope that the world had grown too wise for the recurrence of these terrible evils—to see how little the public right is all we can say—if there is any right in such evil as war—to prudence and bloodshed.

To cement this alliance between France and Sardinia there is to be a marriage, and we may say a victim, since the bridegroom is only fifteen years of age, and her destined husband, Prince Napoleon, is considerably her senior. The Prince is, by years older, and of well-known profligate habits and tastes; and yet, such so he is, he has not set the Tuvia, but has received his appointment from the King, her father's hand. One piece a highly-descriptive of the manner in which matches like these can be so little in unison with her early ideas, and where what she has been accustomed to regard as the highest virtues are held up to scorn, was the pieces over her adopted family) her hereditary rights, was that her own mother was not considered.

As usual, political agitation only seems to accelerate the impulse for social amusement, and we are now in the full tide of gayety—carnival—and in the various circles of Paris they are dancing and feasting, and also revelling in riot and wantonness.

I have been led, of late particularly, to associate the world around me with the Carnival generally, for, a short time ago, a hearty and heartfelt letter, from an esteemed friend, introduced to my acquaintance a young American gentleman, to whom I was entreated to serve as guide and Mentor in the gaities and pleasures of Paris, which I was but always sorry to receive such a request, as I know the hopelessness of ever doing what is to be seen intended. All I can do is to endeavor, by presentation into refined and agreeable society, to neutralize the mischievous influences of life in its most vicious spirit, here spreads in the path of the novice. In the case of the young American youth who has passed through a collegiate course at home, or resided, for the same period of time, in any of our large cities, he has had his full share of secrets of vice or temptation; but it is not in this that the danger lies, and it is that initiation into wrong, which seems the portal by which all must enter into the world, but it is the habit of mind induced by such knowledge, and which, built upon the pursuit of pleasure, without any appreciation of its nature, leads from the precipice of morality and right. It is this that makes the great evil of Paris to all, but to the young and pliant of principle it has a fearful contagion indeed. How often have I witnessed this in the years that I have lived here! I have seen a warm young heart under the infatuation of thus sending their sons from home, in the idea of their gaining the polish and enlightenment of Paris, lose all its early genuine studies for which there is, indeed, here every facility. Absorbed in the pursuit of pleasure and in the claims of amusement, the fascinations of wickedness.

I went immediately to pay a visit, at his hotel, to my young friend, whom I shall call Frank—a name that suits his frank, handsome face better than his own. I found a tall, well-made, good-looking fellow of one-and-twenty, unexceptionable in manner and address, and with a fine intellect, and I knew that his liberal parents had allotted for all his pocket-money a large and even exaggerated allowance. I proposed establishing him at once in comfortable lodgings, where the concierge would see to his coffee and tub—and was accomplished. We dined together, and had much conversation, which I endeavored, upon my part, to make as edifying and as full of warning as I thought judicious. The very next evening we went together to the Opera Comique, and I pointed out to him all individuals of note and interest, and gave him a slight sketch about every body and every thing, delighted to have a companion whose feelings seemed so fresh in their sense of enjoyment and whose eyes and ears were so keenly and gratefully into an open vacant box au premier, Mademoiselle Jules and her mother were the sole occupants of the house flowers. An almost imperceptible raising of the eyebrow, and a slight turn of the head, showed me we were seated, and the deep blush of pleasure which mantled in Frank's handsome face at her bow of recognition, and the smile with which she observer like myself to have known that Frank had been the donor of opera-box and bouquet to Mademoiselle Julia, even without the confirmatory circumstance of his avoidance of asking me, as in any case alone, who was the pretty lady so conspicuous alone in her opera-box? These, it may be, were slight indications, but sufficient to mortify me with the conviction that my young friend had already fallen into the hands of one of the most dangerous and accomplished Sirenes of Paris, and what could I do to prevent this?

I have since introduced Frank into several houses who receive once or twice a week. The amiable Duchesse de B—— gave me that permission; and there he made the acquaintance of Madame de L—— and her daughters, of whom the eldest would be considered beautiful in any country. Fair, with lovely eyes and hair, and exquisite mouth and teeth, Mademoiselle de L—— only has the name and grace of a French girl—which she is, however, on her father's side; but she has been brought up more a l'Anglaise, and speaks that language perfectly. Though so charming and attractive she is one-and-twenty, and still Mademoiselle, which is accounted for by her being one of five children, and with little fortune, which alone leads to matrimonial seeking in France.

To accompany Frank I went, too, to the ball last evening at the Tuileries. It was, as usual, very crowded, but an interesting and brilliant scene. The Empress was lovely, in a white tulle dress, of several skirts, simply decorated with bows of ribbon, in green, white, and red—which, I was told, were the colors of Sardinia, and worn in honor of the marriage. This marriage was the subject of discourse and discussion. But I have exhausted my allotted space, and must bid you adieu.

THE BELL-RINGERS OF SEVILLE.

EVERY one has, at some time or other, witnessed the process of ringing large church-bells in our American cities. The work is generally done with the aid of long ropes depending from the bell or the tongue. In Seville, Spain, it seems the office of a bell-ringer is one of much more peril and adventure. The bell-ringer, as shown in the accompanying illustration, clings to the bell, and is swung by his rope quite out of the belfry into the air. If he loses his hold, he may say his prayers, and they must be short. The bravest bell-ringers are they who can hold on longest and swing the furthest from the bell.

THE BELL-RINGERS OF SEVILLE.

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

FALL AND WINTER MANAGEMENT OF HEAVY SOILS.

PRACTICE has shown the great value of ridging and back-furrowing heavy soils in the fall, to be acted on by the freezings and thawings of winter, and the passage of air through them. While some know the value of this treatment there are many who pay little attention to it. In the interior of the country it is quite usual, particularly in new places, for farmers to have a kitchen garden-patch near the dwelling-house, cut off from a field, perhaps by a mere landmark, not surrounded by a fence on all sides, which might possibly interfere with the use of tools, how good soever for the purposes of cultivation, if drawn by horses or oxen. It is greatly desirable to ridge and back-furrow such soils if of a heavy character. On extensive farms there may be many pieces naturally adapted to the growing of vegetables, but distance may cause them to be inconvenient. Some soils are so light and blowy as to be injured by fall plowing; these are benefited by being rolled rather than plowed. The application of muck, well prepared by the salt and lime mixture, will make them more compact and retentive of manures. The carbonaceous matter of the muck is a great absorbent of gases, and all soluble substances liberated during decay. The growing of a clover crop and plowing it under is another mode of adding carbonaceous matter to the soil, and the rationale of whose action was referred to in our article of last week on wheat. In this case time is an important element. It will, therefore, be seen that the source from which carbon is obtained, whether from lowlands or the atmosphere, to be profitable must vary with the facilities for getting muck at small cost, and the value of the land to the farmer for growing special crops. In general farming, if the labor to obtain the muck is large, and that clover as a crop is desirable, the latter will in most cases be best; but the market gardener cultivating a smaller quantity of land, which from an active succession of crops (sold in cities at large prices) knows no rest, could not wait for a clover crop, because during the time necessary for it to grow one or more crops of vegetables of perhaps twenty times more money value could be produced. It would, therefore, be better for him to get carbonaceous matter in the form of muck, river deposits, woods' mould, etc., and treat them with the salt and lime mixture, which has been used to so much advantage in high farming. The owners of light land will do well to consider these hints seriously. The writer speaks from practical knowledge, both as regards mechanical condition and fertility, consequent on the proper application of muck, and the plowing in of clover into soil not already containing enough of carbon. On clay farms the plowing in of long manures will loosen the soil and prevent it from compacting. Thus treated, the air can circulate more freely through it, the freezings and thawings of winter disintegrate the particles, the oxydizing influence of the atmosphere liberates food, which assists the mechanical action of long manures in making it friable, adding to its available fertility, and causing it forever after to be morsomely worked. There will be no loss from manures well plowed in, by their elements during decay passing into the atmosphere, because clay, like carbon, has the power of absorbing and retaining the results of decomposition, and of liberating them to plants only. This practice is especially applicable to clay farms not furnished with proper sheds to protect manures, which, by this system, are carted, spread on the soil, and plowed in, thus saving the labor of doing it in early spring, when the preparation of land for other crops is pressing—always bearing in mind the mechanical advantages to the soil, impossibility of loss by wastage, washings by rains, and evaporation. The caring of much manure in spring to great distances, as in the case of large farms, and stables inconveniently located, unless a farmer have plenty of teams in fine working order, will prevent him from advancing rapidly in sowing and planting. After-treatment, however good, will not compensate for the putting in of crops at a late date. They will not have time to grow.

The foregoing facts must suggest to the reader the advantages to be derived from the ridge and back-furrow system, treated in the early part of the article. The manure spread broadcast over the surface of the soil will be forced to occupy the centre of A, Aerial Ridge, which, in the course of the day, will cause a continuous alteration of figure in the nature of the ridge, permitting the openings and drawings to disintegrate and alter the nature, as it is technically termed, of the clay.

Any leaching from this manure will be received in the deep furrows alongside, and absorbed by the loose earth at the base of the ridge; and as the conditions described will here be availed of, the continued change of figure admitting new quantities of atmosphere to circulate through the cracked surfaces of the ridges; redundant quantities of moisture during heavy rains may pass off through the furrow gutters without washing away the pent up manure. In early spring these ridges should be split by a two-any plow, and a subsoiling or trenching will then insure a thorough admixture of the manure with the underlaid soil; and the after cultivation will often render a clay soil capable of being used for such purposes as it is in former condition it could not have been applied to. A clay loam so treated, from its superior power to retain moisture, would yield by plants, in most seasons, than lighter soils; and if in the spring, before the splitting of the ridges, a Mapes's animal lifting plow be passed through the intervening furrows, so as to deeply disintegrate the soil, which can not be so well done after any other cultivation, and a whole average depth will be materially increased. In some soils this may be done to the depth of two, disturbing the clays, and when so done the leaching may be received in the subsoil cats, and thus a permanency of fertility to a great extent will be secured.

Those who have made the mistake of summer plowing a clay soil when too wet, and thus injuring its full power of fertility for years by such error, will have understood the principles which arises from ridging and back furrowing; for after such treatment, thoroughly performed, it will be a nearly earlier in spring and later in the fall for any manipulation it may require.

Mulching is of great value in winter to many crops, and even on soils not producing any thing. Some farmers cover the borders of their beds of wheat; they are killed by the frost, and act as a mulch, or protection, to the young plants. In the kitchen and fruit garden mulching is of great value; plants which, in its absence, would with difficulty survive the winter. Pear-trees should not be so treated until they begin to drop their leaves, also the presence of the mulch before the tree goes into the normal state will cause it to take up large quantities of moisture which, if frozen between the wood and the bark, will produce winter-killing. The removal of the summer mulch late in September will arrest growth, and the restoration of it on the approach of winter will cause a second growth in spring, and prevent the injuries of winter-blight.

THE MORTARA STORY OUT-DONE.

THE following story has been communicated to the London Morning Chronicle by a "Protestant Traveller":

"A young woman, a native of England, a lady's maid, respectably connected, and having received a competent knowledge of the French and Italian languages, was seduced by a young Neapolitan nobleman, under peculiarly aggravated circumstances. For some months the affair remained a secret. Eventually, to hide her dishonor, she was forced to leave her situation, and take up her abode in an obscure part of Naples. In process of time she was delivered of a strong and healthy child. Some of the people residing in the same house informed the police of the circumstance, and they went to the curé of the parish in which her habitation was found, and told him that a foreigner had been delivered of a child who belonged to him to baptise it. The curé sent his vicar, who quickly made the woman's room crowded with all the usual attendants, and a rabble of women and children at the back. The young woman patiently declined his assistance, and said that, as she was a Protestant, she naturally wished her child to be baptised by a Protestant minister. The vicar told her that could not be allowed, and that he came with positive orders to baptise the child as one a Christian of the child. Seeing she would not yield, the vicar got angry and made use of hard and indecorous expressions. On the mother of her he intimated that she would soon have a visit from the curé and the police. The woman, the next day, the curé, accompanied by his vicar, visited the young woman, and persuaded her in like manner on the subject of the baptism of her child, when she indignantly expressed her abhorrence of their oppressive behavior, and declared her steadfast determination not to have it made a Papist of. Again and again the curé demanded, with a menacing, yet inquiring glance, that from consent to have her child made a Christian. Firmly and steadily, in a mild voice, but with a decision that could not be mistaken, the young woman replied, 'No!' The curé's face became perfectly demoniacal in its expression, as he poured forth a torrent of abuse and invective against the obstinate heretic, as he was pleased to call her; and such was his ungovernable passion that he raised his hand as if to strike, a gesture which he regarded with disdain, as she turned back from him.

"There was something unutterably horrible and cruel, unfeeling and unmanly, in this brutal outrage on a poor suffering female so soon after her confinement. There she lay almost convulsed with distress, while the blood flushed painfully to the otherwise colorless cheek. The involuntary look of horror, fright, and aversion with which she regarded these ferocious ecclesiastics did not escape the eye of the curé. He frowned terribly, and raved and stormed. Involuntarily she clasped her babe closer to her bosom, and arose instantly to her feet. This persecution continued fiercer and fiercer every succeeding day; still the woman was inflexible. At length, when the curé saw that every love, threatened to turn her out of the house, and leave her to perish, unless she would have the child up to his care. The woman gave a sudden start—she seemed stimulated for a few moments to an unnatural strength—with a determined look, she clutched nestle she drew herself up, and fixing a glance blazing with a fever up on the curé, fiercely reproached him for his vile and brutal conduct, informed him she did not fear a prison, and would never yield to his demands. The curé's mercenary spirit was excited every attempt to take the child from her; and minister her aid to overcome her, even in sleep her arms encircled it with an unrelaxing clasp, as if she could not even then be beguiled into its surrender. These stories were at last removed from day to day for several successive days, and the curé, in a fit of rage, one morning, in a paroxysm of excitement and worry, terror and alarm, and the sudden and strength to which she had been subjected, soon began to exhibit it more decided manner their effects on this poor victim of ecclesiastical tyranny and violence. The paroxysms of delirium came on more frequently, and lasted longer. Her mind began to give way. Her nutriment which nature had supplied became so changed that the infant rapidly sank from want of proper sustenance.

"With deep anguish of heart the poor woman saw her child fading away before her eyes. Finally, Her very heart bled within her for the poor sufferer. Gradually, the child's breath ceased, and the cold, clutched her to her bosom with all her remaining strength, and as they came here to force her she gave is one wild embrace. The real presence of distress, the sight of a mother's agony, and the trembling human hand, the despairing appeal of helpless agony, had no power to move the pitiless hearts of these monsters. Confident that they had a foot to the arms of the sage femme, the curé turned every one out of the room, and, regardless of the frantic grief of the poor unhappy mother, locked the door and put the key in his pocket. Though exhausted by suffering, fatigue, and fear, the poor hapless mother, stung to madness and despair by the crushing weight of her misfortunes, and quite overwhelmed by the avalanche of cruelty and wrong which had fallen upon her, sprang from the bed, tore the barrell against the door, exclaiming 'O my child! my child!' None of the people assisted by this violent attempt to escape, but they affected or showed any signs of sympathy or pity. On the contrary, she was called to endure the bitterest taunts, and the bitterest jeers of these followers of the priests.

"Possibly owing to remorse, and dreading consequences should the abduction of the child prove fatal to the mother in her present debilitated state, the curé became latent again. Finally, after remaining within her heart, the sage femme hesitated, and then refused to assist the curé further. Again her remonstrances and entreaties eventually prevailed on the savage curé to open the door, in order that the sage femme, whose friendly services she had attracted a crowd about the house. The victim of this brutal persecution was found in a state of total insensibility on the bed; she tried once or twice to speak, her lips moved, but there was no sound; her eyes were fixed and glassy, her breast heaving, and her head on her pillow, and covered her face. The dying ecstasy of the mother was observed by the priests went through the ceremony of baptizing her child. 'Was not the lot of the poor creature here enough without her future punishment?' he said? Will might she say in her anguish, 'My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?' and then that are at ease, and with the contempt of the priests.

"But the soul of the poor little babe was more than half loosed from its earthly bonds, and died in a few minutes after the baptism of the murdered child. But no tears bedewed the heart-broken eyes of her form—the shock had passed too straight through the heart for cry or tear. Without a word consulting her, it was hurried away and buried according to the fashion of the Papal Church. All the noise and bustle incidental to the removal of the body struck dreamingly on her bewildered ear —and her poor, dumb-stricken heart had neither cry nor tear to show for its utter misery.

"The morning after this tragical and scandalous scene the curé sent in his demand for payment, which, of course, the women refused to satisfy; and he was obliged to leave the house in search again next morning and doubled his demand."

CHESS CHRONICLE.

BY C. H. STANLEY.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

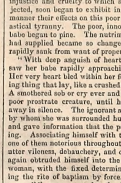
E. P. The report is true that Mr. Morphy has expressed his intention to play twenty games, simultaneously, blindfold; and, too, against that number of the strong men as Paris can produce. Such copists are quite as incomprehensible to us perhaps more so, as to the mental Chess lyre. Your suggested solutions, we think, will be found correct. Thanks. Always glad to hear from you. For this week you must excuse us from publishing the Problem, as the engraver of the Problem will be absent a week from this city, so that but his letters addressed as last will always meet attention.—S. W. H. Augusta.—It is not even ordered by the game is sold, and the proper course is to resell the same. All such matters, by-the-way, are left to general others which we this week are called upon to answer, are duly provided for in the Laws of the Game as published in nearly every elementary work. — G. B. Charlotte, and C. Williamsburg. The blue can not move to a square commanded by an adverse piece, and the King and pawn are left in the same fix.—J. W. Quebec (Lambertville). You may have nine pieces on the board, provided you have not more than eight each.—B. (Philadelphia). The final move referred to have been mistaken. If not too much trouble, send duplicates; but shall appear without fail next week.

J. L. R. is a fact that Mr. P. Morphy has offered to play a match with any adversary in the state of Texas and more; which earlist, however, was not accepted. Her Authority appears to consider that he (P. M.) could hold his own at such odds against any player living. Her is ought to know. Since the cessation of their illness match, Messrs. Anderson and Morphy have played six more games, of which the former gentleman succeeded in winning but one.

PROBLEM XV.

BY J. L. R.

BLACK.



WHITE.

White to play and checkmate in four moves.

The following well-contested game is contributed by our correspondent "Jonathan," and, as the reader will likewise his, and are decidedly to the point; but, at a glance, we see that was the mate in six moves. The reader, however, that it is there, and, for the present, leave Mr. Jacobus to the tender mercies of our critical readers:

(Sicilian Opening.)

WHITE (Mr. J.)	BLACK (Mr. R.)
1 P to K 4	P to Q B 4
2 P to Q 4	P takes P
3 Q takes P (d)	P to K 3 (e)
4 Q to K 5	Q to Q B 3
5 Kt to Q B 3	P to Q 4
6 P to K B 3	P to K Kt 3
7 K Kt to Q 2	B to K Kt 2
8 Q to K 3	Kt to K B 3
9 Q Kt to B 3	Castles
10. Castles	Q to K 2
11 R to K sq	Kt to K B 4
12 P to K B 4 (b)	Q takes Q Kt P
13. K B takes Kt	Q takes Q Kt P
14 Q Kt takes Q P	B P takes Kt
15. K B takes B	Q R takes B
16 Q to K B 3	Q to Q B 3 (f)
17 Q to K Kt 3	Kt to Q 2
18 Kt to Q 4	Kt to Q B sq
19 Q to K B 3	Q R to Q B sq
20 P to K B 3 (?)	Q R to Q B 5
21 Q to Q 3	Q to Q Kt 3
22. Q takes Q P	Kt takes R
23. P takes Kt	Q takes P
24. P to K 6 (g)	P to Q Kt 5 (h)
25. P takes P (ch)	K takes P (ch)

And Black mates in six moves.

NOTES.

(a) If Kt to B 3, followed by K 2 to Q 2 d, would perhaps be more advisable.

(b) Intending, if White played Kt to Q 5, to exchange Kts, and then to play P to K 4.

(c) Should have preferred to take the B, and afterward move Q to Q B 3.

(d) The usual analogy of the K pawn for the adverse Q P.

(e) Worse than useless. Kt to Q sq was the move.

(f) A very necessary move.

(g) The winning move. If—

1. Q takes Q	Q to Q Kt 6
2. Q to K 3	Q to K 8 (ch)
3. K to Q 2	Q takes R

and White has the better game.

If	P takes P
24. Q takes P (ch), followed by Kt to Q 5, winning the R.

(h) Q to K 3 (ch) would be fatal.

(i) Q to Kt 3 (ch) would be fatal.

(k) Q to K 3 (ch), and mates next move.

If	K to Q Kt 6
25. P to Q 6, winning the R.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Saturday, Feb. 5, 1859.

The week ending to-day has been chiefly marked by unusual activity in the Stock Market of the past few days, part entries being quite as large as they used to be due. But the great expansion in 1857. We are not expecting as much, in consequence of the falling off in the demand for American Breadstuffs abroad; and the imposition of foreign goods and merchandize is excessive.

Money is decidedly more plentiful. Since our coal is now the standard millionaire rate for the best paper and call loans, and many are willing to take less than the amount advanced to secure. Exchange on England is firm at 10½ @ 11; all which indicates that specie can be easily obtained exported.

The rise in the value of money has affected injuriously the new loan and other stock securities. The new Treasury notes are at 98 @ 98½, and stocks generally are lower than they were last week. The most active transactions of the week was in Pacific Mail, Commodore Vanderbilt having secured a controlling interest. The Boards of the stock argue that even with an opposition they will continue to make money, as the Panama Railroad dividends; its enemies contend that the new opposition must be fatal to its success.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, Feb. 5, 1859.

THE Wholesale Trade has been quite active during the week for the leading kinds of Breadstuffs, parties having disagreed about prices, which, however, have ruled low and prices have favored buyers. . . . Provisions have been more unsettled, with a corresponding decline. Cotton has been in lively request, while Coffee, Teas, Sugars, and Molasses have been unchanged. Hides, Leather, Lumber, Naval Stores, Oils, Tobacco, Wool, Tallow, and Ashes, have been in moderate demand at former prices. . . . The Retail trade continues quite brisk for desirable styles of Dry Goods, Groceries, Hardware, Crockery, and Drugs, and the Clothing trade is actively inquired for. Prices are generally firm, and sellers are not disposed to realize higher rates. Freights have been in fair request, and have been very much reduced by heavy sales to early buyers. Wool mark, although purchased largely, closes at top of this class. The success of these has been very satisfactory, with very encouraging prospects ahead.

The value of the week's imports of Dry Goods has been $3,743,160 against $1,611,289 the same week last year. The imports since January 1 have been $14,256,706 against $6,677,000 the same time last year. The following memo in other commodities have not been productive of very remarkable results, as will be seen by a glance at the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Cotton.—The transactions last Wednesday were generally better supplied. Brown were in fair demand at a slight improvement in prices. . . . Bleached Goods were in limited request. . . . Yard Calicos were pretty freely purchased at firm rates. . . . Stamp and Lancaster attracted more attention, and were a shade dearer. . . . Delaine were in good demand and closed buoyant. . . . The reported receipts of Cotton during each of the last four weeks compare as follows:

Not long since a witness, Jones, was being cross-examined before Judge H——, of Mississippi. The witness was making some hard assertions, when the counsel on the opposite side asked him if he really believed what he said? He replied, "Yes, Sir-ree, Jist so." Whereupon Judge said, "Mr. Clerk, fine Mr. Jones five dollars for the rec, and five for the Bible."

A lady being asked the other day why she chose to lead a single life, replied, "Simply because I am not able to support a husband."

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Lime Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

8vo, Muslin, $3 50.

This Volume contains the Official Narrative of one of the most important Expeditions ever sent out by our Government. The vast region drained by the River La Plata and its tributaries was closed to the commerce of civilization by the rigid Colonial Laws of Spain, the civil feuds which followed the Independence, and the consequent restless policy of Rosas, the tyrant of Buenos Ayres. The Expedition, in 1853, ascended the River Parana, and of Uruguay, the affluents of the former, and the Argentine Confederation, via the Decree of August 26, 1852, declaring the waters of the Confederation free to the flags of all nations. Our Government was the first to avail itself of this decree. Early in 1853 the steamer Water Witch was placed under the command of Lieutenant Page, with instructions to explore the Rivers of La Plata, and report upon their navigability and adaptation to commerce. The present Volume contains the Narrative in connection with that military and intelligence, and has embodied the results of the whole Expedition. The experience described in the Narrative evinces an extent of 9000 miles of navigable waters, which, with the exception of the Mississippi and its tributaries, is unequaled in the World. The Paraguay alone was found to be navigable, at low water, by a steamer drawing nine feet, for more than 1000 miles from the ocean. The basin of La Plata is almost equal in extent to that of the Mississippi, and subject to the salubrity of climate and fertility of soil, while the head waters of the former approximate the Atlantic coast in excess of Brazil and Bolivia. The products of this region are almost identical with those of the United States. The population numbers scarcely one person to a square mile, and the resources of the country are undeveloped. Since the Argentine Confederation, the commerce of the River La Plata has become valuable, and is capable of immense and almost limitless increase.

Lieutenant Page's Narrative contains ample information respecting the soil, climate, and productions of the country, and the manners, habits, and customs of the people. An interesting and valuable account of the Jesuit Missions in La Plata is appended to the Narrative. The engravings comprise ten accurate Map of the Country prepared by the orders of our Government, Portraits of Rosas, Urquiza, and Lopez, and a few humorous Engravings of Scenery, Character, and Incident.

THE LAIRD OF NORLAW.
A Novel.
By the Author of "Margaret Maitland," "The Days of My Life," &c.
Illustrated. 8vo, Muslin, $1 00.

Happily the Author of "Margaret Maitland" is again upon her old ground—The Land of Burns. Her quaint old character and Scottish manners are the topics of her pen, and the Author of "Margaret Maitland" is one of the most popular writers of the day.

The author is one of the most truthful delineators of domestic life. The first portion of the story moves in a second, and often a thrill reading, and, like the novels of Sir Walter Scott, the interest deepens to the very last, to the greater the pleasure. We have very little hesitation in the marks of approbation favor which we put aside by the tales of Miss Edgeworth and Miss Austen, and the novels of Scott and Aubrey, and we think that this gifted lady's agreeable works of fiction.—Messenger.

A RECENT EVENT HAS SHOWN THE danger of local applications for the purpose of stopping coughs, when such have their origin in the second nature. Who is there that has not seen the most fatal consequences result from the application of a remedy for the cough at an inner, instead of an outer surface? Opiates have been long open? And when the lungs have been made the field of the ravages of consumption for months or years, it is equally dangerous, by the same astringent remedies, to shut off the cough which relieves the bowels are kept open daily until the system recovers from the change. Or some counter-irritant to the setting of the humors upon other parts, in the form of tumors or relief. Though inconvenient applications are not without danger at any time, yet it no way but when some natural outlet for the blood's impurities is closed by astringent remedies.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS open these natural outlets, or have a healthful influence upon the secretions, and relieve disease eradicated. Though innocent as bread, they are powerful aperients, and, if judicious, will relieve a cough as much by their use as by any other remedy. Sold by all druggists, by Mrs. Hayes, Brooklyn, and by Callender & Co., principal agents for the sale in Philadelphia.

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2 50 A YEAR.

[From the N. Y. Evening Post, Jan. 18, 1858.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.—In the number of this attractive and entertaining publication, issued during the last week, there are three articles which, taken in connection with two we shall presently notice, are surprised at the vast amount of information which they contain. Each one of these articles is a history of nearly all the political events of the year—there are simple illustrations of the progress which has made the granite of the Granite States, however, but profoundly instructive of its Lexington—the Granite State—and the Empire State—Kentucky, &c.—there are the records of jokes, new and old—the latest fashions are there—there are the most delicate revelations of contemporary men and things, of follies and of fashions—there is a complete history of the year, and within a single volume, and to be had for a song. It is the most remarkable publication of the day and generation, and in all the annals of the press of this country, or of any country, we do not remember, may be interested by it—the old and young, the grave and gay; the man of business, the child and the woman.

WILBOR'S COMPOUND OF PURE COD LIVER OIL AND LIME.

☞ A cure for Consumption, Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, General Debility, and all Scrofulous Diseases.

The proprietor has succeeded in combining Cod Liver Oil and Lime so perfectly that the taste of the Oil, which is so nauseous to persons generally, is entirely overcome, and it can be taken by the most delicate females with pleasure. And as regards the benefit of this article over the clear Oil, the following case by Professor STONE is sufficient to convince the most sceptical. The young lady was twenty-four years of age:

"HER case was one of confirmed phthisis, which had been progressing to terminate fatally in the course of a few months. The upper part of both her lungs was filled with tubercles, and the lower part was hepatized and softened. The case was evidently a bad one. The treatment of Cod Liver Oil was at first used, but without marked improvement. The Phosphate of Lime was then administered with the Oil, and the result, as in the case of many others, was soon apparent. The patient was rapidly getting well."

Manufactured only by A. B. WILBOR, Chemist, 166 Court Street, Boston. For sale in New York by J. MILTON, 301 Broadway; in Philadelphia by T. W. DYOTT & SONS; in Baltimore by COLEMAN & ROGERS.

PREMATURE LOSS OF THE HAIR,

Which is so common now-a-days, may be entirely prevented by the use of Burnett's Cocoaine. It has been used in thousands of cases where the hair was coming out in handfuls, and has never failed to arrest its decay, and to promote a healthy and vigorous growth. It is, at the same time, unrivaled as a dressing for the hair. A single application will render it soft and glossy for several days.

LYON'S MAGNETIC POWDERS

Will destroy Garden Insects, Cockroaches, Bedbugs, Fleas, Ants, Moths, and all peats of the Vermin Kind.

The importance of a reliable article of this kind is incalculable. In ways without all nature teems with these annoying fees. This powder is the only article ever discovered which will exterminate them. A company of botanists, from the Horticultural Society of Paris, while amidst the ferns of the Amazon river, discovered a plant which, when made into a powder very soon destroyed insect life. It was sent to use by its great their sight camps from these intruders. Quantities of the plant were brought home by MR. E. LYON, and found a positive insect destroyer in every experiment. It is simply a powdered leaf, chemically prepared to resist the effect of age and climate. Medals and Letters Patent have been obtained from the governments of England, France, Germany, and Russia, from the World's Fair, and numerous medical and horticultural colleges and societies.

Letter from the President of the U. S.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, 31st Jan. 1853.

"MR. EDWARD LYON.—DEAR SIR: I have the pleasure to inform you that the Royal Commission of the World's Fair at London have awarded you a Medal and Certificate for the great value of your Magnetic Powders, &c.

Yours, very respectfully,
FRANKLIN PIERCE."

The above was accompanied by a certificate of Prince Albert.

IT IS FREE FROM POISON.

"NEW YORK, October 1st, 1858.

"MR. E. LYON.—DEAR SIR: We have analyzed and tested your Magnetic Powders, and find them perfectly harmless to mankind and domestic animals, but certain death when inhaled by bugs, ants, and insects.

"JAMES B. CANFIELD, M.D., Chemist.

"LAURANCE REID, Prof. Chemistry, N. Y. Hospital."

"MR. JAMES L. ROSE, Superintendent of the New York Hospital, says, "he has expelled all the bugs, ants, roaches, &c., with LYON'S Powders, and finds it of great value."

Every gardener and housekeeper must have a direct interest in the article of this kind. References can be made to the ASTOR, ST. NICHOLAS, and Metropolitan Hotels; to Judge MORRIS, President of the American Institute; JAMES GORDON BENNETT, GEO. WISSETTER SCOTT, CURTISS W. REED, L. M. PEASE, of the FIVE POINTS MISSION, &c., &c. JUDGE MORRIS says, "This discovery of PROF. LYON is of national importance. The Farmer's Club have tested it thoroughly. It will destroy locusts, grasshoppers, ants, moths, bugs and all vermin. Garden plants can be preserved, and houses made pure."

Sold by Druggists and Seedsmen. Depot, BARNES & PARK, of New York, to have it sold throughout the world. Many worthless imitations are advertised. Be cautious!

"NEW YORK, November 8th, 1858.

"In retiring from business, I have sold all my insect Powders and Pills, Letters Patent, and the secrets pertaining thereto, to Messrs. BARNES & PARK. This powder is a discovery made by myself, and brought from the interior of Asia, and is unknown to any other person. The genuine and effective article is put up in tin canisters, and will continue to bear my name.

"E. LYON."

Bats and mice can not be reached by a powder, and are killed by a MAGNETIC PILL. Order them through any merchant.

The Lyon's Powder kills insects in a trice.

But Lyon's Pills are noted for rats and mice.

Sample Powder, 25 cents; regular size, 50 cents and $1 00. Follow directions. Use freely and thoroughly.

BARNES & PARK,
13 & 15 Park Row, New York.

A WORD OF WARNING.—There is nothing more reprehensible than stealing the reputation of a reliable article to impose upon the community an inferior and worthless one, and yet this is the course taken by one JOHN C. HOBNETZER & CO. introduced a Hair Dye under the name of "Cocoaine," and are now advertising." Its wonderful restorative properties made it instantly popular with the ladies, and it has come to be a household thing of the past, when the country was flooded with worthless imitations. Now, as we have not written but one preparation, and that is the original preparation in a scientific combination, made with great care, and the ingredients are made with water, making the hair harsh, brittle, and finally, requiring another dye to cover it, or vain to make it look decently. We would therefore advise our readers to buy nothing but the original Jaynestin Hair Coloring or Restorative, which is reliable.—Troy Whig.

Sold every where.—Price 50 cents a bottle.

HUMPHREYS'

Specific Homœopathic Remedies,

For Domestic and Private Use.

Stand confessedly at the head of remedial means for the use of the people. They are safe; removed from the poisonous, dangerous, and repulsive doses of quackery, or old-school practice, the inconveniences of water-cure, or the intricate and perplexing obscurities of the usual Homœopathic books and medicines. Consisting of simple specifics for the various diseases to which they are subject, and up to the present time embracing thirty-four different numbers (and three cases), or prescriptions, they are at once the ready resource of the parent, guardian, and the comfort of the complaining or invalid.

They possess these positive advantages. They are harmless: no injury can arise from their use. They are simple; you always know what to take, and how to take it. They are convenient; you can give the proper dose. Fill at a moment's warning; without hesitation or delay. They are efficient; in thousands of cases disease is arrested at once, and the system relieved without production or delay.

LIST OF SPECIFIC REMEDIES.

No. 1. Fever Pills.—For Fever, Congestion, and Inflammation of all kinds.

No. 2. Worm Pills.—For Worm Fever, Worm Colic, and Wetting the Bed.

No. 3. Infant's Pills.—For Colic, Crying, Teething, and Wakefulness of Infants.

No. 4. Diarrhœa Pills.—For Diarrhœa, Cholera Infantum, and Summer Complaint.

No. 5. Dysentery Pills.—For Colic, Griping, Dysentery and Bilious Fluxes.

No. 6. Cholera Pills.—For Cholera, Cholera Morbus, Nausea, and Vomiting.

No. 7. Cough Pills.—For Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Influenza, and Sore Throat.

No. 8. Toothache Pills.—For Toothache, Faceache, and Neuralgia.

No. 9. Headache Pills.—For Headache, Vertigo, Heat and Illness from the Sun.

No. 10. Dyspepsia Pills.—For Weak and Deranged Stomach, Constipation, and Bilious Complaints.

No. 11. For Female Irregularities.—Scanty, Painful, or Suppressed Periods.

No. 12. Female Pills.—For Leucorrhœa, or Fluor Menses, and Bearing Down.

No. 13. Croup Pills.—For Croup, Hoarse Cough, Bad Breathing.

No. 14. Salt Rheum Pills.—For Erysipelas, Eruptions, Pimples on the Face.

No. 15. Rheumatic Pills.—For Pain, Lameness or Soreness in the Chest, Back, Loins, or Limbs.

A.—For Fever and Ague, Chill Fever, Dumb Ague, old mismanaged Agues.

F.—For Piles, Blind or Bleeding, Internal or External.

G.—For Sore, Weak, or Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids; Failing, Weak, or Blurred Sight.

C.—For Catarrh, of long standing or recent, either with obstruction or profuse discharges.

W. C.—For Whooping-Cough, abating the violence and shortening the attack.

In acute diseases—such as Fevers, Inflammations, Diarrhœas, Dysentery, Croup, Rheumatism, and most eruptive diseases as Scarlet Fever, Measles, and Erysipelas—the subduing of crying or distressing symptoms promptly is obvious, and in all such cases the specifics act like a charm.

Coughs and Colds, which are of such frequent occurrence, and which so often lay the foundation of diseased lungs, bronchitis, and consumption, may all be at once broken up by taking No. 7 as directed.

In all chronic diseases, such as Dyspepsia, Weak Stomach, Constipation, Liver Complaints, Piles, Female Infirmity and Irregularities, Ill Health, Sores or Weak Eyes, Catarrh, Salt Rheum, and other old eruptions, the best specifics when proper regulation and diet will secure an almost every instance. Often the cure of a single chronic difficulty, such as Dyspepsia, Piles, or Catarrh, Headache, or Female Weakness, has more than paid for the case his entire.

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY.

THE erudite author of the history of American Holidays and Holiday Sports would have been sorry to have lived as long as Valentine's Day, 1859; for, had his life been so far prolonged, he would have discovered how deeply he erred when he said that the day was not honored in the United States.

In point of fact there is, perhaps, no country in the world in which more valentines are made, sold, and sent than in the United States; nor in any other, in all probability, is so much money expended in valentines, or so extravagant billets contrived for the day. Last year we gave an illustrated account of the manufacture of valentines. We now subjoin a picture of the arrival of the rural postman at a happy cottage on Saint Valentine's morning. Many of our fair readers will recognize the scene.

It has been for many years fashionable to sneer at the Valentine mania. Certainly there is little to admire in the senseless habit of sending comic or insulting valentines to persons of either sex. Nor can love-struck youths be applauded for spending $10 or $20 in the purchase of a costly valentine for their Dulcineas. But the true old-fashioned valentine—the timid letter in which a youthful lover tries half to conceal half to reveal his identity and his feelings, in verses whose failings will never be detected by their recipient—the sly note on pink or rose-colored paper, which is addressed to Mr. Smith or Brown in handwriting which he surely recognizes, and which spurs him on to the long-deferred avowal—these valentines are surely not obnoxious to criticism, and no kindly person will wish to see them shelved as obsolete.

THE SKATERS.

I STOOD on the frozen river,
Watching the skaters go by:
They were laughing and shouting merrily,
Under the cold gray sky.
Lastly swinging their way along,
Cheerfully singing some matches of song,
Skimming like birds on the face of the water,
Swimming like fish in their deep-sea caves.

I saw not an eye but sparkled,
Not a step but was careless and free;
They were laughing and shouting merrily,
And so happy an happy could be.
Carefully staying the speed in their pace,
Warily weighing the chance in a race,
Winging their way through the change in the throng,
Singing the score of the SKATER'S SONG.

Over the ice, like the swallows, I fly,
With light in my heart and light in my eye;
The swiftest of runners their tardiness feel,
When my feet are encased in the glistening steel.
Away I flash,
Like the lightning's flash,
Or the racer under the rider's lash.

Eyes that look out from the loveliest face
Laugh at my follies or smile at my grace;
The life of my blood courses up to the brain,
And the days of my boyhood come to me again.
I look not back,
Though the ice may crack,
For a hundred cubes like wolves on my track.

Up to the north, in the face of the gale,
Breathless we turn, spreading out for the sail;
A fleet of gray SKATERS rush down on the wind,
Leaving Time and the sluggards completely behind:
For life has wits,
At pleasure's gold gates,
For the hours we spend on the glorious skates.

I stood on the frozen river,
Watching the skaters go by;
They were laughing and shouting merrily,
Under the cold gray sky.
Joyfully greeting the calls of a friend,
Heartily meeting the jokes they may lend,
Kissing the lips of the lovely ones that stay,
Missing the lips of the loved ones away.

There was one in the midst of the skaters,
A beautiful boy of ten,
With a dreamy, dark-eyed beauty,
Who flitted among the men.
Laughingly winning his way along,
Serenely beginning to feel himself strong,
Reaching and catching his step from a fall,
Tumbling and rolling about like a ball.

There was one in the crowd of watchers
Who watched the boy in his play,
Whose eye was ever upon him
Whenever he wandered away.
Smilingly greeting at each new start,
Silently praising the child in her heart,
Willing to follow the steps of her boy,
Filling her soul with his fullsome joy.

I stood in the midst of the skaters,
And looked at it all as a dream;
But my heart was suddenly wakened
With a single death-like scream—
Fearfully filling the chill winter air,
Instantly stilling the song that was there,
Creating the light form a thousand of eyes,
Hushing in terror a thousand of sighs.

Where is the dark-eyed boy?
And the ever-watching mother?
A stricken woman clings to her waist,
And her hands are held by another.

ARRIVAL OF THE COUNTRY POSTMAN ON ST. VALENTINE'S MORNING.

Tortilly standing, to sacrifa still,
Lily demanding her beautiful child,
Starting with eyes in a fire-like glare,
Tossing the hair from her bosom of snow.

There is running to and fro,
And the talking of many men;
But an hour goes by before they find
The beautiful boy of fire,
Quietly resting him under their breath,
Earnestly pressing his beauty to death,
Putting his limbs in a natural way,
Shutting his eyes from the light of the day.

But the mother has broken her guard,
And lies on the breast of her child:
She is kissing the pallid, resting lips
That her waters have defiled,
Gloomily pressing the baby-like corse,
Finally scanning and measuring her task,
Trying to waken the voice of the dead,
Crying to God for the soul that is fled.

She has raised the babe in her arms,
Rejecting all offer of aid;
His arm falls over her shoulder,
And his head on her bosom is laid.
Wearily bearing her burden of death,
Tenderly caring as though he had breath,
Creeping again in a staggering pace,
Weeping, and kissing the little pale face.

I stand on the frozen river,
But the cold scarce no longer go by;
They are gathered in groups at the landings,
Under the cold gray sky—
Wordfully telling of what they had seen,
Steadily walking where late they had been,
Running with terror at every sound,
Stunning the spot where the boy was drowned.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1859.

THE STATE OF ITALY.

OUR principal engraving this week represents the leading cities of Northern Italy, for though Italy is nominally the capital of Piedmont, it bears the same relation to Genoa that Albany does to New York. We have thought that our readers, who will hear much of these cities in the course of the next few weeks, would be glad to have some tangible picture of them in their mind.

The Italian question, vexed as it is, is susceptible of very simple explanation. A generation Italy has for centuries been divided into two parts—that which was subject to "the Empire," Austria, Austria, and that which was independent. Both sections have had variable limits. Piedmont, or rather Savoy, has always been free. Genoa has always been white

THE LOUNGER.

A SINGLE WORD.

THE Lounger presents his compliments to his numerous correspondents, and begs them not to lose patience, but to believe that in due season all their favors will be acknowledged.

Of course he knows that an editor's duty seems very different from that of an author, and that every correspondent naturally supposes a Lounger to have nothing to do but be grateful for the letters he gets, and say that he is so.

The truth is, the Lounger wants to say so much himself that he probably yields to the common selfishness (which we always suppose to be greatly mixed by being confessed), and, having the matter all in his own hands, gives himself the best start. It is not even as fair in the matter as the captain of a wrecking coast, who was in the midst of his sermon, one Sunday, when the news was brought of a fast ship drifting upon the shore. The congregation rose at once to rush to the beach, but the worthy pastor called upon them to remain seated. Then descending the pulpit-stairs, he marched through the broad aisle to the door, and there gathering up his gown, he suddenly cried out, "Now, brethren, let's all start fair!"

The Lounger locks his parish into the pews, so that they can not start fair.

But then his correspondents ought to remember that he is the scape-goat for all their short-comings. "How could you print A's note?" inquires B. "If such stuff as C sends to the Lounger is to be published I shall stop the paper," says D. "You're a pretty judge of literary excellence, forsooth, all the anti-slavery men in the country pass notice," writes E. "Why not give us something original, brilliant, learned, and witty?" writes F, and not suffer all the crows in the country to caw through your columns?"

So the Lounger sighs, bespeaks patience, and promises to do all that he can do to carry the load laid upon him. If your letter is not noticed next week, nor even the next, or the week after, the fourth week will probably bring it to light.

But I don't choose to write a single word!"

Ah! Sir, or Madame, you are the very person to learn how excellent a virtue patience is.

HOW TO DO IT.

"The Chesterfield Club presents its compliments to the Lounger, and would thank him to express an opinion upon the following question: If a gentleman occupies a seat in a railroad car, and a lady or any other lady, and a lady, traveling alone, finds no seat, do good manners require him to rise and offer her his seat or to simply wish greatly obliged?

Whatever theoretical good manners may require in such a case, it is very easy to see what good-nature requires. The Chesterfield Club can perhaps be assisted to a solution by certain observations. Suppose a man, under the above circumstances, upon arriving at a certain station, should find a lady leave the train, while his wife must change cars. Upon entering the other train she can find no seat, but there are plenty of gentlemen with seats to spare with other ladies. Would her husband have any doubt as to what those gentlemen ought to do?

In questions of this kind it is always necessary to imagine what you would do, or think you ought to do, if your neighbor's tall sword were drawn on you. When your bull is the aggressor there is nothing surer than to regret that he should be contentious, and with such sharp horns, too!

The Lounger is perfectly aware of the trials to which his fellow-men are subject before and after date. He knows as well as any body the Arctic complacency with which they receive the unwanted permission to remove his garments, upon which the fair buccaneer was partly sitting, and, making a low bow, resume the shawl and trunk-key—big, and plaint herself upon the nest, faintly recollecting it with extreme care for the pins and furs; then take out two or three books, select one to read, lay the rest by her side, and fall to the perusal. The occupant of the seat reappeared, tired, scarcely looked surprised (probably he was an old traveler), in his most courteous manner presented permission to remove his garments, upon which the fair buccaneer was partly sitting, and, making a low bow, resume the shawl and trunk-key—which the pretty pirate ought to have taken.

Yet the Lounger would not say any thing of the class lady, and was reading The Autocrat. But the in an utter accustomed to applause, she was probably used to the most absolute attention of time and place upon the part of her worshipers. It was all a matter of course in her life. Probably it was any cost of inconvenience to any body; no doubt entered her mind; and yet to a complacency of observation as Arctic as her own smile, the car-conductor was purely selfish.

Apply the rule illustrated before, and what man would have wished his wife to do likewise?

There is, however, but one thing to say. Whatever may be the prevailing fashionable notion, it ceases to be a gentleman because a lady may sometimes forget that she is a lady. It is much pleasanter, to be sure, to be rewarded for doing our duty by sweet smiles and kind glances and gentle words. But these are all works of supererogation. It is a pleasanter, too, to the soldier to have Beauty wave her handkerchief and applaud him as he goes to the draw on be returns from hard fighting. But does he make his fighting depend upon the favors? No, no. Patriotism implies courage and duty; and, gentlemen of the Chesterfield Club, to whom the Lounger returns his most respectful compliments, honor expects every gentleman to show the most thoughtful kindness in every action of his life.

GOOD MANNERS.

THE question of the Chesterfield Club suggests the inquiry, What are good manners? May not a man have the best heart and the worst manners in the world? Have not rouis, swindlers, bullets, and the worst part of society singularly good manners?

But what is the real charm in all these cases? Is it merely the grace and elegance of deportment? No; that is only the shell—it is not the pearl. The essential charm is the kindness and sympathy expressed by that grace and elegance. It may be the thing, or it may be only a reflected affectation of the thing, but this is the substance. A man of generous soul may be awkward and shy, and bring in his mouth and his spoon in the sugar-bowl, may pick his teeth with his fork and belch in a railroad car, and you can not possibly praise such perform ances. His neighbor may be plotting how to pick your pocket, while he carefully cuts with his fork and wipes his mouth daintily with a napkin, and is neither too familiar with you nor too reserved. But in the latter case, while you applaud the manners, you feel that they are agreeable only because they stand for the real thing, which the first man possesses.

The manners of the last men are only appearing good. They are insincere, and the moment you perceive that, they are disgusting, however smooth they may be.

If, then, a man would have fine manners, which are are flowers, let him cultivate kind feelings, which are roots. Vessel and glassware, to begin every at first, are sure to wear off by-and-by. The gentleman in the steamship stands at dinner with your pocket, and kicked his wife when he got home. You may not do either (although, possibly, even you and the Lounger have private likes and dislikes), but you are not in the way of avoiding such performances because you are trying to cultivate good manners, unless you know what good manners spring from. Don't fix rose upon dead sticks. Let your life be full, be no dead tree or stump. But put a green slip in the ground; water it and cherish it; let the sun shine on it, and the dew of the June heaven fall upon it: it may not bear room to-morrow, but next year it will blossom, and in the following years bloom all summer long.

MR. DICKENS COMING.

IT was first suggested in the editorial columns of Harper's Weekly that Charles Dickens would probably return to this country to read his stories in public.

Indeed, while the great novelist finds it so lucrative to read what he has written, he will hardly write any thing else for the world's delight in itself. According to the wont of the author, it is now quite time for the announcement of a new serial by Mr. Charles Dickens; and a universal public interest as "the consolcers of the manuscript," as the elder Mr. Weller remarked of his son, would set at a certain interesting epoch of his life.

Hence the suggestion in the World that the story has become more and more probable, until it would be no just matter of surprise to hear that he had actually passed over the sea to read it to the next fall of the leaf. With his intention of reading he would hardly come in the spring or summer.

And what a different coming it will be! Certainly, the most dead author ever had such an ovation as that of Burns a few weeks since, so no living author has commanded such a public as will be poured upon his American visit. Carlyle grinned and growled at it, and had a little sneer at Schonnyrigd, but he accomplished novelists, in fact "the fashion," But it was a generous, hearty, and noble enthusiasm. We all acted very handsomely, and then we are doing that all the time with rarely so good an occasion and excuse.

Then he would be dead! How he was danced and accepted-hood! How gay he was in his Christmas stories! How sad he was that he was a jolly good fellow, and that we were the boys to show him a new wrinkle or two!

Then he would be dead, and how merrily he laughed at what he thought laughable! And oh! how his heart sang when he knew that every one have been growing ever since! And how unreasonable his hand was in his prefaces! And how we smiled, "Told you so!" at his sad forebodings! let come to light.

Yes, he will be a very different coming. The boy of those days, for he was scarcely thirty, is a man now. The long, gloomy, profuse hair is somewhat now and gray. Full, ruddy cheeks have seen much sadness since they saw us. The strains of youth is changed now to another condition.

He comes, too, as an old love, and we American are not fond of our past idols. Even though he come as young and blooming as at first, he will never more greet him and accompany him throughout his tour.

It is partly old and partly new. But in regard to the first part of that which concerns his domestic affairs—let us remember that we all know nothing except what he himself has, in numerous letters are of no account in forming an opinion. There has been a difference of some kind between Mr. and Mrs. Dickens, and we have learned of their oldest children, and mutually thinking it the best thing, they have separated.

It is simply impossible for any outsider to lay down general rules in the dark. Undoubtedly it has been the source of numberless domestic trials and theories; but how would any man who reads this like to be judged in another country upon the information that we have about the troubles of Mr. and Mrs. Dickens?

If he comes, therefore, let us be at least as just as we were generous before. That general popular enthusiasm can not be repeated. There is no Park Theatre left. Perhaps—we will not argue the point—perhaps Dickens has himself squandered it. But, as a nation, it is still the great author—still the story-teller who has written best of delights—still the cheerful voice of hope and welcome to our fireside. He is still Walter Scott's great successor, and one of the great names of the time. There is no fear of his popular success. There is no doubt that he will create as great an excitement by his reading as Jenny Lind by her singing. It is not from that consideration that we speak. It is in the hope that, while we applaud the brilliant and delightful reader who entertains an hour, we will not be unjust to the man who has labored and strengthened our lives.

"Ah, Father Francesco, as I was burrying with a loaf of bread and cup of wine to a starving man, I heedlessly trod upon the foot of Father Don Sing D'Or, and he cursed me for a clumsy fellow."

"Son," replied the Padre, "let it be thy comfort that God pardons all but sin to the Dean by reason of thy holy charity to the beggar."

—Do you read Spanish?

"DEAR LOUNGER,—This legend is well told by Mr. Bruce in his book on Norway. I have put it into rhyme, and, in the words of the cripples who, I wished it much to offer you, but now so much afraid. And so hear it!"

"YOURS, O. L. R.

"NIGHTINGALE HOUSE."

THE SECRET.

A NORWEGIAN LEGEND.

The storm rack drove across the sky,
The moaning wind with fury roared;
Along the dreary inlet
Not either oar was lifted or cloud,
Now nothing faint, now swelling loud,
Came music on the gale.

The priest was hastening from the storm,
His hooded hearth glowed bright and warm
For on the wedding-way:
He wondered as he heard the strain,
And grasped his trembling pathway's mane,
And hoofy dared to stay.

Sudden he paused in fear and awe,
For by the shuddered stream he saw
A figure bowed with weeping:
The arms were folded in despair,
Drooping the head and golden hair,
In pain that knew no sleeping.

Hark! the wild song bursts forth again,
Its wailing, sad, and yearning strain,
Loving, yet hoping never:
But the priest felt no pitying grace,
And sternly said, "Forsake this place,
Spirit unblessed, forever!"

Then with a shriek, as though a whole
Eternity swept o'er his soul,
The spirit seized his prize:
"Oh, holy man! who God may see,
In these forgiveness, then, for me,
Or everlasting pain!" a.

Contemptuously his lip he curled,
And answered, "He who made the world
Will watch over her!"
As well expect the stuff I bear
With spring's own bloom and luscious wear,
Once more a fragrant tree!"

Scarce had he spoke the word unkind
When swelling bade Nature's thought the wind,
And leaves waved green and full!
All spring's sweet miracle was there,
And starry flowers performed the air—
Thus man mocked merciful!

Then the priest melted into tears;
"And have I lived so many years,
And never known my God?
Thou from whose line I never severed,
And vainly deemed I rightly served,
Father! I kin thy rod!

"And oh! may love's pure blossoms start
Even from my cold and arid heart,
And make a spring-time there;
That yet my sinful soul may know
Sweet pity's softening overflow
For sorrow and despair!"

With one strong thrust the cloudie were rent,
Flooding the landscape around
The sunset glory shone,
And, full of delicious joy, arose
A song that breathed a soul's repose,
Whose every word is Heaven.

* * * * *

Oh why, with such love to be forgiven,
Would we unsay the keys of heaven,
Rejoicing one another?
Why, in the world, God loves so well,
Would we ourselves create a hell
For those that love us?

Oh for Burns' kind, relenting faith,
For seems St. Martin's summer breath,
Or gospel words of love!
A Milton's pity, deep, though stern,
Could every heart subdue with tears
Beyond his creed's control.

ABOUT WOMEN.

SOME time since there was published in the Weekly an interesting and valuable account of the various and successful efforts made by Miss Blackwell, now the head of the Women's Hospital in this city, to obtain proper medical instruction for the medical school of Geneva, New York. She finally succeeded in Geneva, New York, and is now, with a number of her sex, engaged in the practice of the profession.

There is something so eminently fit in connecting the name of Florence Nightingale with that of women that it is singular it should ever be questioned. Even among the Greeks and Romans, who had no very profound respect for the sex, those departments of treatment which peculiarly concern women were mainly occupied by them, and it is only since the days of Queen Anne that they have been so exclusively in the hands of men.

A communication in one of the daily papers recently mentioned an instance of several women who had applied for admission to the surgical operations of the Bellevue Hospital in this city, and who, after being admitted, were insulted with the insults of the young gentlemen in long hair, spectacles, and yellow cheeks, who usually grace those occasions with their presence. The professors, or one of them, at least, insisted that the insults should cease, and we hope they did so.

Now it is not a rash assertion that every woman who devotes herself to mastering medical and surgical science is terribly in earnest. The impediments are too serious for any trifling or undecided woman. If she resolves to undertake it, it is because she feels that special aptitude for the profession, which is all the calling that any human being can have for any pursuit; and if she acquires skill, tact, and knowledge which may be combined with the powerful and feminine influence of women in sickness and suffering, let the Lounger bear grateful testimony. There is nothing more to be desired in our modern social organization than that the treatment and care of women in certain crises of sickness to them, should be intrusted by universal public confidence to women themselves.

It is a confidence that can only be slowly exacted from the public. But that day of the capitulate will, and when we shall all wonder it had ever been otherwise.

CHESS IN ILLUSTRATED.—A late number of the Chicago Sunday Leader, embracing Mr. Louis Faulkner's fourth article on chess editor, affords the most gratifying intelligence as to the progress of Chess in Illinois. We therein learn that a match by telegraph between the respective chess editors of Chicago and Quincy was then in progress; the secondary of which, with Mr. Bird, we now print. It is a truly beautiful specimen of Chess play, and highly creditable to its contestants on either side.

We likewise learn that Mr. Paulsen himself has been engaged in an encounter, also by telegraph, single-handed, against the whole strength of the Quincy Club; and up to last accounts had won the only two games played. At the latter intelligence the time for one move was limited to ten minutes, and the game progressed much faster even than that in Mr. Bird's Problem.

(f) All this is wonderfully well played.

(g) If Q to Q B 3d, White loses in four moves.

(h) They have nothing better.

A FIRE-HUNT IN GEORGIA.

A FIRE-HUNT IN GEORGIA.

An attentive correspondent in Georgia sends us a sketch from which the accompanying engraving of a fire-hunt in Georgia was made. Hunting deer by fire-light is well known to be one of the most interesting sports of the South; it may be a novelty to many of our readers, and we therefore give our correspondent's letter in full. He says:

"We usually ride with a servant behind to carry a bag of chipped light wood and a hatchet, with a fleet dog, tied. If the dog is a cur, we tie a small bell round his neck to tell when and where he has caught the deer.

"Immediately on shooting, if the deer be not killed on the spot, we let the dog go, and soon the bleatings of the wounded deer are wafted on the still breeze of night to the listening sportsmen. Mounting our horses, we hurry to the spot. At first but one eye is seen, when we dismount extimorously, secure our horses, add light wood to our fire to increase its brilliancy and reflection, and slowly advance, taking care to get the wind of the deer, as they throw up their heads very high to catch the scent of the approaching huntsmen. As soon as the bright twinkling stand-like eye separates into two of the natural size and distance apart, we aim a little below for the breast, and fire. With a bright light I have seen the whole bodies of two large bucks.

"The fire is carried in a frame-work made of iron hoops secured to a rim of the same, and that attached to a light staff, passed over the left shoulder, the left arm over the end ready to grasp the gun and steady the aim, resting the gun on the end of the staff and thus throwing the light directly on the deer. The torch is never carried in front of the sportsman; to see a deer or its eyes the light must be carried behind the person who is going to shoot, and the reflection thrown as far as the deer, right over the sportsman's head, by elevating and casting around the blazing pan.

"It is surprising how deer will gaze at a moving light and allow the huntsman to approach, if he has the wind of him, until he can see the whole body. I have heard of a group of deer being fired into by fire-light, and one being killed and floundering about, the others were so fascinated that they bounded immediately for the person having the light and knocked him down, light and all. They came to gradually more on their keen scent than on their large glossy eyes to avoid a sportsman; and when closely pursued by the cracking, reminding, deep-toned voices of a stanch pack, will suddenly stop, throw up their inverted heads, toss off the tresses all around to ascertain the position of the sportsman, and then sneak off or bound away in an opposite direction, eluding his fire, evincing more than instinct and something nearly allied to reasoning powers; for a few paces further forward would have proved fatal to them."

HOW THE ALMS-HOUSE CHILDREN ARE REARED.

We illustrate on the preceding page the scene which presented itself in the tenement house No. 127 East Thirty-fourth Street, at the time of a recent visit paid thereto by Mr. Barker.

The occasion of his visit was simply as follows: Mr. Barker had had in his employ a girl named Mary Fitch, who was intimate with an old woman named Carlock, living at 103 East Thirty-fourth Street. During the time that Mary Fitch was in his service, Mr. Barker had much household property, linen, plate, etc. Having reason to suspect that Fitch and Carlock were concerned in the robbery, Mr. Barker, in company with an officer of the independent police, made a descent upon her room, and there discovered part of the missing property. He found, besides, three children in cradles, who, as Mrs. Carlock stated, were Alms-house children given to her to board at one dollar a week.

These unfortunate little creatures were evidently famishing of hunger. Their emaciation no words can express. Our artist's picture, painfully truthful as it is, can but feebly render the harrowing condition of the poor little objects. None of them had any flesh on their bones. One of them had a sore on its arm. Animal instinct had taught it to suck the sore, and the process had actually caused an excrescence to grow, such as we sometimes observe to a female nipple. All were so abject and feeble in expression that all trace of humanity seemed lost. They had lost the power of crying. They were not shy. They were in so brutish a state that, when the policeman took them out of their cradle, they merely gazed at him and his companions as puppies or young cats might do.

We have pleasure in adding that Mr. Barker took pains to have the poor little things removed to a better home. And as the event has created no little talk, we subjoin a statement of facts with regard to the Alms-house system. These facts are derived from the best authority. In giving them publicity, we will only remark that the illustration afforded by the Carlock development does not show the system to advantage. If, notwithstanding the precautions observed, in the shape of doctors' certificates and matrons' visits, three Alms-house children can be starved to death in the house of such a nurse as Mrs. Carlock, it is high time, we think, that a revolution should be effected in administration of the Alms-house.

WHY NURSING.

The Governors of the Alms-house have from 1700 to 1800 of these children under their charge. Of this number about 700 are distributed over the city in charge of wet-nurses, whose duty it is to take care of the infants until they are two years old, when they are transferred to the Nursery Department on Randall's Island. For their services wet-nurses receive one dollar per week for each child; and at the end of every three months they are furnished with clothing, such as frocks, diapers, flannel, shoes and stockings, etc., as the necessities of the case may require. The Governors claim to be very strict in regard to the qualifications of nurses, and will not appoint any one unless furnished with the certificate of a respectable physician, to the effect that the applicant is a woman of sound health with a fresh breast of milk, and calculated in every way to take proper care of a sucking child. When the applicant applies for a child, her application, with the doctor's certificate attached, is placed on file, and a visitor is sent to the residence of the nurse to see if every thing about the premises is in a cleanly and healthy condition. If the report of the visitor be found satisfactory, the first founding that turns up is handed over to the applicant. These nurses are visited once or twice a month, just as Mrs. Frost the visitor thinks proper, and any delinquency on their part is reported to the Alms-house Department. Of course Mrs. Frost can not vouch for the everyday treatment of the children; but if she detects any want of care on the part of the nurse during her monthly visits, the matter is brought before the Board of Governors and made the subject of investigation. No nurse is allowed to wet-nurse more than one child at a time; but she may be competent to take care of one or two other children in addition, provided they are already weaned. Thus many of the nurses have three or more children in their charge; but the number rarely exceeds four or five, even among the most favored of the employees.

The nursery at Randall's Island is devoted to the rearing of the foundlings after they have been weaned and received from the hands of the wet-nurses. They are all over two years old, and generally remain in the nursery for three years or thereabouts. Then they are transferred to the Primary Department, where they are taught the alphabet and instructed in the first rudiments of education. From the Primary School they are promoted to the Ward School, which is under the control of the Board of Education, and conducted in similar manner to the public schools in the city. Having spent a year or two in the Ward School, they are supposed to be able to read, write, and cipher with tolerable ability; and it is not unusual to find many of the children as far advanced in the knowledge of the English language as some of the Ten Governors who provide for their education. Under the tuition of Mr. Ripley they are instructed in military tactics; and really, without exaggeration, many of our military companies could not compare with them lads in marching, deploying to the right or the left, and performing other evolutions too numerous to mention.

THE APPRENTICESHIP SYSTEM.

By a resolution of the Board of Ten Governors no child shall be apprenticed who shall not have reached the age of ten years. As a general rule, the authorities prefer indenturing the children to parties living outside of the city; consequently very few of them are bound out in New York. The State of New Jersey, perhaps, can boast of more Randall's Island boys than the State of New York itself. In Monmouth county, New Jersey, especially, the number of apprentices will number fully one-half of the entire number indentured during the year. The system adopted by the authorities in apprenticing the children is very good as far as it goes, but there is much room for improvement. In making an application for one of these children, the applicant must be furnished with a good reference from some respectable citizen in this city, or from a Justice of the Peace in the county where he resides. The boys are bound out until they are twenty-one years old, and the girls until they are eighteen. The total number indentured annually will average 300. The conditions of the indentures oblige the employer to provide the apprentice with proper clothing and schooling. It is expected that the children will be sent to school for at least three months every year, and that their employers will be kind to them, and see that their wants, morally, physically, and mentally, shall not be neglected. When their time is up they receive a new suit of clothes, in addition to what they have had already, and a present of fifty or one hundred dollars, just as their employer deems fit. In this agreement there is nothing specified as to the amount of money to be paid, but the usual custom is somewhat after the fashion above described. Some apprentices receive a small sum per diem from their masters, especially those who are engaged in learning at a trade; so that, when they become of age, they can have a few hundred dollars to start in the world with. Then again, many apprentices are treated as shabbily as masters could treat them; "to be sure, getting but the scurvy kind of drudgery to perform, and receive no remuneration in return. And many of the children, however, find good masters and comfortable homes. Every year the apprentices are visited by the authorities, and a report of their condition is submitted to their parents, if they have any. No parent will be allowed to visit an apprentice, or know the place of his child's residence, except by consent of the employer. This rule has been found necessary in order to prevent interference on the part of a good-for-nothing mother, or, what is much worse, a drunken father.

THE ADOPTED ONES.

From seventy-five to one hundred of the children are annually adopted by respectable citizens of New York and its vicinity. It is an unusual thing to see the children persons of Fifth Avenue wealth patiently sit in the office of the Superintendent of Out-door Poor for the arrival of the "little ones" they have chosen to adopt. Children must be residents of the Island at least six months before they can be given out for adoption. After that period their parents have no further control over them, and can not reclaim them except with the consent of the parties adopting. Many of the adopted ones fall heir to large fortunes, valuable property, etc., willed them by their adopted parents; while others fare but poorly in their new homes, and got nothing but boxed ears and castoff clothing for a legacy. One well-known physician who adopted one of these children some years ago and emigrated with the lad to California. There he accumulated a fortune of $200,000, all of which the youngster will inherit, as the doctor announces his determination to will the boy not a dollar of his wealth. Such instances of good fortune are rare, however.

MORTALITY AMONG THE CHILDREN.

The mortality that among the children under the guardianship of the Governors is terrible. It is said, and with much correctness too, that more than three-fourths of the children die before they reach the years of discretion. In the spring of 1857 the institution known as the Home of the Friendless took a number of the children on trial. Thirty of the healthiest and most promising infants were picked out of the nursery department, and during their sojourn at their new home were treated with every attention and care. Of the entire number but ten now live to tell the harrowing two-thirds having fallen victims to scrofula, marasmus, and other diseases. Medical men assert that a very large proportion of all the foundlings picked up in the streets of New York are afflicted with scrofula in some form or other. Hence the Ten Governors argue that the mortality which exists among the children under charge is not the result of any want or inattention on the part of the nurses, but solely attributable to scrofula. If the children are so diseased, would not hospital wards be more fitting places for them than the dwelling-houses of poor, ignorant nurses? Surely such children would be better off under the care of an experienced physician than cooped up in the fifth story of some tenement-house in the Sixth Ward. There are many evils to be corrected in connection with the Alms-house Department, and this is one of the most important.

The agitation caused by the statement of the above facts has led to some inquiry. The Ten Governors of the Alms-house have obtained the following evidence from their employés, the doctor and the visiting nurse:

"IT'S THE FIRST TIME YOUR BIBLE LARNING EVER BRUNG YOU THE NEEDFUL."—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

Dr. William B. Ribbes testified: Has been acquainted with Mary Carlock two years; I had sufficient confidence in her to recommend her to Dr. George F. Gunnison, to take charge of an unoccupied house of his until he could sell it; I have attended children in her care from the Almshouse Department a great many times during the two years; my impression was that she was formed by two years; my impression was that she was formed by the Superintendent as a capable woman, and was given the next description of children to take charge of; I had no idea of there being any peculiarity or want of cleanliness; she is believed to be strictly temperate; I am informed and my opinion is the same, that the treatment of the children I should have certificated; I visited; I visit a great number of children in the Almshouse Department; that is a large proportion; the sick-room children are usually cared for that there is no reason why I did not condemn it for itself, but the last the largest number of children; her children were distributed in a room four infants there; don't know whether she had any children of her own; was much surprised at hearing the statements relative to her.

Alexis Irvin, recalled, saith: Nurse: Visited the children at Mrs. Carlock's; commenced last May, and have frequently called to see them; always found the children clean and in good order; her apartments were clean and tidy—very much so; she has a lower one, I believe had to be a proper person to have charge of children; made inquiries in the Department of the children under her care; knows; they were favorable; had no acquaintance with Mrs. Carlock before I took charge of the children; knew from the hundred children; knew of the condition of the children when sent to her; one had the ophthalmia; another was sent there to cure the cholera infantum; one was a diseased child; saw the children every day for several; their condition was steady; had the clothes so provided by the Department.

On the other hand, the Tribune has obtained, through its reporters, the following evidence from parties residing in the house where Mrs. Mary Carlock:

"Mrs. Carlock has lived in the house No. 185 Thirty-fourth Street since last May. Previous to that she moved in about a year since; that the children were taken from her City Hall nurse every body said; that they must have been drugged, for they hardly ever cried; that Mrs. C. was often out all day, but the children did not; the care of a young girl. Mr. and Mrs. M'Carter both state that there have been a great many children there since last June; all left sickly to see the dead-cart to other, and after it was quiet in the children, were taken out. Was carried away in a basket; when the children would die, Mrs. Carlock would say that she could not see it, as many to board as she wanted; she was one of the oldest nurses, and one of the children would not stay with her. Mrs. M'Carter said there was another woman who had lived in the house at the same time as Mrs. Carlock, and knew that this woman gave the children enough to eat, but she was intemperate, and did not pay the rent; the woman. Mrs. M'Carter says she knows that some of the children brought to Mrs. Carlock were born in the Almshouse, and that they would in a short time dwindle down to skin and bones, and then would be carried away. Before she left the house, Mrs. Carlock would have had copies of some kind; Mrs. Carlock was of such violent temper nobody in the house would say a thing to do with her. In the same family, some of whose number are invested in her childbirth, also had a company, men who were employed in running in and out of the house almost every night till twelve, one, and two o'clock.

"Mrs. Schlegler, an intelligent German woman, entirely respectable, corroborates and refines and fills up the manner: Resides next door to Mrs. Carlock; her husband is the owner of the house in which Mrs. Carlock lives, as well as the one in which they reside themselves — has been living in it since 1856 Thirty-fourth Street. Mrs. Schlegler used to go into Mrs. C.'s room for the rent, and frequently saw the children there; saw five in the room the last time; knows they were not well treated; is sure they were not to have so small a room as they needed, nor did they have the kind of food they ought to have had; one day Mrs. C. gave a very extensive order for their supper; says that some of the neighbors were annoyed by the unnatural appearance of the children sent at the door for the removal of these children, and when it was spoken of, the bodies were afterward taken away in a wagon.

"Charles K. Schick is a German cabinet-maker; an intelligent, respectable man; himself and wife called to relocate the testimony of Mrs. Schlegler and Mrs. M'Carter, in regard to the appearance of the children when brought to Mrs. Carlock, and the brief period required to make a sad change; knows of the deaths of children; both have known her repeatedly to get the children under their charge by hundreds, and never to pay the poor little things Mrs. Schick would go out to the hydrant to see her children, and the children would be in water from running up stairs; they have known her to get a child under the ground within three weeks; they hardly ever heard the children cry, except when they fell out of bed at night, and then they would cry a little while crying, that they must have had some opinion given to stupefy them; a man came over came to the house at all, until within a very few days; a woman used to come with milk, from whom she thinks she took a pint a day.

"Mrs. Carlock herself says, she has had children to nurse for eleven years from the Tea Governors; never had had more than five at the time; she has had seven in all, and she would get others to fill their places; when she got this trouble about the stolen goods, she took out two of the Hall children, and another at board, and one child of her own; says her husband is living, but has a drunkard, and she has not lived with him since a year ago last 4th of July; says she has been in this land of misery out to wash a great deal for eight years. Five of her children have died since last May."

FACT, FANCY, AND FUN.

BY A SOUTHERN LAWYER.

"SEARCHING THE SCRIPTURE."

Two old gentlemen farmers, Isaac Gerald and Billy Hodge, respectable for their wealth, good fellowship and social habits, were sitting one day on a bench in the piazza of a retail grocery, with a couple of others of the same sort of respectable fame. Both had on their spectacles, and were busily engaged in turning with great care and curiosity the large leaves of a small Bible they had just procured from the office of the Clerk of the Circuit or Superior Court, as it is called in Georgia.

The life of the sacred volume had been worn or torn off, accordingly many dog-ears at broad edge, showing evidently long and hard usage.

Each gentleman seemed anxious to have the book for the time being, which the owner had determined that the other should not be so exclusive. After a most unsatisfactory examination, both participating, Gerald jerked the book from Hodge, with evident signs of impatience, saying:

"I can find it if you will just hands off and let me alone. I read all about it many a time when I went to school. I tell you it's in the Psalms of Moses, who writ and sung all about the old generations."

"I'll double the bet," Hodge replied, "its neither in the Psalms nor in your old degumentary, as you call it. It is under the new constitution, and I'll cover fourth of July, and Christmas, that old Moses know about the Psotle Paul and his family arrangements at all. I tell you I'm a deacon, and gentleman, and could look into circumstances about to crowd him as far as any one in this 'ere State. But Dark Ages, and Middle Ages, was as black as a night without stars, meteors, or lightning-bugs, same atween Moses and Paul; and he had no more magnifying-glass, or telegraph could see through or work in them times. I tell you, Gerald, you don't nowise understand the Bible farming."

The person thus taunted had been zealously searching the Psalms, and had every little attention to his companion; but an indistinct idea something like what he had read very early in the day, that Solomon's proverbs were in the Old Testament, but distinctly comprehended the invidious comparison instituted between his latitudinal knowledge and Hodge's. Raising his head, the magnifying-glass he had been so closely scanning, and shoving his spectacles to the top of his head, he looked contemptuously into the face of the other.

"What was you firing up, Billy Hodge? Major enlightened, and I'm ready to bet a new saddle you won't through college! You staggered at the second digest, and the boys kicked you out, and the father I 'spose you thought that was graduating! I could have taken the same course the same time, but didn't. But that is no reason I'm not thar. What about the time you said they had been finds about Christ? I wouldn't be surprised you did make a power of fine wheat then. You know they say, wheat sowed in the dark nights of October always does best. Now, you remember that it; have looked plum thru the almanick several times to see when the dark nights of October come our bet. I want to handle the rhino; I know I've got you! Zounds a Bob Logan, the Clerk; I reckon he can find out in a minute. Here, sir, this passage."

Hodge heard nothing Gerald had just said, except his allusion to the Clerk, etc.; for as soon as the latter had ensued his search among the Psalms, he scrambled like a squirrel among the leaves of Revelations.

"Hallos, Logan!" continued Gerald, "come here." When this official approached, he proceeded: "I and Hodge has made a bet. He stands on a silver dollar, and I'm to put down a gold piece which was turned to a pillow of salt. We've been transacting that matter in the Psalms and Revelations, and can't find the place what treats on that topcock. Now, old fellow, just be kind enough to find it, and I'll ask no more favors of your clerkship."

"It is no use to take the Bible," said Logan. "I thought every Sunday-school boy and girl knew it was Lot's wife they rubbed the loins into so exclusively. I've heard it read in church, in the operation, it was preserved her safe and sound through all the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah. Lynch reports it was but the other day he saw her standing in the suburbs of Sodom or Gomorrah—one, he could not tell which. G. pr'ounce it as there, salts a-ever, with the smell of fire and brimstone strong about her. He thinks from the way he was married it was a clandestine affair; his biography and autobiography are silent on that subject; and when Lot and his spouse and children may settle, why your Captain Lynch flung into boat, can't more than guess. Now, you see, I'm off to court."

"Here is the document, gentlemen" (holding up the Bible), "every one 'spurgated, I believe, indeed! I must give up my money on the toy of a man which never reads his Bible, and wouldn't keep one. I'll be bound, if you search all the people in Court on't and what children which gits their brains from the Bible, you wouldn't number a dozen! and what the great Captain Lynch may say! I was a good thing he wa'n't sent into Utay, Brigham Young, and Mormons. Why, there are as plenty, and what I hope there will be no lack of the real testimony in the Bible. Now, you see, I must knock under to all this rigmarole, with the Word of Truth here in my hand, though right hard to split out! Here, Jack, you scoundrel, come up the corners, and look closely. I am afraid it ain't in here, these two or three leaves, and when the end is missin'; you will certainly find it in the last book, Revelations, if not torn out."

After a long and tedious search by the Clerk, he found it in the 19th Chapter 26th verse of Genesis, and read as follows: "But his (Lot's) wife looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt."

"Let's see her," said Hodge, taking the book from the Clerk. After reading enough to satisfy himself, he continued: "Gerald, I'll try your money, Mr. Gerald, and I reckon it is the first time your Bible kernis' ever brung you the needful."

"I've lost nothing on it yet," returned Gerald as he placed the money in his pocket.

"I'll be dod, gentlemen," Hodge continued, "if I am entirely satisfied yet. There has been so much hard swearin' on that book" (pointing to Logan's Bible) "I wouldn't be surprised if the truth was not pretty considerably roundsided-ways. I have seen men swear to a mule a mile outen his den take their corporate oath on that!"

"I sha'n't argure any more pints with you; but whenever you feel like staking your jagement on Scripture, just let me know. I'll take stock," said Gerald.

"I wouldn't be surprised if you wah't vain after this. Some of these days you'll meet up with a man who knows something, and get the starch taken outen you properly. Come, treat arter your good luck," said Hodge. There was a unanimous and simultaneous movement for the lick-log.

COCK-FIGHTING AMONG THE ATHENIANS.

On 26th ultimo the police of Boston made a decent upon a prohibited place for a portion of the society of modern Athens—a cock-pit under the North-End Theatre. There the cock-fights are constantly came off in this place. On this occasion a New York cock was brought to fight against a Boston cock for $1000 a side, and all the fancy were present. A number of arrests were made.

We illustrate the scene as part of the history of the times, and as a curious instance of the manner in which the amusements of another, and, let us hope, a more savage age, are still preserved among the learned, the witty, and the refined Athenians.

LITERARY.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers have issued a new and cheap edition of the "Miscellaneous Works" of Miss Mulock, originally published by them half a dozen years ago. The volume contains "A LIFE FOR A LIFE," "A FAIRY TALE," embodying the old Scottish legend of a child carried away by Fairy land, and restored to the earth after seven years of detention; "THE HEIR," a brief tale for boys; and "BEHALAH AND THE GYPSIES," a touching story of the Life of the Gypsies. Each of these tales is admirable in its way; and though written some years ago, they all give promise of those powers which have since gained for the "Author of JOHN HALIFAX" the foremost place among the female novelists of the day. The first of these stories, with a slight change of title, is likewise announced in another form in the new illustrated volume, by Messrs. Mayhew & Baker, of Boston.

WASHINGTON LIFE.—THE LAST PRESIDENTIAL RECEPTION.

The Tribune correspondent thus describes the last reception at the White House:

"The current does into the East room, where few persons are—for it is but after eight—the company, owing to the music of the Marine Band stationed in the anteroom. Soon the anteroom begins to fill by degrees, but as I have said the few notabilities of the evening appear. The diplomatic corps was well represented. I noticed only two Senators, and one Judge of the Supreme Court. Few persons from the Southern Congressmen were present. Maynard, of Tennessee, with his pale, intense face, was conspicuous among the few. Old Commodore Stewart was in the throng. Sir Edmund Head, Governor General of Canada was at a neighboring side seat, and Judge Russell, of our city, was also present. Mr. Buchanan looked well, and I caught a glimpse of him since the hour when he hung entranced over Judge Douglas's speech in the Senate. Mrs. Buchanan was in sweet, but as I have not Jenkins's knowledge of seasonable fabrics, I am not able to describe accurately her fair, slender girl, among whose curls white flowers were in repute, while in the back hair was conspicuous by her white dress impressed me. A tall brunette in pink satin, trimmed with white lace, attracted many glances. But only one or two of the Court ladies of Washington were present, and the Cabinet ladies were absent. The Cabinet officers were present, and looked for the most part like many, many years, in faded brown, black lace long gray over-lies, and I saw a respectable old lady in a shawl on. Here's wife, dressed as for a family tea-party, her white farmer's gown in her hand. Mrs. Buchanan's dress, arm in arm, we have but very recently exchanged with the President, and I looked out this night for the President.

PICCOLOMINI AND THE PRESIDENT.

"But who is this rising out of a cloud of pale yellow lace, a red rose in her hair, a red rose blooming and drooping beneath her waist, her hair simply braided over her head, wearing no ornament but the diamonds for all the world, escorted by the handsome Minister. Her sister, plainer, and more dressed, follows. Everybody asks then who whose dress she duplicated, follows. After making the circuit of the room, and receiving the Mayor it is learned about that the private dressed is with Miss Lane, and in due course of time she is presented to the President to her, for she had her reception in the same room with the President.

"She sat upon a sofa, and the President, the Countess, a fat old lady in black silk, upon her right, her sister upon the left, and the Minister and Mrs. Buchanan, whose bald head and black face were equally expressive of the hatred of Slavery, and the sympathy for the Slave was the Sardinian Minister, on the other Judge Russell, and Mayor Berdell, and Mrs. Lane, and Miss Lane, and Mrs. Lane's pretty ways," said another. "Which is she?" asked a dozen, pressing to the front.

"Precisely as the whole might have been seen the night before at Madame Piccolomini's concert, but Piccolomini? Yes, with the Swiss upon his arm—his maiden sister, and Mrs. Buchanan, and Mrs. Lane, and Miss Lane, and Judge Russell, and Mayor Berdell, and Mrs. Buchanan, who has greatly improved in courtliness and politeness which she never had before, and Mrs. Lane, over his eye, after conversing with the younger sister for some moments, he made a graceful bow to the person about, to the effect that he did not understand and could not speak French, and Piccolomini understood. Her eyes. Mr. Buchanan went on to say that he did speak some months ago, and that he was glad that he had no ears nor tongue now. (His worst enemies, who speak of him as he has treated them, never say that he was ever.) Piccolomini smiled and used her eyes again. Then the President laid his hand upon his heart, and said that he was very glad to see her, and that he would not intrude upon her time any longer. Piccolomini rose. Here the little company broke up, and Piccolomini upon the arm of Mrs. Lane was translated to her, only those who have seen her in Traviata can form any idea of the graceful pride she has since displayed, and which did appear, but not Mrs. Lane initiated her into the mysteries of Washington by shook hands with the several members of the family and disappeared.

HOW THE PRESIDENT LIVES.

The Tribune correspondent says: "Miss Excellency James Buchanan is an old gentleman of some seventy years of age, and is known to the world at large in his bachelor mutterings, of Revil and rather hectic complexion, and with the fire of his Scotch blood in the glad threads in the glass bits of the glass birds of paradise made in Germany, and in the Presidential spectacles. His manners are extremely courteous and affable, more especially to ladies, and he is known to delight in everyone the small scandals and bobs gossip of the capital. There is something of the old school about his address, for I believe he has not one familiar friend except, perhaps, Mr. Cass, who is not at least a dozen years his senior. He is fond of his glass of wine, and his dinners are seldom addressed by him as 'Miss Harriet,' and, putting himself out of the way to please a lady, as long as best he can without either sympathy or association. Never has there been in the White House a more bachelor-ous occupant; he reposes no confidence even in his Cabinet officers, but transacts the business of the country with they put before him for signature. His seldom leaves the White House except to take his daily walk, or on one or two hours a day in discharging drudgeries of detail, which he cannot trust to the hands of his subordinates in the departments. Again and again, on every possible occasion, he declares that he is not a candidate for a second term, and that he will not accept a renomination. He supposes he is retiring to Wheatland, and he has written to his friend, Mr. Lane, to have a house built for him, with much lighter and less burdened hearts than we have witnessed during the last few days, and with more beneficent results."

MRS. DOUGLAS'S LAST BALL.

A Herald correspondent says that Mrs. Douglas received her guests on Tuesday, as she was labouring under the effects of a severe cold. She looked very well in a white tulle with a trimming of rosebuds, and wore but few ornaments. Her head-dress was simple, but very appropriate to her the guests, who pressed forward in crowds to be introduced to her. The supper was the most splendid which entered were the following: Mrs. Cutts, mother of Mrs. Douglas, dressed in black velvet and white moire; Mrs. Hoover, wife of the ex-Marshal of the District, dressed in rose-colored tarlatan; Mrs. Judge Douglas, wife of the brother of the evening, attired in white tulle, with a wreath of rosebuds; Mrs. Judge Bates, wife of the Westchester county, New York, dressed in blue silk and white lace; Mrs. Judge Campbell, wife of the Judge of the Supreme Court, dressed in white tulle with a trimming of rosebuds; Mrs. Judge Bates, wife of the Judge, dressed in white tulle and trimmed with innumerable loops of white ribbon and rosebuds; Mrs. Judge Bates, wife of Judge Bates, and Mrs. Dan. Gitts, dressed in white embroidered muslin, trimmed with rosebuds; Mrs. Judge Bates, wife of Judge Bates, an interesting young lady, dressed in white; Mrs. Lieutenant Hunter, wife of Lieutenant Hunter, of the Navy, dressed in white tulle and trimmed with rosebuds and gold flowers; Miss Bridge, of New York, dressed in white tulle and trimmed with rosebuds ment quite as bad. It was on the first day he arrived in Washington a party of friends at Willard's Hotel, was sitting with a gentleman who had probably imbibed on him some coming or getting himself up a little expressive the necessity of getting himself up a little expressive of the event in Washington, where he was to play a high official part; so the Judge turned out in a splendid suit of black, a glossy silk hat, and, mirabile dictu! a pair of patent leather boots. The latter item was evidently too much for him; for his ready, nay conversation all evaporated, and he sat there, silent, abashed, and most, but restless, disturbed, and uncomfortable, as though something he could not get rid of was about to happen. He begged permission of the company to retire for a few minutes, and when he returned he was in the same dress, but with his boots off. He felt the change, but was satisfied that he had been persuaded not to wear patent leather boots in Washington. But the next time he left, and he felt pretty much as Hardscrabble felt when he was made to put on a clean shirt, he finished was himself again, and the company had as much reason to rejoice at the change as Hardscrabble escaped from the 'dammed white' of his patent leathers. Though I never saw Judge Advocate-General Holt in a scrape, you can find him all day in the Supreme Court, and see him, as I do, sit down to his desk and listen till two o'clock, and then walk off to his house without once asked a friend of his the other day. "I shall retire on the 4th of March," he replied, with a sigh.

"So he is one of those men who revel in work, if he can't need and only enough, to keep him busy. He trusted Judge is forgiven by the jury would for the good reason that in an intermingled, respectable suit he let the handsome and well-bred wife. Locky for him that he has so elegant a husband as to be able to appear at the interesting ceremonies of Ice Majesti. Mrs. Black has not got a face to look at this kind.

BODY-SNATCHING IN THE WEST.

We read in the Cincinnati Enquirer: "The principal business of body-snatching in the city is done by the two men now in custody. The third is only employed by the other when they receive for each 'subject' is from $12 to $15, although this is the usual price paid. Many of the subjects sent from here are brought to the city by the four colleges each winter, which, deducting the expenses of transportation, &c., will not yield the body-snatcher more than $8 or $10—not a good deal of work among the many unemployed in this disreputable business. The bodies are taken from the tombs and disinterred, the fresh of course being removed in the process, and packed into a box, and shipped off either by express or other similar deodorizing substance, tightly headed up, and metal away at will. Sometimes they are sent by express river, outside of the city, and the contents emptied into the river. Thus the body-snatcher is relieved of suspicion, and saves the propriety of some one of the students, and after he has procured his appointment to the city, he is ever, if gross his 'back offend' in some country town, where the professor will take the body off his hands.

Persons will be interested to learn the prices of other articles in the money which it pins in their purse. Below is a list of necessaries, comforts and luxuries of life. The body-snatcher fails on compunctions, and respects neither age, sex nor condition. It is a calculating man and cents, and when he gets 'short,' or run-day comes round, or his bottle is empty, he 'goes for a subject,' as coons is, all he has to do to repeat the collector to 'call necessary;' and he might get his whole household in funds by robbing the grave!

THE LAST GOLDEN BODKIN.

"It is well known that the body of the unfortunate girl, Kate Hanson, for whose murder Cooper was tried, was on trial all last week, furnished an interesting subject for a lecture with great brilliancy and success. Many have been anatomically prepared, and are now hanging in one of the medical institutions in the city. The murder of the resurrectionists Thornley might, the skeleton of her equally unfortunate friend has been in use for some time, been occupying a place by the side of that of the murdered girl.

The body-snatchers who are now in custody for stealing the body of Kate Hanson, are known among us "Tipsy," to accompany us in the following account of their time. Tipsy' went the way 'that all good negroes go,' and the night following his death his companions Dayo and Jones stole his body and sold it to a college! The rest of which he had taken charge of, needs a corpse to finally bind himself.

A DOUBTFUL CONVERT.

We read in the Boston Herald: "A cruel robbery was perpetrated at Mr. Barnum's Museum, Ann-st., at the corner of North and Ferry streets, yesterday noon. A young man was attending at the museum, and during the early was deeply interested in the religious exercises. He sat immediately behind Mr. Barnum's friend Lewis Wilder, and during the singing looked over the Deacon's hymn-book. In the midst of the services he passed the Deacon to the door and informed him that he had been robbed of his pocket-book. The Deacon replied that he was sorry to hear it, but that it was a judgment upon him in some way, and asked to have the way to salvation pointed out to him. The good man was soon surrounded by those in the case of the young convert, and addressed to him some pious counsel. Soon after the Deacon left for his human heart. The young man asked what time it was, and the gentleman replied that it was ten minutes past. He went from his pocket than it was snatched from his hands, and the thief ran out of the door. The Rev. Mr. Deacon started in pursuit, and ran down North Street to Ann, but the thief could not be overtaken. He was tried: but the hypocritical rascal proved the swindler of him, and turning down into Governing Street, was soon lost to view."

PERSONAL.

A rumor is afloat, which appears to have foundation, of a marriage shortly to be solemnized in the U. S. Army. Gen. George Custis, the eloquent and accomplished grandson of Mrs. Gen. Washington, is to marry the daughter of Washington, Miss Conway.

The second son of Gen. Jesse says there is no truth in the rumor that Gen. Jesse is to be the next Governor of Texas. Gen. Jesse is to be the next Governor of Texas. Gen. Jesse is to be the next Governor of Texas.

MILAN AND GENOA.

As the present moment, when the eyes of the world are fixed on Italy, the admirable engravings of Milan and Genoa, on the preceding pages, will not be unacceptable to the readers of this journal. Before the winter of 1859-60 begins it is likely that every site depicted in the engravings will be classic ground.

The picture at the top of the preceding pages represents the city and port of Genoa, or Genova, as the Italians call it. Americans can never be indifferent to Genoa. It was a Genoese who discovered America; and three hundred years ago, Genoa, in point of commerce and shipping, occupied as great a position as the United States does in our day. Time was when Genoa would have been universally recognized as the ruler of the waves but for the claims of her declining rival, Venice. Ah! how such memories teach us to despise human greatness and human power!

Yet Genoa still commands respect and admiration. The one of the loveliest cities in Italy. Like Naples, it has few streets which are wide enough for carriages. Most of the thoroughfares are quite narrow, and the rule here is a tendency to stretch overhead, so that ardent lovers can beg across the lane into the room of their mistresses, and not be hardly ever prostrates to the pavement beneath. These lanes, when one comes to understand their geographical bearings, are positively delightful. They are cool at mid-summer. In them you may travel miles without once being annoyed by sun-ray or carriage dust.

As to the great streets, they are a sort of decayed and wide Broadway. They are lined on either side with palaces, which, in the vernacular, means palaces. Many of the edifices in question are in fact, palatial, and were built for persons whose rank naturally suggests the idea of splendor. But the bulk of the houses fronting on the two or three carriage streets of Genoa, though called palaces, are simply large and commodious family warehouses, not unfrequently with stores on the ground floor. Many of them are magnificent. Of these some belong to the ancient merchant-princely families of Genoa, and now constitute the support of the descendants of the original merchant-princes. These are generally divided into "apartments," as the French play a new and a very pretty word; and are chiefly remarkable for the fine rich dirt on the staircases, and the uncommonly vigorous breed of rags in the windows. As at Venice, the broad pavement of these wide streets of Genoa affords room for a number of street beggars, who are prepared to sell the "forestiere" any thing, from a lozenge to a yacht, from an Italian knife to a Genoese beauty.

The port of Genoa is naturally very safe and beautiful. One can readily understand why the city came by its naval renown. One must be less than human to resist the allurements of that pure, blue, dancing, seductive sea. Whether you wave any of Adam torn at Genoa becomes a subtler. Colour here and Auroras' fingers were but the necessary consequences of natural laws. Until very lately the monarchs of Sardinia, who, as our country readers are aware, are the kings of Genoa, reserved the bulk of their revenue from a tonnage duty levied on vessels visiting Genoa house, and I believe bartering in her meshes, poor fellow; but yet her heart had small part in his distress.

Walking one day with imperfect steps through the woods adjacent to the house, I became a little tired, and sat down upon a tree-trunk to rest, glancing my eye along their huge shafts, mossy and hoar with age, the guardians of the wood. I thought I detected a little different foliage than usually gave upon trees—a dress fluttering from behind them. Was some one watching me? I resolved to see. So picking my way softly, as I had done, I advanced toward it; but it always eluded me, still tired of pursuing it I sat down again. The sun was setting, and streaming in through the long aisles and cloaches of the wood in scarlet tongues, making the dead branches look like the fingers of skeletons of life. Lost in admiration of it, I began repeating slowly to myself those beautiful lines whose authorship I knew not:

"The splendor falls on castle walls,
And snowy summits old in story:
The long light shakes across the lakes,
And the wild cataract leaps in glory."

Are they not sonorous? I say I was repeating these when a branch swung back behind me, a hand laid upon my shoulder, and Leonora stood by me. I rose.

"It was you, then," I said, politely, "who so eluded my search?"

"Yes: the evening was so beautiful, I came to breathe the fragrance of the air;" her face belied her if she did). So we sat quite silently in contemplation of the beauties of the sky.

"It is like my life," she said, pathetically. "The sunset laird, glibing over all my hopes with a shadowy and unsubstantial glow—fading into the same those hanging troughs that shine like the lost hopes of my youth, full of a vague and lying promise. Like the veils in the mirror, more than hopes always seem a little further, a little further—until I walk along the weary life of disappointed and cursed by all; and shall go down that dark slope, into the vale beyond, unrecked by any."

I decided the time for confidence was taking, and strove to change it; but she went on. Then starting to her feet, leaning forward with her hands, her nostrils dilated and eye afire, she gave me a little push as if to throw me from her.

"You, too, are no true. You know my life, the hope and aim of it; and since I can no longer deny it, you shall hear it all. What is it to you how for that delicacy of my sex which is the protection of society? Bah! see here. I break it like this (crunching down a dry twig with her foot). I have loved you, madly, devotedly; and you, knowing the circumstances of my position, have seen me to a life of wretchedness and misery alone. You know not what you throw aside for the sake of a paint lifed creature, who—"

"God forgive you for that, Leonora. You are mad, I think."

"Heaven help me, what am I saying? I believe I am. You have driven me to it. Your indifference, nay, your hatred of me, has driven me to madness which not the stake could have forced me."

And then she changed her tone to tenderness, and caught me in spite of myself around my neck, and begged me to speak to her as in the old time.

"Have not I watched by you in your tenderness, unknown to you, hoping and praying for your restoration? Was it not I who bathed your burning sore with your table? And yet you do not look at me, I would—"

"Lady," I said, calmly—she caught me in spite of me again, and bade me stop—

"I have even watched by your shadow falling on the gravel-walk, that I might know you were near, and this is my return. Trees, fall and crush, and earth swallow me, that I live to speak these words to man!"

And I?

I was so strong in my heart—triply armed against her arts by the memory of those brute eyes and that jealous heart—that I could have laughed in my own ear; for having been once deceived, no earthly power could ever restore me confidence. I said, sadly,

"You ask what I have not in my power to give. Neither memory nor mind is the subject which moves my heart toward you. That love which I once lavished has settled in the grave of another, and bloom again. Ask me not, for it is beyond gift."

Very coldly and severely she drew up again—pale, magnificent, erect.

"Sir, you mistake; I am no beggar of that boon. In a moment of anguish I have spoken words which I beg you to forget; your honor, certainly, will blot out all memory of them. Our emotions and speech are sometimes beyond control. As for me, with me; the melancholy feelings of my heart have led me to an independence which I shall ever regret. Farewell, Sir."

I would have accompanied her home, since night was falling; but she waved me away with a proud, perilous gesture, saying,

"Our paths are widely different. Sir, Go in peace!"

She went; and I have never seen her from that hour. I believe she is still there—a life of sorrow and utter indolence.

As for my life, she has brought to my heart that peace and happiness which Leonora, with all her passion, never could. When I asked her hand in marriage I told her the history of my former love with her cousin, and she has wept with me over the memory of that unfortunate girl. Whether that to nook nor any corner of my heart concealed aught save her—no door shut but where she might go in and dwell forever. It does not hold the memory of that troubled love; but it is an quiet and serene as the eyes beneath the sea.

Yes, she will walk with me the path in life I go; and groping blindly, but guiding me the more surely by that inner sense which I never can obtain. So it is that, looking back upon those former years from that tower of strength, my heart is glad. Those steps which look like the track of a wanderer in the desert, without hope, or object, or end; and never more shall the follies of the world or the illusions tempt my straying feet; and though others look for love and affection in the eyes of their beloved it is not there I look, for never shall they speak to me until that happy time when she shall see again, not through a glass darkly, but in the spirit, face to face.

I WOULD NOT USE SO HARSH A WORD.

I would not use so harsh a word,
I would not say, He stole;
Let not such language here be heard;
Display more self-control.
An urchin may be said to steal
A pocket-handkerchief,
No hesitation we can feel
In calling him a thief.

A man may steal a horse, a sheep,
An ox, an ass, a pig;
We hold to have a fellow cheap—
We call a rig a prig.
Of stealing gold-dust we may talk,
Or such an one, may say
Stole Port St. Peters, who did walk
With certain trunks away.

The servant you may felon call
Who bolts with your plate;
Your lawyer, when he sunk your all,
Did but appropriate.
He stole your business so severe
For rogues of lower range,
Such as the boy you sent for beer
Who pocketed your change.

Conveyancers, if they the trust
Of your estate betray,
By no means steal it—only just
What the wise call convey.
Solicitors, your cash who use,
Ye clients, though bereft
Of all your substance, don't accuse
Of shameful conduct theft.

As Conquerors who operate
Upon a mighty scale,
So lawyers, when they speculate
With clients' funds, should fail,
Widows and orphans dispossess,
But say not that they rob;
You could affirm no more nor less
Of any vulgar snob.

Respect the daring magnitude,
The vastness of their crime;
Deduce not, with expressions rude,
Those spoilers so sublime.
High as the eagle, Bapine's bird,
Aspires not such as you.
I would not use so harsh a word,
I would not say, He stole.

THE GIANT WHO HAD NO HEART IN HIS BODY.

A NEW FAIRY TALE, FROM THE NORSE.

Once on a time there was a king who had seven sons, and he loved them so much that he could never bear to be without them all at once, but one must always stay with him. Now, when they were grown up, six were to set off to woo, but as for the youngest, his father kept him at home, and the others were to bring back a pringes for him to the palace. So the king gave the six the finest clothes they ever set eyes on, and the best horses to ride from them a long way off, and each had his horse, which cost money, and his servant, which cost as they set off. Now, when they had been to many palaces, and seen many princesses, at last they came to a king who had a very beautiful one, and the king's daughters they had never seen, and so they fell to wooing them, each one, and when they had got them for sweet-hearts, they set off home again, but they quite forgot that they were to bring back with them a sweet-heart for Jimmy, their brother, who staid at home, for they were over head and ears in love with their own sweethearts.

But when they had gone a little on their way, they passed close by a steep hill-side, like a wall, where the giant's house was, and there came the giant out, and set his eyes upon them, and turned them all into stone, princes and princesses and all. Now, the king waited and waited for his six sons, but he saw not one coming; they staid so long, that so he fell into great trouble, and said he should never know what was to be got of them.

"And if I had not you left," he said to Boots, "I would live no longer, so fail or sorrow am I for my children's disappearing."

"Well, but now I've been thinking to ask your leave to set out and look after them, for I've a mind I'm thinking of," said Boots.

"Nay, nay!" said the father; "that leave you shall never get, for then you would stay away too."

But Boots had set his heart upon it; go he would; and he tagged and prayed so long that the king was forced to let him go. Now, you must know the king had no other horse to give Boots but an old broken-down jade, for his six other sons and their train had carried off all his horses; but Boots did not care a pin for that, he sprang up on his sorry old steed.

"Farewell, father," said he: "I'll come back, never fear, and like enough I shall bring my six brothers back with me;" and with that he rode off.

So, when he had gone a while, he came to a Raven, which lay in the road and flapped its wings, and was not able to get out of the way, it was so starved.

"Oh, dear friend," said the Raven, "give me a little food, and I'll help you again at your utmost need."

"I haven't much food," said the Prince, "and I don't see how you'll ever be able to help me much; but still I can spare you a little." I see you're sad."

So he gave the raven some of the food he had brought with him.

Now, when he had gone a bit farther, he came to a brook, and in the brook lay's great Salmon, which had got upon a dry place and couldn't get about, and could not get into the water again.

"Oh, dear friend," said the Salmon to the Prince, "help me out into the water again, and I'll help you again at your utmost need."

"Well, well," said the Prince, "I do; you'll give me will not be great, I dare say, but it's a pity you should lie there and choke;" and with that he shot the fish out into the stream again.

After that he went a long, long way, and there met him a Wolf, which was so famished that it lay and crawled along the road on its belly.

"Dear friend," said the wolf, "give me horse," said the Wolf; "I'm so hungry that the wind whistles through my ribs; I've had nothing to eat these two years."

"No," said Boots, "this will never do; first I came to a raven, and I was forced to give him my food; next I came to a salmon, and him I had to help into the water again; and now you will have my horse. I see how it's done, that it is, I'm sure I should have nothing to ride to."

"Dear friend," said the wolf, "you can help me," said Greylegs the wolf, "you can ride upon my back, and I'll help you again in your utmost need."

"Well, but I shall get from you, you will not be great, I'll be bound," said the Prince: "but you may take my horse, since you are so importunate."

So when the wolf had eaten the horse, Boots took the hit and put it into the wolf's jaw, and laid the saddle on his back, and now the wolf was his servant, after what he had got inside, that he set off with Boots like nothing. So after he had never ride-ben before.

"Now we have gotten a bit further," said Greylegs, "I'll show you the Giant's house."

So after a while they came to it.

"See, here is the Giant's house," said the Wolf; "and see, here are your six brothers, whom the Giant has turned into stone; and see here are their six bikes, and there's yonder is the door, and in at that door you must go."

"Nay, nay! I'm going to go," said the Prince; "he'll take my life."

"Nai ai!" said the Wolf; "when you get in you'll find a Princess, and she'll tell you what to do to make an end of the Giant. Only mind and do as she bids you."

Well, Boots went in; but, truth to say, he was very much afraid. When he came in the Giant was away, but all the rooms were full of fine things, just as the Wolf had said, and so lovely a princess Boots had never seen in all his life.

"Oh, Heaven help you! whence have you come?" said the Princess, as she saw him; "it will surely be your life if the Giant can think of it when he's at home. Giant who lives here, for he has no heart in his body."

"Well, well!" said Boots; "but now that I am here, I may as well try what I can do with him; and I will see if I cannot free my brothers, who are standing, turned to stone, out of doors; and you, dear, I will try to help out of this."

"Well, if you must, you must," said the Princess; "and as let as see if we can't hit on a plan. Now, you must do as I tell you, and mind and listen to what he and I talk about. But, pray, do as said in a minute."

So he crept under the bed, and he had scarce got well underneath it before the Giant came.

"Ha!" cried the Giant, "I smell, I smell, a child of Christian blood there is in the house!"

"Yes, I have had a little boy here, Princess, "for there came a magpie flying with a man's bone, and let it fall down the chimney. I made all the haste I could to get it, but all one got to the end, the small dosn't go off so soon."

So the Giant said no more about it, and when night came, they went to bed. After they had lain a while, the Princess said,

"There is a thing I should be so glad to ask you about, if I only dared."

"What thing, my love?" asked the Giant.

"Only where it is you keep your heart, since you don't carry it about you," said the Princess.

"Ah! that's the thing you'll be wanting to ask about; but if you must know, it lies under the apple-tree," said the Giant.

"Ho! ho!" said Boots to himself, under the bed; "then we'll soon see if we can't find it."

Next morning the Giant got up early early, and strode off to the wood; but she was hardly out of the house before Boots was up and at work to look under the door-sill for his heart; but the more they dug, and the more they hunted, the less could they find it.

"He has hidden us this time," said the Princess; "but we'll try him once more."

So she picked all the prettiest flowers she could find, and strewed them over the door-sill, and they had all just got in right place again; and when the time came for the Giant to come home again, Boots crept under the bed, and the Princess under, back came the Giant.

Snuff—snuff, went the Giant's nose. "My eyes and limbs, what a smell of Christian blood there is in here," said he.

"I know there is," said the Princess, "for there came a magpie flying with a man's bone in his bill, and let it fall down the chimney. I made as much haste as I could to get it out, but I dare say it's that you smell.

So the Giant held his peace, and said no more about it. A little while after, he asked who it was that had strewed flowers about the door-sill.

"Oh, I, of course," said the Princess.

"And, pray, what's the meaning of all this?" said the Giant.

"Ah!" said the Princess, "I'm so fond of you that I couldn't help strewing them, when I knew that your heart lay under there."

"You don't say so," said the Giant; "but after all it doesn't lie there at all."

So when they went to bed again in the evening, the Princess asked the Giant again where his heart was, for she said she would so like to know.

"Well," said the Giant, "if you must know, it lies away yonder in the cupboard against the wall."

"So, so," thought Boots and the Princess, "then we will soon try to find it."

Next morning the Giant was away early, and strode off to the wood, and as soon as he was gone Boots and the Princess were in the cupboard hunting for his heart, but the more they sought for it, the less they found it.

"Well," said the Princess, "we'll just try him once more."

So she decked out the cupboard with flowers and garlands, and when the time came for the Giant to come home, Boots crept under the bed again.

Then back came the Giant.

Snuff—snuff—snuff! "My eyes and limbs, what a smell of Christian blood there is in here!"

"I know there is," said the Princess; "for a little while since there came a magpie flying with a man's bone in his bill, and let it fall down the chimney. I made as much haste as I could to get it out, but I dare say it's that you smell.

So the Giant held his peace, and said no more about it. A little while after, he asked who it was that had strewed flowers about the door-sill.

"And, pray, what's the meaning of all this?" said the Giant.

"Ah!" said the Princess, "I'm so fond of you that I couldn't help strewing them, when I knew that your heart lay under there."

"You don't say so," said the Giant; "but after all it doesn't lie there at all."

So when they went to bed again in the evening, the Princess asked the Giant again where his heart was, for she said she would so like to know.

"Well," said the Princess, "I will just try him once more."

So she decked out the cupboard with flowers and garlands, and when the time came for the Giant to come home, Boots crept under the bed again.

Then back came the Giant.

Snuff—snuff—snuff! "My eyes and limbs, what a smell of Christian blood there is in here!"

So the Giant held his peace, and said no more about it. A little while after, he asked who it was that had strewed flowers about the door-sill.

"Oh, I, of course," said the Princess.

"And, pray, what's the meaning of all this?" said the Giant.

"Ah!" said the Princess, "I'm so fond of you that I couldn't help strewing them, when I knew that your heart lay under there."

"You don't say so," said the Giant; "but after all it doesn't lie there at all."

THE LATE FIRE IN BROOKLYN.

On Sunday morning, 6th inst., at about 4 A.M., the corner house, Fulton Avenue and Elm Place, Brooklyn, was discovered to be on fire. The fire appears to have originated in the second or third story. The ground floor was occupied as a confectionery store. The rest of the building was the residence of a family of the name of Gill. Mr. Gill himself was absent from the city; his brother and a gentleman of the name of Graves were sleeping in the house. They state that they were awakened by the smoke about four in the morning. Mr. Graves tied the bed-clothes together, and endeavored to let himself down by them; they gave way, and he fell to the sidewalk, though without sustaining fatal injuries. Mr. T. Gill, on rising from his bed, leaped out of the window and was much hurt. Both he and Mr. Graves appear to have been paralyzed by panic.

The first firemen who arrived on the spot heard cries from persons in the interior of the building and endeavored to make their way up stairs. They were prevented by the dense smoke and flame, and were compelled to retreat. Before they could procure ladders to reach the windows it was too late. The few by-standers who were present report that they saw a girl, who proves to have been a servant, get out of a fourth story window, and endeavor to let herself down by the bed-clothes. Just as she was leaving the window the flames burst out of it; she was forced to let go her hold, and she fell to the ground, dislocating her thigh and otherwise injuring herself—It is feared, fatally. Mrs. Gill herself was seen, in an imploring attitude, at the window of her room. Her cries were distinctly heard by the persons outside. Once she approached the window as if to make her escape. But the next moment she fell backward; and five or six minutes afterward, when the fire had been so far subdued as to permit the firemen to enter the building, she, and her two little children, and the maid-servant were all found dead on the floor of the bedroom, near the window. The verdict of the doctors was, that they had perished by suffocation. The children were somewhat burned, and all were blackened by the fire; but it appeared that those injuries could not have destroyed life, and the probability is that they were inflicted after death.

The frightful catastrophe should be a warning to every one to exercise unusual care in guarding against fire. The building in which these poor creatures lived was saved. Yet at least four lives were lost, and two others are in a precarious condition. Every well-ordered house should have a fire-escape outside of the building. A ladder, securely fastened at the top, and placed against a window so bolted on the inside that burglars could not open it from outside, is an excellent thing; it will be still further improved if a piece of canvas be stretched along the ladder on the under side: so that by having a few pillows down first, even young children may be allowed to slide down without touching the bars. The English have a fire-escape which is a sort of rope-ladder, fastened at the top and let down by cutting a cord. Any of these are better than no escape at all.

THE OPEN POLAR SEA.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

DETROIT, January, 1859.

IN running over your valuable Weekly for January 29, I find the notice of a new Arctic Expedition. I am sorry to say it is a great mistake in sending a sailing vessel. Nothing can be done without steam; for what can you do with a sailing vessel in a calm or light winds? A good propeller is the craft for my choice. There is plenty of coal and wood in that country.

I was in the Polar Sea several seasons with Captain Scoresby, Jun., and was in that open sea. Our orders were to get whales, and not to explore. Captain Scoresby made a proposal to the British Government to explore the Polar region; but they could not agree, so he declined the undertaking of the surveys.

Captain Scoresby and I fully agree that there is a large open Polar Sea about seven degrees around the Pole. The compass has no action over it. We have just reason for so stating. The amphibious tribe can and live under the ice—they must have clear water to spout in. We never find them in the south waters, only single large whales scattered here and there. They are all, except the sperm, up the country on regular feeding banks, where the water is green and dirty-looking. Seals we fell in with when we first made the ice, about the 6th of April. The best time of the season for killing seals is when it is very cold, and ice is making fast.

One reason we were burst for about seven weeks. About the middle of May we were in lat. 79° 18′ N., on good fishing ground. Got four whales the first day. Saw of whales, four, six, seven, and eight feet—whalebone all about the middle size. It became calm, freezing hard, and we got no more whales. The ice made to fast in four days that the whales, and unicorns, etc., left us: the ice was too strong: they could not get vent to blow. We are confident they go north, where it is more temperate, and where the sea does not freeze for the year round. Make a fair calculation of the great volcanic powers and boiling springs that are in operation in the Polar regions, and particularly in the eastern hemisphere. These may have some effect on the water, for there are no such large icebergs in East Greenland as there are in the western seas.

I remain yours respectfully,

AN INTERVIEW WITH BARON HUMBOLDT.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

BERLIN, 1859.

* * * * YESTERDAY, through the kindness of the American Minister, Governor Wright, we had the pleasure of an interview with Baron von Humboldt, at his residence in this city. You are probably aware that for years Humboldt has been more accessible to Americans than any other people, partly because he is conscious of the deep interest we, as a nation, feel in him, but chiefly on account of his sympathy with our republican institutions, and his love of freedom in its highest, noblest sense. Till within a short time a note addressed to him by an American, accompanied by the card of our Minister, would procure an interview. An acquaintance, amounting almost to friendship, has sprung up between our wide representative and himself; and several times, even when his state of health would scarcely warrant it, he has at the solicitation of the Governor met the Americans at the legation, and they have been presented to him. During the last few months, however, his feebleness has prevented him from making or even receiving many visits, and absolute seclusion has been at times the fiat of his physician.

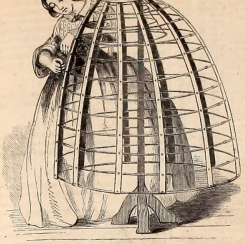
Last week, Friday, Governor Wright called at his residence to inquire after his health, and finding it improving, left word with his servant that he should be pleased to present an American lady and gentleman, and the grandson of John Quincy Adams (a young man pursuing the study of law in the University here) to his Excellency at any hour designated. The next morning the servant brought word that the Baron would be happy to see us at twelve o'clock the following Monday. At the hour appointed we stepped before his house, which is not a very imposing edifice, being but two stories, and perfectly plain. A few years ago it was to be sold, and Humboldt feared he would be obliged to vacate his old apartments; when a wealthy banker stepped forward, purchased it, and sent the Baron a life lease. We were received at the door by the servant, who conducted us through the anteroom and library, packed round with books and loaded with curiosities from every quarter of the globe, to the study, which was plainly but comfortably furnished in the simplest style. The Baron received us very cordially as we came in, offering his hand to each in succession, and then, leading the way, had us all sit close round his arm-chair, like children at the feet of a patriarch. In stature he is below medium size, but erect in plain black, and wears a large white handkerchief about the neck to protect his throat. He did not seem as feeble as I supposed; many men of seventy appear as aged, and remember his ninetieth, year is rolling by; his step was not tottering, nor did his mind appear to have yielded a whit to time. His eye is dark blue, not fiery, but bright as a boy's; and in his conversation his face lights up till you almost forget his age. The most striking feature is his massive forehead, broad, deep, and overhanging. Sealed with learning accumulated during almost a century, and even now holding its treasures perfectly available.

Our conversation was carried on partly in English and partly in German, he speaking English very well, but understanding the German sounds rather better on account of a slight defect in his hearing. He spoke of his love for America and Americans, and of their kindly interest in him. In referring to a present lately received from the President, and to his letter of acknowledgment, in which he had spoken in the highest terms of the American Minister, he remarked: "What I said about your Excellency in my letter to Mr. Buchanan is true, and what we all think." A compliment worthy of our representative, and which could not have come from a more gratifying source. He also asked Governor Wright if he could send him a copy of the President's Message, adding that he had read it in the English papers, but feared it might have been mutilated. Governor Wright took occasion to thank him for his autograph, which he had expressed his willingness to give him for a lady friend, when Humboldt turned to my wife and said: "I should be very happy, madame, to put my autograph to my portrait for you; and shall I write my name simply, or can I have the pleasure of writing, 'remembrance of Humboldt?'" This morning we received the photograph, and below his has written, "Homage of affection from Baron von Humboldt." The only Germanism I noticed was his compliming us on our ability in speaking his language; which perhaps was to be accounted for, because we talked very little. We sat and looked, and thought what a lovely old man he was, so simple and modest; one whose greatness has not made his nobleness of heart, but nobleness of heart has rendered still greater.

On parting he followed us to the door, shook hands with all, and remarked to Mr. Adams that he wished he would send him a letter, and would like to remember that the grandson of President Adams had called upon him. While lingering a few moments in the library to see the books, the Baron came out to show us a very interesting specimen of copper, and turned so long to talk in the cold room that we were impelled to intimate our fears for his health. Again we took him adieu and closed our interview. He can not last much longer. His advanced age forbids the hope. He says himself that he shall die during the winter.

We can never forget our visit, nor, I think, will it hereafter be deemed a light privilege to have seen and talked familiarly in his own home with the immortal Humboldt.

SHOCKING SCENE AT A FIRE IN BROOKLYN, N. Y., ON FEBRUARY 6, 1859.



THE "INDESTRUCTIBLE" SKIRT.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

ARTICLE IV.

THOMSON'S CROWN-SKIRT FACTORY.

THE accompanying illustrations will introduce our readers to another of the great manufacturing establishments of New York—Thomson's Skirt Factory; an establishment which provides healthy and lucrative employment for one thousand girls, and furnishes an indispensable article of dress to from three thousand to four thousand ladies daily.

The manufacture of hoop skirts has been heretofore described in this journal. We need only add here that the peculiarities of Messrs. Thomson's manufactures appear to be an "eyelet fastening," by which the tapes and hoops of skirts are fastened, and which is said to be industriously; a watch-spring contrivance, by whose aid a "graceful backward fall" is said to be given to the dress; a "slide" which will not slip; and a "skirt-supporter," which obviates pressure on the lower part of the trunk, and throws the weight of all the skirts upon the shoulders.

The number of girls employed by the Messrs. Thomson will average, as we said, one thousand. The wages of these girls vary, of course, according to their experience, industry, and skill. Smart girls, we are told, can easily make $4 a week, and a salary as high as $16 is paid at least in one instance. Four dollars a week, it must hardly be remarked, is very fair remuneration for labor which is neither excessive nor unhealthy. Most of the girls who work in this factory have been taken from the ranks of plain sewers, and educated to the hoop skirt manufacture. The whole establishment is under the superintendence of a woman, who from the first has exercised control over the employment of hands, the arrangement of work, and the remuneration paid. Even the accountants of the factory are women.

The quantities of raw material consumed in these large establishments are enormous. Of steel-spring wire over 500,000 yards, and of tape 150,000 yards, are used per week, making together a line long enough to reach from New York to Boston. Five hundred labor-saving machines of various kinds are in constant use; many of which produce effects almost magical. One clasp-cutting machine, for instance, produces the incredible number of 200 clasps a minute. Nor is this enormous supply excessive; for over 250,000 clasps, slides, and eyelets are swallowed up in hoop skirts daily.

The revilers of the hoop will thus perceive that it is, after all, an institution not wholly useless, inasmuch as in this establishment alone it feeds, clothes, and warms over one thousand females, many of whom have children or aged persons depending on them. We are glad to hear that the profits of the manufacture are going to produce yet another benefit. The Messrs. Thomson, we understand, contemplate the establishment of a library for their employés, and likewise propose to have a competent lecturer give, in one of the great halls of their establishment, a course of free lectures to the girls and their friends. This is not such a heartless age after all.

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

War Rumors—Are American Gentlemen inferior to the same Class in Europe?—Pre-eminence of American Ladies—European Belles in the United States—An American Hostess who will not receive Americans—Difficulties of getting into Good Society—A Soiree in the Faubourg St. Germain—La Coiffure Marie Louise—American Society at Paris—Death of Mr. Van Rensselaer—American extravagance Abroad, etc., etc.

PARIS, January 20, 1859.

AFTER a week of violent agitation and commotion in all Europe, it seems to be decided that, for the present, peace is not to be disturbed. It is said that, in this country, the reports from the Departments of the extreme unpopularity of the prospect of war has induced the Emperor to pause in his intentions and reconsider his daring projects, about not much given to such forbearance. But all this —is it not written in thousands of articles daily proceeding from the French and English newspapers?

I am making myself young again, and going into the world, for the sake of my friend Frank, to whom I introduced you last week, and in whom I trust you and your readers will feel an interest, as I do. I have long been endeavoring to ascertain what reason there is for the general idea that American gentlemen are inferior to others of their class in Europe in character, manners, deportment, appearance—in a word, in all that constitutes a gentleman. I so constantly hear it said, "Oh, the American women are charming, but spare me from the men!" Certainly this is not true of them in youth and early manhood; impossible to be better looking, better mannered, or more gentlemanly than Frank or others of his age and class. The deterioration must be the result of after influences too numerous and complicated to be fully dwelt upon here. I acknowledge that a few years does seem too often to transform these pleasing youths into cumbersome, loose principled, loose mannered men, who appear to look upon life either as a keen race for dollars, or a lounge in which to smoke cigars and drink brandy and water. The personal attractions of American women seem to be uncontested, and so, I think, must be their cleverness and tact, and power of moving "circumstance, the unpractical gods," to their own will and pleasure; by any one who, looking on the best circles of Paris society, sees most conspicuous there "American" or things implied there by the obstinacy and perseverance of American mothers; and I am bound to say that, in most instances, this eminence has been attained without any sacrifice of that preeminence in purity of conduct and strictness of moral principle which was formerly the proudest distinction of American women.

When I went back to the United States, ten years ago, I must say I was rather shocked at what seemed to be a change in this respect, and a rapid importation and growing exhibition of European ideas, vices, and follies; but I hope it was only a fashion and a way, put on with the coiffure and the flounces, and not affecting the true worth and right feeling of the darling creatures. But to return to Paris.

It is curious enough that the only house where I have been refused an invitation for our friend Frank is an American one, and that upon the plea of his being an "American!" The lady, who has a fine hotel, where she receives once a week all pleasant, musical, and dancing parties all the best French and English society, candidly told me that she had made it a rule not to extend her acquaintance among her own country people. There were some of these whom she had known in other days whom she continued to see; but she said, "Americans are envious and scandalous, and if one has any thing in the past to discredit one, they are sure to fasten upon and to circulate it. If my father had happened to be a grocer, or my mother a milliner, I do not wish to have the fact told in my own drawing-rooms and to those whose social position has always been so established that they would consider it as a detraction from my merits."

"No," she added, "I am sorry to refuse you, and I have no doubt your young gentleman is very nice; but I must abide by my rule."

This lady prefers English society. Other American houses will receive only French, and no English duke or lord, however magnificent, can break their resolution to exclude all his countrymen. Others, again, open their salons to all of every nation who are properly presented, or who have any claim to the distinction; and these, I must say, are the most agreeable houses, and I see this is the impression also they have made upon Frank.

We dined together last week in the Faubourg St. Germain, where the host, himself of one of the oldest French families, had married a lady with genuine American blood in her veins, and who, by that right or some other, has managed to possess herself of all the graces and virtues that can adorn and dignify her sex. It is impossible to describe the charm and fascination of a social circle such as was here assembled. One of the sisters of the house who was there, the young Countess de ——, is the beauty of the day. A blonde, rosy and round in form, with soft, large blue eyes and dimpled shoulders, and her magnificent fair hair arranged in a new way, which I must describe for the benefit of her sister beauties chez rose. The hair is all turned back from the forehead and plaited into one long, luxurious tress, which is brought around the head, and a double bow or knot, made of the tress, is placed in the middle, just above the forehead. It is called la coiffure Marie Louise, and the effect is novel, but, to the pretty, very becoming. The dress of this lady was of white tarlatane, with ten or twelve narrow flounces, each edged with black lace; over which hung also eight rich black lace veils upon the sleeves, and a sash of the same around the waist and tied in a bow in front, and a small bunch of red flowers placed low at the back of the head. I have given all those details because the costume is of the simplest, and the lady, as I said before, the "Cynthia of the minute." Another sister of the house, also a renowned beauty, appeared in a white tarlatane en-suite—a simple tulle cap with roses, and gray silk robe Montanna—and busied herself with some subscriber list we could suppose for a charity fancy sale.

The charm of these reunions is the simplicity, ease, and sociable manners which prevail, and which, in my experience, I have ever found united with the highest birth and highest breeding, and I thought Frank was compensated on this occasion for the loss of our country-woman's party—which he had been refused, and which was on the same evening.

Many of the usual American habitues of Paris are this winter at Pau, in the South, where they are amusing themselves in dancing and hunting, shooting and riding, in a manner which astonishes the more sober English and French visitors who are every year collected in that place, attracted by the beautiful scenery and salubrious climate. The recent death of Mr. Van Benschoter will throw a gloom over these festivities, which an English lady who lives there had previously described to me "as being a most memorable season in Americans."

What I can not forgive my country people is the senseless extravagance in living they indulge in wherever they go, spoiling and corrupting the habits of all around them, and making their existence ease and exacting for others who may not be so able to afford it. Now the Kentucker will have a variety of good things and good cooks—excellent game —fish from Bayonne—truffles—fruit, abundant and first-rate. I have myself been content to eat satisfied with this, but will send to Paris for their dinners and suppers; they are exorbitant even for their apartments, and exorbitant wages to servants; and so next year proportionate expenses will be so enormous as all to be quite unbearable. This lady writes to me "that the splendor of the evening parties of your country women is not to be rivaled by the splendor of their beauty." How I wish they would content themselves with letting the latter display the best charms of the women of the earth, which they owe to their natural perfections, and would not indulge in such extravagances of the toilet or the table! But it is vain to preach to them; "they will not hear my voice," etc.—very true, they hear louder voices, which persuade them that even in a provincial town like Pau they must have as much display as Laura's every week, a new dress from Roger's for every evening, their wines from Falin, and that when we leave Paris it is to return to these occupations. Adieu.

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

SUBSOIL PLOWING.

BEFORE commencing spring work it will be well to consider which lands should, and which should not, be subsoiled.

From the days of Jethro Tull until within the last twenty-five or thirty years the farmers of England were content, in common with those of other countries, to stir the immediate surface of the soil, and were not aware that a greater depth of disturbance would secure a larger and better result. Indeed, it was generally believed that the whole matter which was fertilizing plants was confined to the immediate surface, or that portion known as loam—as was given, until very recently, to the disturbed portion only—which, by the combined influences of sun, air, and decay of vegetation, changed into loam. The fact that the unstirred parts of the soil beneath these points were all to be found as good as the integrants of loam, and scarcely known, and still less so that they could not be absorbed by them, and thus go to make up their structure, and acted on by a variety of influences caused by atmospheric contact and the presence of manure, and the like, was long unknown to her. Liebig first exposed the true value of the inorganic substances of the soil, or those parts which were said to remain after the result of plowing. The farmers slowly yielded their long-cherished belief that the black portion of the soil was the food of their plants. These new doctrines gave rise to the use of a subsoil plow, which, without elevating the subsoil to the surface, disturbed it in place, and permitted a free circulation of atmosphere between its particles. The deep cuts made by the plow also acted in degree as under-drains, and permitted, under some special conditions of surface-work on the slope of hills, etc.—redundant water to pass away. Air necessarily entered, and chemical changes experienced in the surface of the soil by the subsoil were soon conditioned so as to sustain roots, and they passed into it to greater depths than had been before known. These, in turn, absorbed from the subsoil larger quantities of inorganic matter, rendered soluble by chemical changes consequent upon moisture and air. The constituents were taken into the plants above, and portions not marketable as crops, decayed in the upper soil, adding to the greasy, unctuous, organic matter new portions of inorganic food for future crops. Plants had longer roots as well as greater number of fibrils, and larger crops was the consequence. The decay of these roots in the soil left tubes to great depths; the atmosphere could come in laden with gases, ready from vegetable decomposition required by plants; rains and dews, which in a thin mere surface cultivation would be driven nature from the atmosphere, descended into the subsoils, which gradually changed color so as to take deep fawny hues in localities where previously sparse, shallow-rooted crops could be grown. All this was known to a limited extent in England before he was awakened to action; and even now, when every truly practical farmer owns a subsoil plow, he can tell you of some neighbor who cautioned him against its use, and who insisted that the deep disturbance of his soil would kill it. He manures fitter downward; forgetting that, if that were true, every soil would be the richest near the bottom of the valley—every spring would be a cesspool, and every rivulet but an organic channel-conveyance. But the wisdom of the ages has rendered the carbon and alumina of the soil, after proper exposure to atmospheric influences, capable of receiving and assimilating all the results of decay; and the value of a farm must depend upon the depth to which its surface by cultivation is rendered capable of performing this peculiar function.

Thoroughly subsoil-plowed lands soon become capable of deeper surface plowing, without injuring the crops; and if under-drained, they will, in the perfection of the very principles presented in the theory of subsoil plowing, thus still further beautifully assisted, and thus the expenses of teams, the wear and tear of agricultural implements, and the laborious toil, which the quality of every land per quantity, are so augmented thus, per bushel or per pound, they will be reduced to the minimum.

It has been said, and probably with truth, that if the subsoil plows and under-drains of England had not been introduced up to the time that the law of land under cultivation could not have sustained the population. Fifteen years ago a subsoil plow in the State of ——— as many subsoil plows as there are now foundries for casting them; and when a friend of the first inventor offered a subsoil plow he had not a neighbor who had seen one. We suppose this may be said of some farms or in every county in the United States within the last twenty-five years.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, Feb. 12, 1859.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been more freely supplied with flour, at easier prices, but the demand has been moderate. The principal varieties of Grain have been held with very great tenacity, and business has been restricted.....Cotton has been less active to-day, and has declined.....Provisions have been actively inquired for, and prices close very firmly.....Sugars, Teas, and Rice have been in limited request. Coffee and Molasses have been lightly dealt in. Prices, however, are firmly held.....Tobacco, Spices, Petroleum, Hops, Iron, Lead and Tin, Leather, Wool, Hides, Linseed, Whale, and Sperm Oils, Tallow, Tobacco, and Coal have been largely sought after and firmly held.....Fish, Fruit, Hay, Hemp, Seeds, Spices, and Whisky have been in limited request. HUMPHREYS'
Specific Homeopathic Remedies,
For Domestic and Private Use,

Stand confessedly at the head of remedial means for the use of the people. They are alike removed from the pernicious, dangerous, and repulsive nature of poisonous or old-school practice, the nauseousness of water-cure, or the intricate and perplexing obscurities of the various Homeopathic books and medicines. Containing of simple specifics for each particular disease for which they are related; put up in the form of simple sugar pellets; and prepared and purchased with great care and accuracy, they are at once the ready resources of the parent at home, the shield of the traveller abroad, and the hope of the sick everywhere.

They are the only medicines ever offered to the American people adapted to their wants in which they have confidence. Simple in their preparation, and in their adaptation, reliable, prompt, efficient, and cheap, they are the only medicines which stand fearlessly before the community, and defy the world to produce their equal.

They have been tested by the popular verdict of many years, and the sales of some of them have reached the enormous aggregate of many millions of boxes.

They are sold by druggists generally throughout the country, or sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

LIST OF SPECIFIC REMEDIES.

No. 13. Croup Pills—For Croup, Hoarse Cough, Difficult Breathing.

No. 14. Salt Rheum Pills—For Erysipelas, Eruptions, Pimples on the Face.

No. 15. Rheumatic Pills—For Pain, Lameness or Soreness in the Limbs, Back, Loins, or Kidneys.

A.—For Fever and Ague, Chill Fever, Dumb Ague, old misnamed Fever Ague.

P.—For Piles, Blind or Bleeding, Internal or External.

U.—For Ulcers, Sores, or Ulcerated Eyes and Mouth.

Failing, Weak, or Blurred Sight.

V.—For Vertigo, Dizziness, Swimming or rearet, either with Obstruction or profuse discharge.

W.—For Wetting the Bed, Involuntary, Loading Urinations and shortening its course.

In most diseases—such as Fevers, Inflammations, Diarrhœas, Dysentery, Croup, Rheumatism, and such like—the attendant symptoms are the disease, and require specifics—the advantages of giving the proper remedies, therefore, are obvious, as by their use the disease is checked at once.

Humphreys' Book Guide, which are of such frequent occurrence, and which so often lay the foundation of diseased lungs, bronchitis, consumption, &c., can be at once cured by the Fever and Cough Pills, and other remedies.

Cholera Infantum, Dysentery, Cholera, Cholera Morbus, Constipation, Bilious Complaints, Piles, Headache, Dyspepsia, Sick Headache, Sick or Weak Stomach, Sour Stomach, and all the fast expansion of the disease has engendered whose proper application will afford a cure in almost every instance. Often they are needed for chronic difficulty, such as Dyspepsia, Piles, or Catarrh, Headache, or Scrofula; nevertheless, has more than paid for the cost ten times over.

A TALE OF ROSLYN SCHOOL.
By Frederick W. Farrar, Assistant Master, Harrow College, Cambridge. 1 vol. 18mo, Muslin. Price 50 cents. Uniform with "Tom Brown's School Days."

"It is pleasant to preface our notice of this work by a recommendation of it. We have read it with much interest and touching of books that it has ever been our lot to read. No book, since the advent of 'Tom Brown's School Days in Rugby,' has given such an admirable picture of inner school life."

MRS. UPHAM'S NOVEL.
SOUTHWOLD:
A TALE OF TWO COUNTRIES.
By Mrs. Lillie Devereux Umsted.
1 vol. 12mo, Muslin. Price $1 00.

"Southwold is a fiction of much more than ordinary merit. It has power and pathos, and tells the fortune of half a dozen fashionable novels. The society of which it treats is ambitious and intellectual; skill in each successive spring of its action is revealed, and its sketches in character are full of life and truth. The author has one of the brilliant and fascinating outside pen; both its wit and its humor are genuine, and it has a quick appreciation, one of the most unnecessarily managed and ridiculous things that ever were read."

DURIFIES THE BLOOD.

"B. F. Williams's Compound Syrup of Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potassium" is a popular remedy for Scrofula, Tetter, Ringworm, Blotches on the Face, Inflammation of the Kidneys, Leucorrhœa, and like affections—diseases which require a powerful and searching Expurgation, and nothing is up in handsome style. Experience proves it to be unsurpassed by any known to the public.

WM. H. FOX,
NATCHEZ, MISS.

ACADEMY OF MEDICINE.

I desire the Students of this High School of Morals in Medicine to give the following their consideration. Ask me the sake of humanity!

REMEMBER—We can not be sick, we can have no pain, but when some natural circle for the blood's impurities is closed or inactive.

Dr. Hall's Pills of this great truth was announced in the following propositions:—

That impurity of the blood, by impeding the circulation, produces inflammation or derangement of that organ on which the blood is most directly deposited itself.

That medicine will have a specified difference on the different organs of the body, according to the greater or less impurity of the blood.

That there is but one disease. These various groups of symptoms arise from various causes, having qualities of blood for their common source, and differing from each other only in the degree of intensity.

The accumulator of this simple theory, of the unity and identity of disease, was so fully convinced of the existing truth, that for thirty years he gave his whole study to its investigation, and to the discovery of a remedy by its removal all the blood's impurities, by the agency of which it is the bowels, whose office would be to expel them from the body. Thus could come health and general affections by taking away what they fed upon, for the common parasites of the blood, the germs of laborious research, in producing a medicine, solid in its composition, but under all circumstances, yet sufficiently powerful to pervade the whole system. Incapable of injuring the most tender, yet energetic enough for the most powerful constitution. Capable of being directly connected with the blood, it would act upon it in time strictly in accordance with the laws of the animal economy, and thus restore health to the whole body.

BRANDRETH'S VEGETABLE UNIVERSAL PILLS.

Will take place at the sore of the blood, and the combination of ingredients of which they are composed will dispel some of the erroneous notions and unfounded prejudices which have obstructed the path of empiric, and may lead to a recognition of the doctrine for which I contend.

It is from the productive power of the blood the solids are formed, and the fluids their vitality derived. The blood takes up and carries away the worn-out particles of the body, and supplies the new ones for the repair of the fabric structure and the due exercise of its functions. Any impurity in the blood, as it is called, and for the separation of which the skin, the lungs, the kidneys, and the bowels were made, is immediately formed which fill up the cells of the tissues. Blood is requisite to the nutrition of the nervous system; cut off its communication, and the nerves supplying a member is lost. Vigor and activity of animal life depend upon its condition, and according to the purity or impurity of the blood arises health or the absence of recovery.

These general observations are all derived. Bile, urine, gastric juice, saliva, &c., however different in appearance and composition, all have their origin in the circulating source. Now, if the circulation is accelerated or retarded, or if the blood is impure, or if the nervous influence is impaired, the blood becomes unprepared to form a state of health in the various tissues, and perverts its functions into morbid secretions, which are incompatible with the purpose, and vitiative it but feebly. If waste particles are retained in the blood, or if any noxious deposition of it form tumors and abscesses, or produce violent fevers. In the secretions of the liver when disease affects the system, dyspepsia, jaundice, and a thousand other evils subsist. Some various symptoms and in the blood produce this general disease. BUT IT IS EVIDENT THEY ALL ARISE FROM ONE CAUSE—IMPURITY OF THE BLOOD. Equal this impurity by judicious purgation, and the disease will be removed, and health restored. It cannot be present to that person whose blood is pure, and whose system is free from the cumulative experience of many years has infallibly proved to be this doctrine and practice, and means, yet if experience should invariably prove it, we must distrust reason, and say that the fact experience has taught us. But reason and experience go hand in hand. Purgatives or pills, by removing the cause of impurity and natural course, will remove disease, by whatever name it may be known or declared by the medical men.

The history of one disease, and one method of cure, is not supposed to be gaining ground in the public mind. The fact that it is so is universally acknowledged. And in schools of medicine in this new World, THE UNITY OF DISEASE, AND AN inward disease, though the results of different causes, are accordingly to the purity of the blood, and are cured by purging it."

THE UNITY OF DISEASE, THE IDENTITY OF DISEASE, AND OF ONE METHOD OF CURE, ARE BUT THE FIRST HEADS. THE GREAT FACT OF THE UNITY AND THE EXISTENCE OF THIS ONE CURE, OR UNIVERSAL REMEDY, AMOUNTS IN A RATIONAL EFFECT OF INJURY, AND IS SUSCEPTIBLE OF PROOF.

The cures effected by the use of Brandreth's Pills in every part of the country have been such as to convince the public have placed their claims to this distinction beyond all question. This is the secret of their success, and all utility and applicability to diseases of the human frame, and to prevent disease, their present and future use.

Brandreth's Pills are a mild, safe, and thorough purgative, and will remove many valuable lives.

Thousands in the cities and villages of the United States can be referred to, who have been restored to health by their use. By no other power than it can its inherent virtues could they, for so long a period, have kept from the public, and thus have obtained a reputation from continent to continent.

The wonderful properties which compound Brandreth's Vegetable Pills for upward of thirty years, and has had opportunities of witnessing their beneficial effects in extensive practice. Their tendency is to remove the cause instead of palliating the effect, and to restore the health by the use of which have been established in the public confidence.

Brandreth's Pills are made of Extract of Roots, which, when taken into the system, perform purely vegetable. No mineral preparation is combined with them. Their chemical properties are such that there are within us faculties, which, when called into action, will restore health and invigorate the system, and thus they have a power for restoring health to the body and blood.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are admirably adapted to the purpose of correction of the vitiated blood, a property preventing congestives of the brain or viscera, and clearing away the imperfections of the intestinal canal, and those engorgements of the large veins, which occasion so many alarming symptoms, leading to rapid dissolution under the best of a hopeful cure.

By their use the blood's circulation becomes very rapid, and the system is thus rendered impervious or unbalanced, for, by keeping it in free and healthful operation it is enabled to withstand the insidious approaches of disease to which persons of bad blood are always predisposed.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are fast superseding every other medicine. The fact that they have been known in England and in the United States for a period of 30 years, is not only an evidence of public estimation, but of their necessity to the public health.

Every one who is prevailed upon to use this remedy, is earnestly solicited to render any information to them in his power, as to the effect of the medicine, in order that it may be experimentally acquainted with its value, feel that their time and energies could not be better employed than in the elucidation of its sanitary—its health-producing properties. The public's servant,

ADVERTISEMENTS.

AN ORIGINAL LETTER FROM THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON
TO THE
HON. EDWARD EVERETT WILL APPEAR IN THIS WEEK'S ISSUE
OF
THE NEW YORK LEDGER,
THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER,

For which nearly all the Great Authors in the country write.

Prospectus for the Year 1859.

The proprietor of the NEW YORK LEDGER is gratified at having it in his power to announce in his Prospectus for the new year—1859—that the old and popular and eminent writers of the LEDGER staff have been retained, and are now writing exclusively for the LEDGER. Their names are the names of the Hon. EDWARD EVERETT, who is to furnish a series of articles, to be continued during the entire year, under the title of "THE MOUNT VERNON PAPERS." For these articles alone we have already paid Mr. Everett the full price of the Ladies' Mount Vernon Association) the sum of TEN THOUSAND DOLLARS.

As an indication of the popularity of the LEDGER, we need only state the simple fact, that its circulation is larger than that of any other TEN Honest papers in the country. Its great success is owing to the facts that the proprietor secures the best writers in the country, AND PAYS THEM LIBERALLY; that the LEDGER is a FIRST-CLASS FAMILY PAPER—paper of high moral tone. The exalted reputation of its contributors, the practical and invariably pure and healthy character of all its articles, the care which is taken that not even one offensive word shall appear in its columns, and the superiority of its tales and sketches, have gained for the NEW YORK LEDGER a position that no literary paper has ever before reached. We feel, and always have felt, since the LEDGER obtained its immense circulation, that a heavy responsibility rests upon us, and have endeavored to discharge that responsibility conscientiously, feeling confident that the success of the result would be thanks of thousands and many of them expressed to us.

As to the future, we are at a loss what to say. We prefer to repress rather than to promise. What we have heretofore done is known to our readers; they know what the LEDGER has been, and is now, and must therefore judge what it will be hereafter. We can only say that among the regular contributors to the LEDGER are:

GEORGE D. PRENTICE, FANNY FERN,
JOHN G. SAXE, MRS. SIGOURNEY,
SYLVANUS COBB, Jr., MRS. SOUTHWORTH,
EMERSON BENNETT, ALICE CARY,
T. S. ARTHUR, EMMA LESLIE BROWNE,
WM. ROSS WALLACE, SALLIE H. BRYAN,
CAROLINE B. SOUTHEY, MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS,
COL. W. B. DUNLAP, AUGUSTA MOORE, and many eminent Lawyers, Clergymen, Professors in Colleges, and others, who write for the LEDGER anonymously; and that our complete arrangements are such that the current agencies of the LEDGER are new, and will constantly be, at the rate of over three hundred thousand dollars per annum.

FACTS like these carry with them more weight than any comments that could be made, and comments will therefore be dispensed with. As we have already intimated, we shall leave promising to those who prefer to write and their deeds in that way, and confine ourselves with doing what we can to make the LEDGER the most interesting and successful FAMILY PAPER in the World.

THE NEW YORK LEDGER is published every Saturday, and sold on all the news offices in every city and town throughout the country, and is mailed to subscribers at two dollars per annum; two copies are sent for three dollars. Any person obtaining eight subscribers at $1 50 each (which is our lowest club rate), and sending us $12, will be entitled to one copy free. Terms Invariably in advance.

☞ The postage on the LEDGER to any part of the United States is only five cents per quarter, payable at the office where it is received, which is twenty-six cents a year. Canada subscribers must each send five cents per quarter in addition to the subscription price of the LEDGER, to pay the American postage.

☞ Subscribers must write their addresses, including the name of the place, County and State, in which they reside, in a plain hand, so as to avoid mistakes.

☞ No advertisements are wanted from cities, large villages, or other places where news offices are conveniently established.

☞ All communications must be addressed, postage paid, to

PARK'S PRICKLY PLASTERS.

They sooth pain; they protect the chest; they extract the coagulated pneumonic and cancerous from the system; they impart strength; they are divided in sections, and yield to the motion of the body; they are porous; all impure excretions pass off, and they can not become effete in the system; they are recommended by physicians in other planes, and we consider it no less than others of 10. Where these Plasters are, pain can not exist. Weak nerves, public speakers, delicate females, or any affected with side, chest, or back pains, should try them. You will then know what they are. They are a new feature in the science of medicine. All Druggists have them. Take no other. Each Plaster bears a Medallion Stamp and our Signature.

LYON'S MAGNETIC POWDERS
Will destroy Garden Insects, Cockroaches, Bedbugs, Fleas, Ants, Moths, and all pests of the Vegetable Kind.

The importance of a reliable article of this kind is indisputable. In warm weather all nature teems with these annoying foes. This powder is the only article ever discovered which will exterminate them. A company of botanists, from the Horticultural Society of Paris, while amid the flowers of Asia, observed that all insects lighting upon a certain kind of plant very soon dropped dead. This fact was made use of to guard their night camps from these intruders. Quantities of the plant were brought home by M. E. Lyon, and found a positive, instant destroyer in every experiment. It is simply a powdered leaf, chemically prepared to retain the effect of age and climate. Medals and Letters Patent have been received from the Governments of France, Belgium, Germany, and Russia, from the World's Fair, and numerous medical and horticultural colleges and societies.

Letter from the President of the U. S.
EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, 31st Jan. 1858.
MR. LYON.—Dear Sir: I take pleasure in informing you that the Royal Commission of the World's Fair at London have awarded you a Medal and Certificate for the great value of your Magnetic Powders, &c.
Yours, MILLARD FILLMORE.

The above was accompanied by a certificate of Prince Albert.

IT IS FREE FROM POISON.
NEW YORK, October 16, 1858.
"MR. E. LYON.—DEAR SIR: We have analyzed and tested your Magnetic Powders, and find them perfectly harmless to mankind and domestic animals, but certain and safe in their effects upon bugs, &c.
"JAMES R. CHILTON, M. D., Professor of Chemistry, N. Y. Hospital.
"Mr. Lewis L. Dunn, Superintendent of the New York Hospital, says, "he has expelled all the bugs, ants, roaches, moths, &c., with Lyon's Powder, and finds it of immense value."

Every planter and housekeeper must have a direct interest in an article of this kind. Reference can be made to the Astor, Nicholas, and Metropolitan Hotels; to Judge MEDE, President of the American Institute; James Gordon Bennett, Esq., Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Cyrus W. Field, L. M. Pease, of the Five Points Mission, and to thousands of families in this city, where Lyon's Powder is constantly used. The Parepa-Rosa Company have tested it thoroughly. It will destroy lizards, grasshoppers, ants, moths, bugs, and all vermin. Garden plants can be preserved, and houses made pure.

Arrangements are now made through Messrs. BARNES & PARK, of New York, to have it sold throughout the world. Many worthless imitations are advertised. Be cautious!

"NEW YORK, November 8th, 1858.
"In retiring from business, I have sold all my Insect Powders and Pills, Letters-Patent, &c., and accounts pertaining thereto, to Messrs BARNES & PARK. This proprietor of these articles is authorized to have all persons in the use of them to be supplied with other persons. The genuine and effective article is put up in 25 cent boxes, and will continue to bear my name.
"E. LYON."

Rats and mice can not be reached by a powder, but are killed by a MAGNETIC PILL. Order them through any merchant.

Tit Lyon's Powder kills insects in a trice,
Lyon's Pills are sure to rat mice.

Sample Flasks, 25 cents; regular sizes, 50 cents and $1 00. Follow directions, and you will succeed thoroughly.

Interesting Correspondence.
CONFIRMATION OF TESTIMONY.
The following correspondence tells its own story. Mr. Nash is Postmaster at Hanover Port, Massachusetts, and Mr. Dennis a well-known citizen of Western New York.
HANOVER PORT, Mass., Dec. 1, 1858.
DEAR SIR: I have lived many years in Boston Journal, a statement signed "Andrew Dennis," representing that the writer, who was seventy years of age, had the hair of his head, when it had become wholly bald, restored by the use of HEMMENWAY'S HAIR RESTORATIVE, and the color restored from gray to that of his youth. If this statement be true, please send this note back to me, with any remarks you may be pleased to make.
Respectfully yours, D. MEAD.
Mr. Dennis, Palmyra, New York.

PALMYRA, N. Y., Jan. 4, 1859.
MR. MEAD: The statement signed by me was exactly correct. I have lived upon said spot my whole life, and am so pleased with the article that I am endeavor obtain should try it. Yours truly,
ANDREW DENNIS.
The following is the statement which called out the above:
PALMYRA, Wayne County, N. Y., Oct. 1, 1858.
MESSRS. W. E. HAYAS & CO.—Gents: I was recommended by a friend from the eastern part of the State to use your Hair Coloring for the restoration of my hair—the smarting use that he had known of its complete success. You may well imagine that I commenced its use with some doubt, but was induced to give it a trial, and suffice it to say, that, when I tell you that I was nearly seventy years old, had been bald for many years, and wore a wig. But I soon found my hair starting to grow, and after the use of three bottles I was rejoiced on finding myself possessed of a good head of hair, of a color the same as in youth. I confess that I was greatly surprised at the effect, and my friends and acquaintances would scarcely believe the growth of my hair to be an undoubted fact.
I am, with great respect, your obliged servant,
ANDREW DENNIS.
Remember that this result was produced by HEMMENWAY'S Restorative, the original and only reliable Hair Restorative.

THE OLD MUSICIAN.

(WRITTEN FOR HARPER'S WEEKLY.)

[A few weeks ago an aged gentleman died at New Orleans. On his death-bed he stated that he had been in his day a musician; that he had occupied a distinguished place among the musicians of one of Napoleon's military bands, and that his execution had frequently attracted attention from the Great Man himself. He said much more, which was very interesting, in reference to his past life; but death interrupted his revelations. He had lived, it seems, for many years in New Orleans in great poverty and privation, with no other companion than his violin.—Ed. Harper's Weekly.]

Raise up my head.
Enough: I see and hear all I would wish to know.
And as they say that I must die, and call me old!
They know not what is age who call me old.
Age must be counted by the loss of fire, not years:
Not by the wrinkles of limb, nor by the dimness of the eye.
Quick! raise up my head; give me my violin;
And stand you silent while I tear your hearts.
[Plays.]
There is my solo in the key of G.
The last six notes ever heard by Mozart:
He declared them worthy of a crown—so think I.
And now my warblers sing:
[Sings this song.
Before the Emperor—before Napoleon,
When in the flush of power; and he did bow to me,
And send me from his own great hand this ring—
This diamond ring. Where is my diamond ring?
Ah me! I did forget they took my ring.
Ah! yes, they took my ring—for rent.
Well, well! it is but empty honor; none can take my song.
Sing this song.
Before the Emperor—before Napoleon,
When in the flush of power; and he did bow to me,
And send me from his own great hand this ring—
This diamond ring. Where is my diamond ring?
Ah me! I did forget they took my ring.
Ah! yes, they took my ring—for rent.
Well, well! it is but empty honor; none can take my song.
Now, am I old? Hear this, my symphony in F!
[Plays.]
This, too, before an Emperor, the Czar. He gave His smiles, and sent a well-bred boy an empire!
A small box blazing with a score of gems,
And on the lid a likening of his face.
And 'twas a cunning boy. I have it now—
In memory. I did not sell it till I wanted bread,
Not for myself—alas, but for Adele.
Not know Adele? She was my pupil; in the world
Is known as— I will not call her name.
Too well you know her; she has made the cities ring
With shout and bravos. Ah! such a regnier
Rossini wrote— Wait; let me see—what did
Rossini write for her? She loves me, and she sang
My Opera. That was a night of nights.
When I, self-hidden from the public gaze,
Would watch my pupil sing the breathings of my heart!
Yes! they found me. Ha! ha! me, the poor musician!
And then they bore me forth, and stood me on the stage
Before ten thousand eyes, and covered me with flowers.
Ay! and she kissed me—Adele kissed me—
Kissed me there before the envious crowd.
Dukes, lords, and nobles would have given wealth
And titles to have been the kissed. Where is Adele?
She knows not of me now. She thinks that I am rich,
And I—will not seek her to beg.
Here in a sonata
I composed for her. Berenger did me great honor
When he heard these bars, from theme to theme,
By asking from my pen a copy. Then he gave
To me a song, a doubtless song, that I might wed
The music of its words to sound. Hark! I play.
[Plays.]
Now, am I old? Is my arm palsied?
Is my blood weak? Must I die? Is there no fire in me?
Oh! false prophets! raise me up quickly!
Where is my wealth and honor? Where is Adele?
Lay on my breast the star that Austria gave.
Where is the gold I won in England? Where are the plaudits
That I won in France? Where is my violin?
And am I blind?
Could I not tell my own loved violin before my eyes?
Hark! I will play a scena from my Opera.
(Attempts to play.)
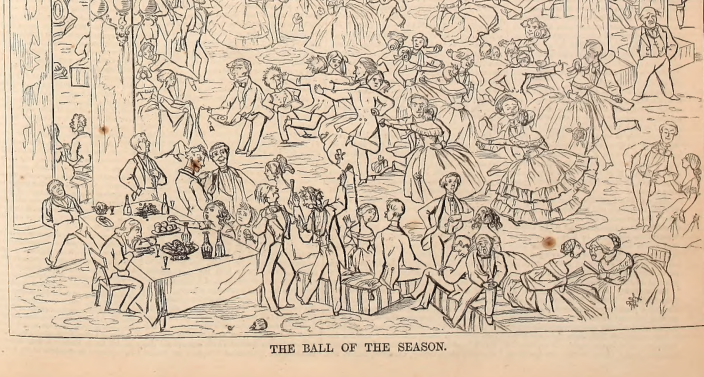
Oh, vain! my hand fails in its endeavor: but
My ear deceives me not. I still know time;
Perhaps—I soon shall know eternity.
Why is it dark!
Why do I hear your sobs no longer! Is the world hushed?
Am I dead? Am I dead? Dead?

THE BALL OF THE SEASON.

In drawing the attention of our readers to the very clever picture of a ball given below, it is only necessary to say that it was made for this journal from studies from life. Every one who has been a habitué of fashionable society will recognize at least some of the figures and faces.

The magnificent hostess with the turban and feather; the pretty host with shoe-brush hair; the wretched performer on the horn, who will stick his feet into the way, and the still more miserable youth who will fall over them and utterly destroy the luckless young lady in pink; the dreary old muse, who gets into a corner near the musicians and tries to calculate how much he will lose on cotton; the page John, who is constantly getting a dancer's fat in his eye, and falling back upon John the sober, to his fearful discomfiture; the two tables in the foreground, who are positively disgusted at the way in which the hostess's daughter, port thing! is trying to catch the English lord; the sweet girls in roses and tarletan, who dance away merrily night after night, and never grow tired, and never ill-tempered; the dancing young men who know why they were asked, and, like honest fellows, earn their supper and enjoy themselves heartily too; the poor papas, one in the foreground yawning, the other in the back-ground already fast asleep and dreaming of stocks; the timid little creature who looks up so fondly at the tall young man who, having told his tale, now gravely proposes to walk through the rooms in order not to attract attention; the two greedy children who have just vanquished their nurse at the ninth round, and have executed a very brilliant flank movement against the supper; the tipsy rat who tries to take wine with a brother rat, and pours his Champagne down the back of innocent Miss Jane, who happened to be listening to a description of Seligman's "Niagara," and believes that the torrent is on her in earnest; the ungracious party-goer, who seizes his muffin and sits down calmly to a quiet plate of canvas-back, washed down with La Tour Blanche—are not they all written in our memories and in our hearts?



THE BALL OF THE SEASON.

Which of us has not spent many an evening at a ball to the settlement of his destiny? Fate, working by its eccentric methods, makes balls the ring for its eccentric matches, and the Lists, a gentle arena of beggary, and now of fortune. Jones, who was fascinated by the lovely heiress, Adelaide, at a ball in Fifth Avenue, neglected his business to prosecute his courtship, and, in the end, lost both client and lady. Smith, on the contrary, whose tongue and legs all day on the county's Anna Maria at a ball and picked her into a beaming state of enthusiasm that she insisted on bestowing herself and her hundred thousand on her infinitely gallant partner. Solomon will ought to be a warning than immoral. Poor fellow! let us hope and trust that every it: tant of his precious time is to be occupied that he never bestowes thought on amusements so frivolous as balls, and that when the dread hour comes in which we shall all have to render an account, it shall never be said that he devoted hours or minutes to worse employments than a lecture, chat with amiable women, or a hearty dance with a light-footed partner.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1859.

NEW YORK AS A NURSING MOTHER.

IN our last number we gave an illustration of all the room occupied by one of the Alms-house nurses. The public are already aware that the daily journals drew attention to the fearful condition of children who were under the care of the nurse in question; and though their statements were denied with more warmth and fury than were in good taste by some of the Governors of the Alms-house, subsequent evidence has fully verified them. It is now undeniable that a large proportion of the foundlings who are left in charge of the city authorities are absolutely put to death by the nurses to whom they are confided.

We submit that the error lies not so much in the lax manner in which the regulations of the Alms-house are carried out as in the system itself. The Ten Governors tell us that they require certificates from physicians, that the fa ilies they give a child to applicants. But every one knows how easily such certificates are obtained. Every body, in this city, is ready to give to importunate applicants general certificates involving no pecuniary responsibility. Most of the dwellers in tenement houses in the precure such certificates through the aid of their landlords, who are given to understand that the punctual payment of their rent depends upon the success of their applications for children to nurse. Then, as to the subsequent visits, it is quite plain that these are pure matters of form. The doctor and the visiting nurse are expected to visit persons having Alms-house children to nurse. But their visits are not made inquisitorial. The nurses know very well when to expect them. Neither doctor nor nurse has the requisite moral or intellectual particular vigilance. By the exercise of judicious indulgence the former may obtain a patient or a story; the latter, a new evidence of fee. Frost shows, stands in terror of her life. If she does her duty she may, and probably will, be knocked on the head on the first dark night on which she ventures abroad.

The error is in the system. No children intrusted to the Alms-house should be put out to nurse beyond the walls of that establishment. Blackwell's Island is large enough to hold all the foundlings who are thrown upon the city for maintenance. There are, we believe, buildings enough already on the island to accommodate more foundlings than legitimately devolve upon the city; but if there were not, the Alms-house draws money enough from the public to erect the buildings required. The children should be away on Blackwell's Island in fanciful fencing, and other superfluities, would soon suffice for the erection of a building in which all the foundling infants might be raised.

This is a question of a practical nature: there is no occasion to appeal to philanthropy or benevolence to decide it. It is absurd to expect sagacious nursing or liberal treatment from a class of women who, in the city, take Alms-house children to nurse at a dollar a week. They would be false to their instincts and their exceptions to their class, if they exhibited kindliness, generosity, or care to the infants hired out to nurse. It is natural that they should neglect and, in most cases, maltreat the poor little creatures.

This may be a hard saying, but every person of broad experience will bear witness that it is true. Human nature has its bad sides as well as good; and in legislation and public administration the one must be borne in view as well as the other. If you intrust poor little foundlings to women living in the city, you expect them to be kindly and judiciously cared for and generously fed for one dollar a week, you will infallibly be disappointed.

The mortality in this city far exceeds its proper ratio. Situate between two broad streams of running water, with the sea-breeze blowing perpetually upon it; with broad, straight streets, ample sewers, and an admirable supply of pure water, New York ought to be one of the healthiest cities in the world. No disease is epidemic here. Lying is the very healthiest malady in New York is free from the long diseases of northern, and from the fevers of southern, latitudes. Yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, the records of mortality show that more deaths occur in New York, in proportion to its population, than in any other city of corresponding magnitude. We ascribe the phenomenon mainly to the defective system of nursing by the Alms-house Governors. The bulk of the deaths which occur here are those of infants. Children infantile, with no nutrition constant maladies, is by far the most sweeping disease known in New York. And we believe that the bulk of the deaths which are registered in the weekly returns under this head are those of infants belonging to the city, who perish through the ill-paid and ill-regulated care intrusted by the Alms-house Governors. How long shall the city remain a convicted murderer?

THE TRUE DUTY OF POLICE AUTHORITIES.

A LAW case now pending before the courts has again attracted attention to the almost defunct subject of spiritualism. It is alleged by one of the parties to this case that evidence which, in the ordinary course of events, we have knowledge, perpetrated under cover of spiritualism. Whether this be true or false—whether the spiritual circles were the cause, or merely a convenient occasion for the commission of the crimes in question—is not material. Where fraud and imposition and without spiritual circles, the opportunity might have been wanting for their perpetration.

We are therefore, for our part, irresistibly led to the conclusion that a practice which affords opportunities for crime for the commission of crime is unsound and ought to be discouraged. Our esteemed co-laborer, the LOUNGER, who, by the way, usually takes a very liberal common with the most charming wit, considers that when crimes are committed or insanity occasioned by spiritualism, the police have only to do the criminal or the lunatic, and not of the habit or the delusion which led to or afforded an occasion for the crime or the lunacy. In this we can not concur.

We hold that it is the duty of the laws and the magistrates to prevent, as a matter of course, that a certain—and that a large—proportion of the human being" under their powers will be led into vice, and, if simple minds. There is no question but most of mankind are born with blended intellect. This is the teaching of the Bible, and experience confirms it. If we were all born shrewd, sagacious, and virtuous, there would be an end of laws, magistrates, and policemen.

If even we were all endowed by nature with prudence enough to see through the wiles and the shams of the world, there would be at an end. But as in fact we are not all born wise or virtuous, courts, magistrates, and policemen are indispensable. The laws, as a logical consequence, that it is not so much the office of the courts to protect the wise and the very—who have their own protection—as to watch over the unwise and the unwary, who are constantly getting into trouble.

It is a very easy to say, what Mrs. Smith, of Illinois or Minnesota, is swindled in a mock-auction shop, that John ought to have known better. If Joanna Bailey is seduced by the Rev. Dr. Fifth Avenue, know better; but John Smith doesn't; and as we can not prevent the birth and existence of persons of this character, it is clearly our business to attack the evil at the other end, and as we can not educate the simpleminded, to put down the knaves. It is so with spiritualism. It would be a grand thing if every one now born or to be hereafter born were to be endowed, by act of the Legislature or of Congress, with a mind strong enough to withstand this and other crazy delusions. But this, alas! can not be done, and so experience proves that crimes are committed and insanity occasioned by the propounding of spiritual circles. It is the duty of the authorities to attack the mischief on the only side on which it is available, and to make the system answerable for the evils which it occasions?

Over a year has elapsed since we had a controversy with the then Governor of Massachusetts on spiritualism—Judge Edmonds. We stated that the delusion had peopled our lunatic asylums. The Judge denied the fact. We then proved it by the evidence of the managers of the chief asylums throughout the North. The Judge did not reply directly; but in a publication extensively devoted to the propagation of the spiritual doctrine, he announced his intention of presently overwhelming us. He has not, up to this time, fulfilled his threat. Merciful considerations have doubtless had due weight with him, and he has spared us.

We are not ungrateful for his leniency; but, at the same time, we adhere to the view we expressed over a year since, that these spiritual circles, where weak-minded men are driven to madness, and simple women are led astray from the path of duty, ought to be placed on the same footing as gambling-houses and houses of debauch. The law requires every man who sells liquors to obtain a license. The law forbids, but the magistrates tolerate houses of worse character, where money, character, health, and life are lost. We see no sound reason why spiritual circles should not be subject to the same penalties as these. They do far more mischief. If they were licensed, some hold might be retained upon the inmates; if they were tolerated, subject to instant suppression, in case of actual harm done, a still better plan might be exercised; but to leave them free and untrammeled as they are now, is to neglect the first duty of a magistracy—namely, the prevention of crime. Unfortunately, the simple, the weak, and the ignorant

AID FOR THE INDIANS.

We are requested to draw attention to a prospectus of the "American Indian Aid Association," a body which proposes to do good to the aborigines of this continent. The purposes of the Association, as stated in the document before us, are "to obtain the recognition of the rights of the Indians as men, so that to rob or murder an Indian shall be punishable as though the same had been committed on an American citizen;" to "set apart Indian domains;" to "withdraw troops from Indian territory;" and "to arouse the public mind on the subject of Indian wrongs," etc. The officers of the Association are Hon. Horace Mann, President; Daniel F. Tieman, John Jay, Richard Reed, Vice-presidents; George Hall, Treasurer; and Rev. Dr. Adams, Secretary. A Board of the Association is coming before the public is to get money to carry out its views.

In laying these documents before the readers of this journal we are bound in candor to add that we do not see how any private association can achieve the objects stated. It is the Indian Aid Association, that is done already by Government. As to withdrawing the troops from the Indian territories, that would be impracticable, impolitic, unsafe, and absurd. As to placing the Indians on the same footing as American citizens—that—so far as the safety of life and property is concerned—is already done by the law of the land; further than this it can not be done by any power. The decision of the United States Supreme Court, which the Association in question can hardly aspire to reverse.

We do not deny that the Indians of this continent have suffered grievous wrongs at the hands of the whites, and we should be glad to see any intelligent and practical plan for enforcing the laws against the demoralizers of the red man. The sale of spirituous liquors. But, as a general rule, we have noticed that associations which proposed to do good by means seldom succeeded in doing any thing beyond collecting moneys from liberal white men. We trust that this Society, which is organized under the most favorable auspices of men of the calibre of Myron H. Clark, Daniel F. Tieman, and John Jay, may prove an exception to the rule.

THE NEW YORK QUARANTINE QUESTION.

The Quarantine Question is, without doubt, the most important matter before the Legislature of this State. Accident, and the energetic measures of self-defence adopted by the Board of Health of Richmond County, have had a tendency to give the question the appearance of a dispute between that and the adjoining Island. But, in fact, New York and Brooklyn are much more directly interested in the solution of the problem than Staten Island. At this time the yellow fever makes its appearance in our bay ten persons die in New York and Brooklyn for one who dies in Staten Island; but the trade of the city is so gravely injured that the whole of Richmond County might be purchased for the sum which the New York merchants lose by one yellow fever season.

Under the circumstances we own to a feeling of surprise at finding existing which appears to mark the dealing of the Legislature with this topic. The Governor has appointed a new Committee of Quarantine, to be filled by the parties of Sandy Hook. We presume that this Committee stands on the same footing as the Diplomatic Agents to the United States—Cuba for the United States. The publicity in the way of both—a necessary publicity—had neither been given to it until now.

Governor Morgan distinctly declared before his election that he would endeavor to obtain the removal of Quarantine from its present location. This declaration secured him many votes in New York and Brooklyn which would otherwise have been polled for his opponents. We hope that his emphatic avowal of his preference for Staten Island will not be withheld: we trust that he is too high-minded a man to be playing false to the public, and to be concealing his sympathy with the short-sighted policy of the Commissioners of Emigration under the cloak of an impossible scheme.

Of one fact we beg to assure the members of the Legislature. They have five or six weeks of working life yet before them; let them use it actively for the removal of Quarantine. For they may rest assured that, if they adjourn without having done all in their power for the removal, the Quarantine Hospitals on Staten Island have completed their term of service. No patients will sleep in those hospitals the summer, unless it be clearly evidence that the remove will shortly take place. Time will show whether this is a mere empty menace.

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

Prince Napoleon's Bride—Death of Count Walewski—Paris Receptions—Entertainments—Dress in Public Life—Cost of Living in Paris—States as compared with Paris—French furniture—Actors—Kitchen dignitary, etc.

PARIS, January 27, 1859.

VOLATILE Paris seems this week to care less for the wanton wiles of Vivi than for the arrival of Victor Plon-Plon's wooing of the Sardinian Princess. "The color of the rose is not more delicate than the cheek of the bride," as she is called "La rose infidèle;" and it is said the King her father has promised her a dot to make her consent to his marriage—but what do they not say? and what will they not say?

There have been of late several sudden deaths in the fashionable circles of Paris; among others, that of Count Hatzfeldt, who had been long a resident here, was married to a French lady, was very much liked, and, I believe, an much regretted, as there is time to regret any one here. There is nothing more striking than this carelessness about death, and the ease and composure with which they speak of it, when the continued corruption also the expectation of the sudden demise of others such those that surround one in Paris. The great lesson which the mortality of others should teach us remains untaught, and we read the list of fatals as from the constant recurrence of something without the slightest effect upon the thought.

The ladies have now all begun their "receiving days." You will know in New York what this means, but I will explain it. I was invited an hour before dinner in listening to the conversation a certain house where I found a few friends beside me the day. It was one of these visits yesterday which suggested to me just now these observations of the effect of the spiritual world of fashion upon the kind hearts and clever understandings. Whilst seated, the door opened, and a little party of company, some who were paying the visite d'obligation, some who were there in the hope of meeting some else as we met, entered the room.

"Have you heard that the poor Countess is so much better?" said one of the party. There were exclamations, in various voices,

"Why, I met her yesterday!"

"I dined with her the day before yesterday!"

"It is not possible!" said a third.

"Yes, she died last night of an inversion of the heart."

She will be greatly missed."

"She had a charming house; and such a good cook!" said another.

"Every evening one was sure to find, chez elle, the best company, and well-served tea; and there are so few houses remaining which entertain!"

"Poor Countess!" said the first speaker. Another death, equally sudden, was related.

"It is [illegible] Prince Napoleon's bride Princess Clotilde, "one only hears of these dismal events. There is poor Hatzfeldt! He was my most intimate friend; and to be alluded to in the past tense! How charming wife—his children! Such a position such a good home!"

I am now literally translating what I heard, though it does not trip off as glibly in English as in French; and not to weary you with a statement of the lady of the house was, "Have you any invitations for Monday? Mr. Madison is to receive, and I am in judgment who should deem St. J—— too frivolous than those around him.

The next subject which was brought up was calamity which has befallen an illustrious family, and in an instant the whole party was plunged in discomfort or indirection of one of its unmarried daughters. There were various versions of the story, until a Spaniard who had himself interested in having had this one from one of the family:

"It seems that Madame M—— has a marriage in view?"

"Why do you not marry? Will you marry me?"

"No," was the answer. "I am not a marrying man, and if I were, you are not the lady of my choice."

Notwithstanding this repulse, it seems the young incorrigible of the party had persisted in the absurd proposition to the gentleman in his own apartment; his friends say hoping to oblige him to marry by forcing this, their sister, upon him. The Duchess, a mother, and told her of these visits, which he was to have his money back, and asked her to speak to her daughter. The mother, instead of following this good counsel, and locking up the secret and the scandal, went to the Duke, her son, who is an attaché at some distant court and also to a gentleman son, who is an officer in the hussars. The latter instantly sent a challenge to Monsieur C., and has been loudly, wounded in the encounter. The affair has never reached the light of day, but has been refused a leave of absence by the Emperor, and is obliged to remain in Paris instead of having one brother wounded in her unrighteous cause, and with the disgrace also has brought upon her name."

This recital ended, there was an end of all other subjects, and the conversation was confined to private themes—the little theatres, promised brilliant changes in fashions, and changes in dinner hours, all of which I have since quite as well up in as the sting as the women. I do not mean to say that only here that one finds a want of reflection and a just judgement of the relative importance of the events of life; but I do maintain that there is in the French character a stratum of frivolity which startles you at times in the most unexpected manner, even in these you have been led to consider as serious and thoughtful-minded persons; and as the life led in Paris is in most instances based in its exclusive development of the love of pleasure and excitement, to the better impulses of head and heart. I have seen this deteriorating influence upon others; I have watched it in myself, until I quite convinced that, of all residences, this is the most dangerous to the soul's health. But I am not likely to render it less attractive by thus denouncing it. Each one thinks himself strong to resist temptation, if the subject is thought about at all—and so the world goes on!

I have ceased to wonder so much at the predilection of Americans for a residence in Europe since a conversation I had lately with a lady, who told me one of the enormous items of her expenses in Paris, which it seems is now to be the high temple of fashion, folly, and extravagance! I thought, for information, in an old Parisian like myself, and who, though now kept at home by the claims of duty, occasionally wanders back to the same scenes for the storms and dangers of the ocean way, so that she can spend six months in the old haunts and all the pavements. It was a pleasure to hear her dilate upon the comfort of her life here.

Her satisfaction is when sending with her cook in the morning, to find that the chicken which she had made an excellent dinner of the day before, and whose remains were then smoking on the breakfast-table before her in a delicate blanquette, had cost only one half of one franc—fifty centimes. The fragrant cafe au lait which accompanied it, the dainty loaf, and the love-like butter and, above all, the ever-welcome Galignani's Messenger, with its cheerful face, giving the earliest tidings from all lands and seas, with a summary of English, German, and French journals—all in one convenient, well-printed little sheet.* All these were delightful, and at the same time that I ventured to suggest the charms of bookstalls and Jobmey-cabs, shrewd sense, and even the English love of home, would somehow will linger in my memory as a better thing than aught here with which to begin the morning meal. But I seem to have gathered from this lady, and from others, a melancholy idea that the old traditions in the world are passing away from you with the old cooks. The more is the pity! I hope they will last my time, at any rate!

Not that I have not attended even here to give myself some feeble imitations of what I liked in other days; I have a public, I believe, and am called a flat piece of iron which only bakes one cake at a time, and which makes the worst pay of my maid of all work, Toinette, who produces, however, with due exercises of her patience and mine, very tolerable rice-cakes. Toinette is a treasure, and what I have never ventured upon, as I am sure Toinette, well as she loves me, would instantly quit my service upon, but that is all. She sometimes makes me calves' head soup and plum-puddings from receipts of my grandmother's, which I confess to any inventions of her own, and which are not carried even by the French, who sometimes honor my bachelor invitations to Toinette's preparations of the griddle I know from having once overheard her advise to a friend that she had been sent by her mistress (an American lady) to be instructed in its use.

Toinette said, "My dear" (which is what they always call one another), "let me advise you not to learn to make those treasonable things. My master is a bachelor and I indulge him now and then, but you, who are in a family, do not begin it; there would be no end to your labors."

But I have come to an end of my allotted space, and must bid adieu until another week.

THE LOUNGER.

THE LOUNGER TO HIS FRIENDS.

The Lounger wishes his friends to understand, and begs them to remember, that he can not return manuscripts, except they are of such a kind that it is not fair to presume they have been copied. The little poems, sketches, and essays that drift into his Letter-box, if they do not get into print, either in part or completely, get into the waste-paper basket. That is the disagreeable truth.

A POPULAR FALLACY ABOUT NEW HAVEN.

In early youth we are instructed by Peter Parley that New Haven is a beautiful city by the Sound. There is a fine green, it is asserted—fine group of churches—fine old family mansions—fine students—interesting houses—broad sweeps of green fields, and tree picturesque rocks. Yes, the rocks are the rocks on which the settlers of New Haven, one west and the other east—somewhere about one of them, the cave in which Goffe and Whalley lurked—the stern survivor appearing here more in the light of day when the Indians fell upon Deerfield, and the lighted settlers wanted a deliverer.

So, bound for New Haven, slipping along the foot of the shining Sound, the traveler muses—half-instructed in his youth, and figuring stately avenues of elms, green sweeps of lawn, and mansions from Auburn's, and the dusky forms of reticule old. Through the murky village he flies, across the kindly fields that loan toward the glittering water—contemplating a living picture of peace, plenty, and content, awaiting the climax—expecting New Haven.

Now, will it be believed that New Haven is merely a dark hole under ground? There is, indeed, for a moment, a fluttering glimpse of cluster-ed spires, roofs, and groves across a broad, beautiful meadow-land, on which, in autumn, innumerable haycocks look like the pitched camp of affluent harvests. For a moment the eager fancy accepts correspondence that it shall not be disappointed—that it was no fable of the good Parley—that New Haven is worthy its fair fame.

For a moment—and then you chaos of backyards, out-buildings, and dilapidated walls rushes against the incredulous eye—the flowerful sights are suddenly fades—and, in a dim pit—a dark hole under ground—a mocking voice shouts, and repeats, "New Haven!"

The claims of truth are imperious; and the truth shall now be told.

There is, then, no such city as the New Haven of the geographies and common-informed report. For when the voice was heard, after the traveler had recovered from the withering disappointment, and could speak, he asked, "Where is the under heaven, and under earth, did they behold? Elms —elms—elms—green—rocks and ridges! Ahra! ehra!"

New Haven is a dark platform, swarming with people in waiting—a dismal hall, where people are engaged in running about with bags and bundles —a cunning-looking man—playing cunning hands into suppositious pockets—and planted in the attitudes of staring at inferential passengers hermetically sealed under glass cases. New Haven is a dusky light of wooden stairs, with a heavy balustrade, on which the passengers are leaning, and bending and descending—pointing dim, ghostly whips, and crying, in confused chorus, "Any—hacks—any—hacks—this—hack—this—hack—Hotel House—City—"

Fine-town, indeed! Small boys parading, probably, with baskets, and shouting apples, gumdrops, and popped corn!

New Haven is the antipodes of noisy darkness interrupting the journey to Boston.

If it is not a misnomer to call Boston arose the prosterous stories of a beautiful city—bare-faced imposition which is still offered to a child-like credulity! Why, in the name of common sense, is ridiculous Sir, by only a statue? Why do you always carry oranges in your pocket? Why is the proud passenger to do with stairs? The city above! Why, here we are, three hundred of us, with our trunks and bundles, in the dark—no answering, sign stories of this lovely city; we come to the very pinch in our necessities, by our connection with the dark declares New Haven to be; it is a perfectly ridiculous statement, but nobody denies it; and somebody about the dark platform has got to be tolerated? It is no city above that we have come to, but a dark, dismal, underground hole—a New Jerusalem in that direction, but we are tricked to New Haven, and we demand the clue, the secret, the reason why we are left in the dark holes.

Please, Sir, to observe, at least, an air of probability in your statements. The fact is, that this is only a station, and that by going out of this dark hole, up the ghostly stairs, we shall behold the green trees and the spires of the city, and revel in the beauties of New Haven. But have you not already said that the beauties are mostly rural scenery, that they are thrifty, liberal, and public-spirited? And do you expect us to be so cowed in this dismal abyss as to accept the thing you choose to say? Do you suppose that, if the people are what you declare them to be, they would allow their chief railway station to be the most disgraceful and wretched cellar in the country?

No, Sir, the thing is not to be believed! The beautiful city is a delusion. Ohimè! New Haven is a dark hole under ground.

SON SEQUITURS.

There is a story in the papers that a young lady of Jersey City has been fined for breaking Isaac Asylum a raving maniac, and that her inhumanity was produced by attending revival meetings.

There is a kind of popular logic which would instantly conclude that a revival was a manifestation of insanity, just as we frequently see a solemn warning against self-abuse in the Sunday papers, based upon the fact that somebody who believes in it has become insane. Undoubtedly an ill-balanced mind may go overboard in any direction, and the action produced by the most simple and natural occasion in the world. Nothing is more easy than to make insane by the death of dear friends; but it would be rather an absurd generalization to say that the death of friends generally produced insanity in parents. If you went to France, and the first thing you saw was a man with his head in a pocket handkerchief, it would be easy, but rather ridiculous, to infer that the French are addicted to the use of the red cotton handkerchief.

That a man loses his wits at a revival or a "spiritual meeting" is not an argument against revivals and spiritualistic meetings so much as against his wits. To make it an argument, you have to show that the general and necessary tendency of revivals or other meetings is to insanity.

There may be an occasional coincidence of a certain newspaper of a certain town, that the host of a party of naughty boys sailing in the bay on a Sunday afternoon, and being overtaken by a fog, got out of anchored, and the naughty boys were lost. Now, the boys who go sailing on Sundays will be drowned.

But in the same town it happened that a minister looking out of the window of an unfinished house, lost his balance, fell, and broke his neck. Thereupon another newspaper announced: "On Tuesday afternoon the Reverend James Jones was standing in the unfinished building No. 210 Water Street, and looking from the window, unfortunately lost his balance and fell to the ground, breaking his neck by the fall. This melancholy casualty should serve as a warning to clergymen not to look out of windows of unfinished buildings on Tuesday afternoons."

"HOUSE TO LET" AT HOME.

If it is fortunate that we live in a day when there are no Pharisees grateful that they are not like certain Publicans, or it might be suspected that there were probably people in the amiable city of New York who read the Household Words story of "A House to Let" (Harper's Weekly, extra), with wondered why people would write such unlikely stories as that of a child pinched and stunted by rascals of any sex, salaried by others; or who were glad to think that even if such things were possible in a Solon like London, they were only horrible dreams in an Auburn like New York, that loves the village of Hicksville.

And yet, the other day, it all came out that a little orphan girl was found in a cellar, locked up within a stone's toss, almost, of the readers of the story. Three children, hired out to be taken care of, were found dead to death in another cellar-den. There is, happily, some doubt of the entire truth of the story; but if true, is it simply the most shocking exposure of the year in the disgusting annals of the city.

The system under which such crimes are possible is barbarous. This business of "hiring out" youngsters and children to the worst bidder for a premium offered upon inhumanity. The records of the results are too painful to read, and any thing at all approaching to them would not be tolerated in a civilized community, not to say a Christian city (vide Half-Pay system).

Of course, any body who contracts to "keep" a pauper or a family for twelve or fifteen dollars a year deliberately undertakes a dishonest bargain which he means to make money. Do you think he is going to expend fifteen dollars on a pauper? Do you suppose he is not going to pay himself for his trouble out of the fifteen dollars? It would be more humane—it would be better for the pauper morality, this persons who offered the peace and quietly of so much per head to any person or persons who should be at once despatched of the said. Why bury them in the cellars of a state workmost—by killing madness, or by suffering the people to live who contract to "keep" them?

The care of the poor and the insane is to redeem a charge upon every community to be criminally liable. Their treatment with every possible kind and humane man will be, not what is the lowest sum for which any brute will agree to save us the trouble, but what is the sum for which by our own officers, in our own institutions, by our own regulations, can be secured for them while living, and bury them when dead?

We are, of course, a Christian people, and New York is pre-eminently a Christian city in its professions, sometimes, as if a way might be contrived, by a political economy, in which we might even be a little more Christian.

Perhaps Mr. Spurgeon will show us how.

THE MONEY VALUE OF LIFE.

There is sometimes a terrible railroad mastery; but upon the whole, when we consider how incessantly thousands of people are traveling in this country by day and night, the loss of life is very slight. When we remember how much the country plunged into railroad enterprises when they were started, and how help frightful was the average steeple-chase across the country, which every passenger practically was, we have all been singularly preserved.

Yet the exposure, then and now, is the very reason why the railway companies should be liable for the heaviest damages in all cases of accident. Passengers have safe rate upon the New Haven Railroad since the Revere disaster, because the enormous damages allowed were so large that the Company found a few accidents cheaper on the whole than the profit. Corporations have pockets, if they have no souls.

There is now pending a case in Boston which solaces the heart of the railway traveler. A certain Mr. Blake was done to death on the line of the Boston Railroad, and his widow sued the Company. A verdict was rendered in her favor of some $15,000. Thereupon another new trial. This time a verdict of $20,000, and now a motion for a third new trial. By all means let it be granted, and the suit proceed from trial to trial until the damages reach $50,000. Then that be multiplied stood as the minimum sum which every railroad company must pay for every life lost; and the murderer, already, as we cheerfully admit, small, will become beautifully less.

As the sum would increase in point of facility and speed, so ought the safety. Mechanical improvement of every kind is very imperfect and unsatisfactory if it increases the comparative loss of life.

THE REV. MR. SPURGEON.

There seems to be no doubt that the famous Mr. Spurgeon is coming to this country, and that the May Anniversaries will be illuminated by the appearance of the Englishman who has created a greater oratorical popularity than any English clergyman since Whitefield.

It is an impossible to forestall the impression which the noted young preacher will produce. There is no doubt that he will astonish and delight many of we Americans like to go to meeting—but he will be tried by very severe standards. The American people are difficult to be cash. Fine orators, both in the pulpit and out, are not uncommon; and Mr. Spurgeon comes to a very elegant and refined to supersede in popular estimation many of our own speakers.

There is nothing in his published sermons, nor in the accounts of his preaching, which indicates remarkable talent. There are no striking thoughts, no rare and fine touches of feeling or fancy, no play of imagination—nothing but a highly colored religious rhetoric. He addresses habitually a vast crowd of people of a lower average education and intelligence than any corresponding crowd of Americans, and a people, also, little accustomed to hear eloquence in the pulpit. They are apparently profoundly excited by the performance; but it is impossible to trace in the reports of it any thing of the kindling and elevating eloquence of George Whitefield, the fiery candor of John Wesley, or the sweet persuasion of Charles.

We are glad that Mr. Spurgeon does not come to us upon a speculation. When the Church ceases to command, and appeals to the love of the drama implanted in the human soul, it has certainly abdicated its mission. It is a pity that a crowd should follow a preacher, as it does an actor, for the sake of emotional excitement. There is nothing more fatal than mere imagination. For it saps and wastes the very springs of noble character.

Of course we do not mean that rich, vigorous, picturesque, and stirring preaching is necessarily unimaginative, or that fine and delicate fancy necessarily solemn and religious. When Whitefield called upon the angel to stay, me fly while there was yet one unrepented sinner, the effect was probably thrilling. But it is only genius that can do such things.

Let us therefore hope that Mr. Spurgeon has genius.

LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

Mr. W. T. and Mr. W. J., who writes to the Lounger and the Editor a reference to some drawings forwarded by him, will obtain the information the desires by addressing a note to the Editor, mentioning the State in which he lives. People who live in a town in which misses as Beverley should be aware that it is impossible for their correspondents to divine the State in which their particular locality is situated.

Hodge-Medger, Jun., in St. Albens, Vermont, and Belle Evans, in Louisville, Kentucky, are both indignant with the Lounger's correspondent, Darter, who, a few weeks since, protested against bogging in public. Hugger-Mugger, Jun., declares that he has seen the same car with Traveller, who preserved his "privacy" by going to sleep, spreading his mouth wide, and snoring, and H. Jun contends that it is quite possible to see a pretty plump hand, and "to hear singing, talking, or even scolding, that does not offend the more." That is a matter of taste. Certainly it is not very pleasant to listen to snoring. Let Traveller shield himself as well as he can. If he prefers to hear snoring—very well. But what has he to say about snoring himself?

H. Jun. proceeds:

"Should 'Traveller' ever make a long journey, with a wife, or even a lady friend, the probability is unless he is wisely destitute of feelings that about the time they were making the sixth hundred miles, he would prefer her to rest her weary head wherever she saw proper to select it, and to which end the shoulder of a man is made the place as comfortable as possible.

"After riding some many hours without rest or sleep, people are not usually very punctilious in regard to conserving the ruins of their personal appearance.

"And now, Mr. Lounger, don't you think it would be a good idea for 'Traveller,' next time he dreams upon some mental, 'what I would do if I were Lounger,' to begin thus:

"'And when he again places his 'eye' at your service, won't you remind him of an old saying about a mote and a beam'.

"Should he be inclined to talk about 'Hops,' advise him—is friendly way—to 'mind his own business and his own ears.'"

Let Traveller attend to himself. But the Lounger may say a reply to the plea about the "sixth hundred miles," that Traveller expressly implied that the lady was not sleepy. And as for French coy, there are ways and ways. A woman may lean her head upon a gentleman's shoulder in a car without the slightest confidence, and may do it so that every body is attracted as to a spectacle that should rather be avoided.

Belle Evans declares that it is all very upon the part of Traveller; that he is a very old bachelor and "never had a dear good hug in his life." If she only knew him she declares she would travel with every train with him, "and wouldn't I—?" She does not say what.

—Lucie, Malines, New York, asks the following very sensible questions, to which answers are desired from the romantic:

"Do 'white-washed cottages' ever really have a 'wood-bine-covered porch'? What species of plant is the woodbine? I had a fine one, but the gardener 'believed to grow near a house rot the timbers, besides being not safe in many respects, and so I suppose I have to have one.

"Why is it that the conventional bachelor is always minus his shirt-buttons? Among the gentlemen of my acquaintance it is the married men whose buttons are generally missing for which they are continually scolding their wives? Is it the bachelors' buttons' appear to be kept in perfect order—I suppose because they have to do them?

"Do the little girls in stories always put up their hair in curl-papers preparatory to going to bed and sleeping all night? I have tried to read of a single straight-haired child manifesting a proclivity for that romantic amusement."

—Carsmel, Pleasant Corner, parodies Longfellow's "Excelsior," and ends with a pomn upon "The Evening-spending Bore."

"There is no little evil,
But it grows if tended more,
Thus that prince of all stupidity,
The evening-spending bore.

"I'd breathe the incense of her head,
And—

C. A. P., of New Orleans, writes to the Lounger:

"I have often been exceedingly shocked by the manner in which some people kiss each other; that is, in giving one of those sounding salutes which are the exclusion of a Parisian gay or something similar.

"I would press my lips on hers
As daintily as the humming-bird
Touches his bill into the snow-bottom cup,
And with one long, noiseless breath
I'd breathe the incense of her head.

C. A. P. would do just right. A kiss, like the first he describes, which goes off with a smack, with a report, is probably the act of those who "Do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame."

We give herewith a couple of illustrations of a scene which, though a matter of history, will seem incredible to persons unacquainted with passing events in Utah.

One of the most objectionable features in the Mormon theocracy is the right which it arrogates to itself to shed blood upon ecclesiastical pretexts. Brigham Young preaches in one of his sermons, as published in the Deseret News, as follows:

"I do know that there are sins committed of such a nature that if the people did understand the doctrine of Salvation they would tremble because of their situation; and, furthermore, I know that there are transgressors, who, if they know themselves, and the only condition upon which they can obtain forgiveness, would lay of their heirs-ves to shed their blood, that the smoke thereof might ascend to God as an offering to appease the wrath that is kindled against them, and that the law might have its course."

President Grant, in a sermon published in the same paper, remarks: "There are men and women among us that I would advise to go to the President immediately and ask him to appoint a Committee to attend to their case, and then let a place be selected, and let that committee shed their blood."

A terrible instance of this fanaticism has occurred quite recently, which will greatly enlighten our readers as regards the frequent atrocities of this anomalous sect. A poor deaf and dumb boy, who was known to be a witness in a case of "Danite" assassination, which would certainly have commanded the attention of the Federal Court, has, for some time past, been the subject of general anxiety among them. That he expected to see the laws faithfully executed. Some time ago, one of the most respectable merchants in the Territory purchased in Camp Floyd that the boy would, very likely, fall a victim to the Danites. Such incident hardihood, in the face of the organized Federal Court, supported by a formidable posse comitatus, could scarcely be credited. The prediction, however, has already been verified.

"Dummy," as the boy was called, was the son of a poor Danish widow. He was simple almost to idiocy. His poverty and misfortunes had enlisted the sympathy of the whole Gentile community, who delighted in giving him alms. When the contemplated assassination was whispered abroad the interest in his behalf became universal. But all at once the poor swordsman was missing from the streets. "Where has Dummy gone? where has Dummy gone?" was the query on every side. The Mormon answer was, that he had gone into the country to work. A month or more elapsed, and the poor widow became solicitous about her son.

It is well known that the maternal attachment is always strongest toward those children who are most unfortunate. Such seems especially to have been the case with Mrs. Hansel. Long since left alone in the world with only her deaf and dumb child, she had beguiled a sad widow's life in his nourishment and instruction. She could communicate intelligibly with him by signs, and, to a certain extent (notwithstanding his simplicity), could awaken within him a sense of right and wrong. As it too often happens, however, in such cases, her influence was greater than her prudence. Supposing the poor mute could not possibly excite the apprehensions of the Prophet, she either willingly or unwittingly permitted him to mingle with the Gentiles. This, in accordance with the Danite code, requires that his blood should be spilled as incense to God.

But who could be found so fiendish as to accomplish so foul a deed? The quotation above, from Grant's sermon, answers the question. A "committee," consisting of Christiansen and Eph Hanky, are appointed. The sequel will show that they performed a murder which, for fanaticism, barbarity, and utter contempt for law, has no parallel in the civilized world. In obedience to the ecclesiastical dictum, Christiansen (armed with a revolver and bowie-knife) set forth on his mission of death on the 12th of November. On the same day he arrived at Eph Hanky's shanty.

His pretext for accosting Dummy was that he has stolen money. Dummy, not being able to comprehend him, produced eleven dollars in dimes and half dimes, which he had received as charity. This is not enough: Christiansen draws his revolver and threatens to shoot him. The terrified mute flies. The assassin fires four shots at him, three taking effect.

The bleeding body was then thrown on a load of wood and conveyed to an obscure cañon, where the work of death was completed by cutting his throat from ear to ear, Eph Hanks assisting by holding the head.

A hole was dug, the body thrown in and covered with earth, but nothing was said about it for several weeks. The poor widow suspecting something wrong, consulted the Prophet. He at once acknowledged the murder, but assured her it was necessary for his salvation that his blood should be offered up as an atonement to God.

The Federal authorities heard of the matter, and endeavored to bring the fiend to justice; but with a Mormon Grand Jury, sworn by the most fearful oaths to sustain Brigham, no true bill was found. Christiansen is released, and frequently ever his cups facetiously boasts that Dummy was the hardest fellow to kill he ever tried. It took a whole day to do it.

MR. ASPINWALL'S GALLERY.

THE erection of the two galleries of Messrs. Aspinwall and Belmont, in our city, is an event not to be passed by in the history of the day. These and other events bring more forcibly than ever to our minds the resemblance between our own city and its inhabitants and the great mercantile cities of Italy of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and show us that, however progressive the world is, the human mind remains the same; and how, under similar circumstances, though in different times and positions, the same mental energy that produces wealth is carried forward to the higher and nobler objects—the cultivation of the intellectual in Art and Science.

Thus, as the foremost merchants of Florence, Venice, and Genoa became the greatest patrons of the arts in their day, so now we see many of the first men of our day following in their footprints. This is a wise provision of Providence. We, the public, can not but feel just pride in the mental power and indomitable perseverance which have produced our canals and railways, spanned the Isthmus of Panama, opened Japan, and carried our merchant flag to every part of the world; and we can not but feel pleasure in seeing the wealth thus obtained expended in the application of it to the purposes of beneficence and in the cultivation of the arts, by which much always has the effect of raising the social standard of any nation.

The Gallery which contains engravings illustrative of an ordinary walk in the house of the proprietor. In the exterior the architect, Mr. Renwick, has preserved the green features of the architecture of the main building. The Gallery is entered by a fine arched gateway on Tenth Street. Passing through this, the visitor arrives at a door on his left leading to a marble vestibule, which opens into a corridor at the rear of the gallery, and from which they are entered. This corridor, which is some ten feet, and thirty-four feet long, is lighted by sky-lights, and in it are many small works of Art, among which we may mention as worthy of particular observation, The Portrait of Washington, by Stuart; The Portrait of Lafayette, by Ary Scheffer; A Portrait, by Wood-ville; Two Dutch Engagements, by the celebrated Vander Helst; and a Judith, by Feti, surnamed the Guido of the Florentine School.

In the centre of the north wall of this corridor is a very fine group in marble, representing Columbus with a native of the New World, by the Chevalier Cantalini, the Professor in the Academy of Florence.

Turning from this, we enter the first of the three series proper, for there are two, Mr. Aspinwall having wisely decided that he would have both modern and ancient pictures, giving to each a separate habitation. We may here say that, to arrange the light of the galleries, the whole plan of the owner and his architect to throw the light on the pictures and leave the walls in shade, and thus preventing the dazzling effect on the eye consequent on the admission of the great masses of light in many galleries. This is done effectually by the interposition of screens suspended from the ceilings under the sky-lights, which admit light freely on the pictures, cast a shadow on the centre of the Gallery. "The screens are arranged so that they can be adjusted, by inclosing out the sky-light, and making the ceiling complete when they are lighted by gas.

The principal Gallery, twenty-two feet wide and thirty-four feet long, contains the pictures of the Old Masters. At the east end, opposite the door of the rear drawing-room, is the Conception by Murillo, purchased from the Duke of Soult, King of Holland, so placed as to be seen from the whole suite of rooms. This beautiful work is flanked, on one side by a Landscape by Claude, and by a picture of the school of Correggio.

At the opposite end of the gallery is the full-length Portrait of the Marquis Longmey, Governor-General of Milan, by Vandyke, and of a Knight of Malta, by Velasquez. This latter picture is one of the most famous hundred and fifty pictures engraved under his superintendence, and was purchased from the Marquis Durazzo, of Genoa.

On the south end of the room, and opposite the entrance, are two very fine pictures, one of which we observed, is peculiarly beautiful, by Sybil, by Guercino (purchased of the Sciarra family, at Pisa; The Saviour and St. John, by Correggio, purchased of the Duke of Casano, of Naples; A Singing Boy, by Paulo Veronese, purchased of the Monastery of Berengna, Naples; and two fine Copy: a Titian; and other Murillo's; besides many others of great value and undoubted originality. Opposite one of these pictures, on the north wall, among the most prominent are—a Landscape, by Rembrandt, formerly belonging to Count Stadion; a Landscape, by Jacques Berdal; a St. Peter, by Guido; St. Sebastian, by Andrea del Sarto; and others of equal merit.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MR. ASPINWALL'S GALLERY—WEST END.

Passing from this Gallery to the east, we come into the smaller Gallery, appropriated to the Modern School.

This is eighteen feet by twenty-two feet, and contains some fifty or sixty pictures. Among the most striking we may mention a superb Moonlight Sea View; a Storm, by Gudin, representing the Wreck of the Admiral of the Spanish Armada on the Coast of Scotland, from a sketch taken by the painter on the spot near which the wreck actually occurred; The Removal of the Body of Wallenstein after his Murder, painted by Piloty, of Munich; Three very fine Cattle Pieces, by Braemont; a superb Cattle Piece, by Ommegank; The Annunciation, by Jalabert, pupil of Paul Delaroche; The Supper at Emmaus, by Carl Müller, of Dusseldorf; A Card Party, by Ten Kate; Pictures by Verlockhoven, Brias, Leys, Madou, and other masters of the French and Flemish schools; with several by Huntington, Church, and Gignoux.

MR. ASPINWALL'S GALLERY—EAST END.

It is of course impossible to give a detail of all the painters represented in this Gallery, or of the subjects of their pictures, of which there are more than 100, all choice works of Art, purchased with great care during a residence of two years in Europe.

Many of the pictures in this Gallery—such as the Vandyke, the Murillo, and the Titian—could hardly be replaced if they were lost, so difficult has it become to obtain undoubted works by these artists; and in this respect Mr. Aspinwall has been extremely fortunate in acquiring works of undoubted authenticity from the families in whose possession they had remained in many cases for centuries, and to whom from their first production.

We hail this and its fellow galleries as another step in the right direction—another evidence of the civilization attendant upon our mercantile energy.

THE NAPIER BALL.

[FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.]

WASHINGTON CITY, February 18, 1859.

DIMPLE, and dearie, my dear sister, was the highest-ton from New York here, diversified by unanimely jostlings at each change of care, and by the persistent efforts of the conductors to keep themselves awake by waking up all sleeping passengers, under pretenses of seeing their tickets. Had no my friend Mr. Everett found the sleeping-cars on the New York Central road, they must be delightful to me compared to the torturous and bad modations on the Jordan-like route between the commercial metropolis and the political capital of the republic. I was fortunate enough, however, to meet with a venerable acquaintance who remembers Washington City for about as long a time and from him I learned that the NAPIER BALL, which I was on my way to attend, was the great event. The resisters at the Federal capital have ever delighted to "welcome the coming, speed the parting" representative of our Anglo-Saxon fatherland; and in olden times, when ministers came in state, on man-of-war vessels, the Washingtonians went to Annapolis to greet them at the water's edge. Sir Charles Bagot and Mr. Rush were honored with this; a grand entertainment donnavate was given here to M. de Neuville on his departure; and Mr. Vaughn was complimented with a ball on leaving the first time, followed by a dinner the next day; when he left the second time the dinner was omitted. Arrangements had been projected for giving a farewell ball to Sir John Crampton, on some occasion, but Washington has empê he took French-leave; and now that his successor was, in turn, to make his exodus, the ball was to be a first affair. The reminiscences of these entertainments in years gone by, and of those who figured in them, dispelled the loneliness of the flight glad was I when the unlooked dome of the Capitol loomed up in the misty distance, and when I found myself within the walls of that noted caravansary, Willard's Hotel.

The ball was the only topic of conversation in Washington. The master dog of England waved harmoniously with the Stars and Stripes over the locality of the festival, of which your artist obtained a very clear sketch, although no view can give an idea of the scene of accumulated splendor which. At the Capitol grave Senators and honorable Congressmen were gathered in social conversation; The fancy-stores on the Avenue were crowded; French hair-dressers and cooks (artists all) rushed frantically about; and the office of Mr. Kennedy, where the managers sat in solemn conclave, guarding the portals in advances by dint of the sale of tickets "not transferable," was crowded with the eleventh hour men. Very appropriate were the ladies' invitation-cards, headed by a beautiful pictorial device (of which a sketch is sent by your artist) representing the armorial shields of Great Britain and of the United States in maternal and filial juxtaposition, ornamented with the delicate blades of Indian corn, the roses of York and Lancaster, the shamrock of the Green Isle, and, twining about all, the thistle—whose wit and valor which gave birth to him in whose honor the festival was given, and who has Nap-tir in the service of his sovereign.

There were those, too, who undertook to crucify themselves on the X which represented the price of a ticket, often to be multiplied manifold by the holies of their families, who, of course, had a liking to waste. Lord Napier had never sported the acquaintance of these grumblers, it appeared; he had only met them at Dublin Castle at one of the entertainments at the Embassy; and why, oh! why should they join in a parting compliment to him as the representative of our Anglo-Saxon fatherland. They also deemed the price of tickets extravagant, but your artist was present at a time for which it was only necessary to give a dollar for the supper-ticket; and as the ball was given in the entire corps diplomatique, it was anti-republican! And thus they grumbled. Heaven help them!

THE EVENING OF THE BALL.

The evening arrived, and with it came a drenching shower, refreshing to the hosts of unregulated hitchers with which the city of magnificent distances is infested, but by no means pleasant to the ball-goers. Willard had, however, very thoughtfully caused to be erected a canvas portico, which covered the entrance-porch and the sidewalk, so that ladies could step under cover from their carriages to the door.

DRESSING AND RECEPTION ROOMS.

The entire suit of parlors on the Fourteenth Street side of the hotel, with others near by, were used as dressing and reception rooms. One parlor was especially reserved for the guests of the evening, viz.: Lord and Lady Napier, the Diplomatic corps, and the members of the Cabinet with their ladies. When each of these or several had arrived, they were formally escorted by the Executive Committee of the Board of Managers down stairs into the ball-room, the band playing "God Save the Queen." The broad staircase down which they passed was lined with rare exotics, embedded in moss, and ornamented with mirrors.

THE HALL-ROOM.

This magnificent apartment, one hundred and fifty-feet in length, was draped with the insignia of all nations, supplied for the occasion from the navy-yard at Brooklyn and here. Opposite the staircase was a raised orchestra, also draped with flags, and at the northern extremity was a rostrum, behind which was a mammoth oval mirror, flanked by full-length portraits of George Washington, and Queen Victoria. On this platform were chairs for Lord and Lady Napier, and sofas for the other guests; but they refused to occupy it for an hour, and the position of honor was occupied by a bevy of beauty; the chairs and sofas were by no brilliant means, and be surveyed.

The armorial bearings of the United States and of England were hung on the walls at different points, and on the floor was painted, with artistic ability, the arms of the Napier, with motto and motto, of which your artist has sent a sketch. Large chandeliers lit up the scene with a flood of light, and matted jacket was the scene. Fair women in the pride of full dress, and decked with jewels rare; brave men in the uniforms of the army, the navy, and the marine corps; diplomats decked with crosses and stars; with many of the most noted and accomplished civilians of the land of our country, formed a spectacle rarely seen on this side of Atlantic. Some of the ladies were in the most surpassingly lovely, glittering like the morning star, full of life and joy, and "fairer than the ghost of hot hills roses in the vale of Arno, seen first over the silence of Morven;" and, as if to set out the beauty by contrast, there were present a number of the "Pike County" class, with a few well-preserved, elaborately-painted, and carefully-corseted old dowagers of antediluvian fashions every lady moved in the "fashionable circles" which so glorious prevail in Washington, and all were apparently at out of the question. But the inspiring strains of the band could not be resisted, and the measured evolutions of the lancers or the dance of waltz were executed in the smallest possible compass. No one occupied a smaller locomotive space than his partner (the bewitching Miss H., of Baltimore), and could not feel her for an hour. The Hon. Mr. Dallas and Lady Napier made a favorite flirtation with an epaulated lieutenant on a soft tenenth the stairs, and that she seemingly complained that she had been deserted in the dance!

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Honor to whom honor is due, and the gentlemen who have managed the ball deserved merit especial mention. First and foremost was Senator Slidell, who actually danced with Lady Napier, at once banished from his shrewd countenance that Zerah Colburn, mental-arithmetic look with which he is more overlooking his duties as the Presidency. Hon. Anthony Kennedy, the Senator from Maryland, was another gentleman of the Committee of fair ones from the monumental city. On the arm of W. W. Corcoran, Esq., the Treasurer of the Corcoran Gallery of Art, and guardian of a rich yet simple dress, and not an ornament in her hair, but which she looked as if she had just thrown Henry Ledyard, Esq., the son-in-law of General Cass, is at home on such occasions. Hon. Mr. Colfax, of Indiana, was a noble representative of the thoroughbred Virginia gentleman; and W. H. Hodge, Esq., was an epitome of the gentlemanliness of this working trio. But the real labor, responsibility, and toil was borne by J. C. A. Jones, Esq., of Washington, in connection with his labors on the last census.

THE GUESTS.

Lady Napier, with his sweet, homelike smile and courtly grace, was, of course, the observed of all observers, and looked surpassingly lovely in white silk, flounced with black lace; her headdress was a net-work of gold, from which waved feathers and black lace, and she wore a black lace shawl. Lord Francis, Baron Napier, of Thirlestane, and Lady Clara Napier, a Wesleyan lion coat with bright buttons, and a white choker. He is a most accomplished master of diplomacy, and generally considered to be going to Russia, before landing, yet steady manners. When he addresses an audience—as he does frequently—nobody can tell has been here—he says what he has to say, and no more, in excellent taste and with unerring tact. He is also a most gallant and polished gentleman, fascinating the fair one to whom he talks, his quiet manner and voice being in keeping with the quality of his musical voice evidently possessing magnetic power. A lover of art, he is noted as an admirer of the beautiful, and every inch of the true man.

M. le Comte de Sartiges, wearing the commander's cross of the legion of honor, and Madame la Comtesse, who wore a most becoming blue brocade. The Spanish Minister was to attentive to a fair lady from the West that he forgot himself, he may favor amenorism after all. General Herran executed the duties of Secretary of Legation, but who is well versed in Central American affairs. Waldemar de Bodisco and a score of minor diplomatic stars were present, but the popular couple the belles. No wonder! They waltz steadily, these gallant men, their heads erect, their feet dancing, and they are all on the regular ladder of promotion. Did not Lady Ouseley marry old Sir Gore when he was here a year ago? Many Arkansas parents, however, by no means approve of these hitherto of their daughters to foreigners, especially when these daughters are to be the recipients of carefully treasured property.

GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS.

The President, by the etiquette of our republican court, can not visit a public entertainment, and it is lucky for him that he can not. His comely and beautiful niece was of course missed, for she graces and adorns every scene of which she forms a part; but Miss Lane was present, and was well represented by Mrs. Craig, a most querulous and fascinating widow, who is this winter a guest there, and whom "beauty unadorned" in a deep-blue dress sat many an elaborate toilet in the shade. She was escorted by that amiable gentleman Mr. J. Buchanan Henry, who is soon to vacate the post of private secretary to "Uncle James," to put on the wreaths of Hymen and commence the practice of law. Colonel Scudder, the District Marshal; P. Barton Key (son of the author of the "Star-spangled Banner"), the District Attorney; and Dr. Block, the commissioner of Public Buildings and Usher of the White Rod, were all there. Nor can Ex-Marshall Hoover, with his pleasant face and lovely wife, be forgotten here.

The Secretary of State (pardonus in the performance of duty) was when he commenced his veiled, yet unbroken, official career over fifty years ago; yet seemed somewhat disappointed at reports so industriously circulated, that he is failing. The Secretary of the Interior, with his equal-tempered and accomplished wife, representative of Department and the State of Mississippi most creditably. But the ladies were decided to the non-appearance of the belle, par excellence, Miss Narcissa Saunders. The mail service, however, had a worthy representative in Miss Kitty, the fair daughter of the Assistant Postmaster - General, who, in company with males who know her, yet were delivers them from their suspense. Mr. John Appleton, Assistant Secretary of State, and the "King's men" (Mr. Hill) seemed somewhat lonely, but his lady was in capital spirits and a becoming dress beside, and was the belle of a ringlet, fair, and bewitching damsel from Salem, Massachusetts, ever celebrated for its witchcraft. Its fascination elsewhere. There was Mr. Eames, that editorial Tellegrand, with his accomplished lady; the newspaper reporters, Mr. Benjamin Perley, and G. G. Squier, whose wife wore a royal purple velvet with great grace; and Colonel C. F. Smith, the 9-year city; Colonel John Nugent, who has turned his back upon Bogota to be Governor of Californias; and Major Heap, who for a time was also his editorial duties to sport the diplomatic button.

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Senators, as representatives of sovereign States, claim precedence of Members of Congress, and so Senator Mason (one of the true Virginia gentlemen of the olden time) and Senator Slidell, the gallant of the evening, were the first to present the ball. Gallantry to his corrugated features as he played the agreeable to Miss Martha Haines Butt, a young, handsome, and gifted authoress from Norfolk, Virginia, who wore a simple white dress, spotted with scarlet pomegranate flowers, and looked as if she had each other in paying homage to Madame Crittenden, the inheritress of the graces of the Virginia court of Lady Washington, and the fair daughters of South Carolina, who were escorted by Senator Hammond, and the accomplished Senator Butler, who is in a few days to receive from a public service of forty-five years to enjoy retired happiness in his native State, and who he added to our constitution, was the devoted attendant of Miss Caroll, of Maryland, whose brother Willie and his burly brother, Hale, of New Hampshire, were equally gallant; and Mrs. Hale, as usual, was surrounded by those who love conversivity and admire her New England home-manners. Senator Gwin, with his accomplished daughter (beautiful coral did the daughter wear), seemed none the worse for the wash of the Pacific Ocean. Mr. Crittenden, whose head is as massive as his heart is incorruptible, and we all know is as unbending as the oak, and around with some contempt in his face, and the manner in which his scrutinized some excessive valentines sent to the belles of the party."

Mr. Speaker Orr, whose massive form is not easily overlooked in any crowd, did not have the "mace" borne before him; but I noticed in the hall Mr. Clark, of Missouri; Mr. Curtis, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Chief Clerk Carter, with his inevitable and well-known smile; Mr. Forney, and Mr. Postmaster Clusky. All shades of politics were represented. Buringame, whose personal friends are on hand to-day, and who, by the way, has made a sus-ace with the chivalric Keitt, of South Carolina, was also excellent in his choice in the selection of their partners. Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, is always an object of interest to those who revere his father's memory. Mr. Wheeler, formerly of New York, enjoys the double reputation of having the most accomplished lady and the handsomest library of any member on the floor. With Messrs. Combs and Hall, of the old Bay State, were their accomplished and excellent wives. Mrs. Reidy, of Tennessee, was accompanied by his daughter, whose dress and style would do credit to any court.

The majority of the Representatives, however, were solos, and they were prominent in their attentions to two of that fascinating class against whose attractions the elder Disraeli warned his son Samivel. Mrs. Conrad, of Louisiana, is of the true Grecian cast of form and feature, tall, lithe, and surpassingly graceful in her every movement, while the bewitching expression of her features is enhanced by the sad yet sunny glances of her falcon-like eyes, and the gentle tones of her musical voice—no wonder that, while receiving the admiration of mankind, she has excited the envy of her own unchartable sex. Equally admired, but of a more Roman and less Style of beauty, is Mrs. Bass, of Mississippi, who would have been a fit model for Phidias when he modeled his statue of Hebe. Rogers, and Mrs. Wade Hale, trimmed with forget-me-nots, set off a form that no one who saw it can forget.

THE FOURTH ESTATE.

Colonel Scudder, of the National Intelligencer, ever commands respect as the accomplished senior-editor of that time-honored sheet. Colonel Johnson, of that executive "organ" the Washington Union, a tall, fine-looking gentleman, contrasting strongly in every way with his equally-prominent and but "hand-organ" the Star. In the pleasant features of Pryor, of the States, there is no indication of the malignant bitterness of his often unprovoked invectives, but his eye betokens the courage and the enthusiasm of the Celt, which the brain has marked out by Calhoun. Colonel Schuyler—he may be a general, for all these editors have some Indian blood in their veins—is a fine, manly specimen, and I am confident that he does not put the gall and wormwood in the editorial columns of the stern and ascetical features of Mr. Fike (his Maye's husband), of the New York Tribune, spoke. He thought that would be the last J. S. Fike from this city. Of "correspondents" there was at least a score, although "the female was appended," and this phrase recalls to my mind the Belgravian dignity with which our Empress's maid moved through the throng, and the ladylike ease with which that "fairy star," Mrs. Bonwald, mingled in the festivities of the evening.

"All the world's a stage," and she could see around her some countenances more besraged and bedevilled than any of the Bedouins in the foot-lights.

OUR NATION'S DEFENDERS.

The "armory and navery officers, in brass coats with their bright buttons, and their bright swords by sides, were out in full force, and all grades were represented, from Major General Jessup down to the youngest midshipman. Among the naval officials up to Commodore Kearney, who has been in the service fifty-two years, and who looks as if he has been at sea. Colonel Magruder, with his broad sash en écharpe; Colonel P. St. George Cooke, with his manly form and soldierly bearing; Colonel E. Johnson; Surgeon General Lawson; and other officers, recalled the Florida war, when the Indians in Florida and on the plains—at Cerro Gordo and at Chapultepec. Nor is there any danger that the brave and efficient Col. Lee, of Indiana, will forget, while such naval officers as Ingraham, Sands, Hunt, Hollingsworth, and others there last night are alive to keep it flying. There too was Colonel Harris, the new commander of the marines, with his large Roman head and massive features, that he could the militia have a better representative than Colonel Lee? Or other "native American" than the "buckskin colonel" of Braddock's army, and an aid-de-camp to Governor Wise, or Colonel J. W. Lasher, who is the Chief Engineer of the Fire Department, and who was in superintending the wagon-road to the Pacific.

NOTABLES.

Lenzo, the artist, was greeted by many friends on his return from the Old World; Brady, the indomitable photographer, was there; Mr. Bell, the very popular here. Then we had your New York dignitaries of fashion, of talent and resplendent.

THE SUPPER.

At half past eleven o'clock a curtain, which had formed the end of the hall next the orchestra, was raised, and the supper-room was disclosed to us. The hall was in reality prolonged, until it was upward of three hundred feet in length, and along this extension ran the tables for the feast of fat recently—on which was the supper. It was a banquet which would have delighted the heart of Boyer could not have prepared a more elaborate repast at Brignoe, while there were also waiters from the Metropolitan Hotels from the kitchen of James's River, canvas-back ducks from the Delaware, reed birds from the Mississippi, terrapin from Kentucky, prairie hens from Iowa, mutton from the Cumberland mountains, venison from North Carolina, and other "native American" dishes. The sacharine architecture was wonderful, so delicately was the sugar wrought into models of Britannia and America, ornamented with the arms of the United States and of England, and decorated with the British and American flags. Flowers of the attack made upon luxuries and delicacies, but a corps of waiters kept the tables supplied with empty dishes, and meanwhile there was a running fire of Champagne corks, many Cyclops of gentlemen being made drunk, and not forgetting Dick Swiveller's precept to "sip the rum." Wonderful to relate, not a single accident took place, and some of the Executive Committee, there was not a toast, a sentiment, or a speech. BRYON.

After the supper, dancing was resumed, and was kept up until long past the "witching hour of night, when Morpheus claimed his own in their winding sheets." Of the prominent belles not before mentioned, I could speak in the highest terms, but I do not believe that the mail-agent will wait one moment beyond his allotted time. Your artist has kept pace with his pencil for two days, and now you his sketches—but it is impossible to do justice to the scene with either pen or pencil. The glowing light, the varied colors, the bright faces, the rich toilets, the general good humor, and the whole scene with the accessible manner in which the Messrs. Willard carried out the views of the Committee—all this may be appreciated, but cannot be described. In haste, toni e tout,

G. WASHINGTON JENKINS.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE

POLITICAL

CONGRESS.

On Monday, 14th, in the Senate, the new Senator from Oregon were introduced and drew for the long term. General Smith moved to take up the bill to refund Texas bonds, elected for six years from six March next, were presented. Senate up bill, after speeches by Seward and Toffit question; after which the Indian continued also Iten case was taken up, and, after speeches by Senator Seward, Bayard, Trumbull, Green, Fessenden, Benjamin, Gwinnan, Pugh, and others, the report of the Joint Committee was sustained, and the Committee discharged from further consideration of the subject by a vote of 38 to 13.——In the House Mr. English, from the Post-office Committee, reported a bill for the speedy trial of new post routes, and transportation of the mail on contract for the first four years. Amendments were moved by Messrs. Jones and Phelps, but they were lost, and the bill passed. Mr. Phelps moved a suspension of the rules to introduce a bill to authorize the issue of treasury notes to the amount supplied by 110 to 87. Much further consideration ensued on the subject, and amendments and substitutes, and speeches were made by Messrs. Phelps, Millson, Hughes, Stanton, and others, when the House took a recess.

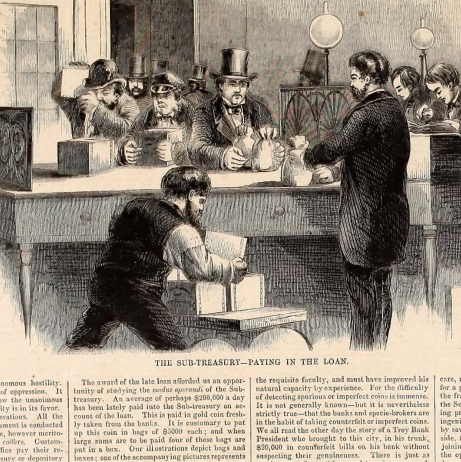
On Tuesday, 15th, in the Senate, Father Boyle, a Roman Catholic priest, of Washington, was introduced and took the oath of office. He noticed into the Joint during Senator Pearce's absence, and after a fruitless attempt to effect a vote on the bill, and a further attempt to amend the bill by Senator Bell, the consideration of the bill was postponed. Senator Wilson introduced a bill to modify the organization of the Army. Leaves of Senators is computed. The Cuba Bill was then taken up, and a long speech was delivered by Senator Crittenden. Remarks were made by other Senators, but nothing of consequence. In the House Mr. Stanton introduced a resolution directing the Sergeant-at-arms to apprehend John Cochrane, a witness before the Military Investigation Committee; adopted. Mr. Cochrane appeared before the Committee, and refused to answer certain questions. He declared it was not right that a witness should be subjected to such treatment. He considered the resolution a personal insult to him, and he refused to be sworn. He was then ordered into the custody of the Sergeant-at-arms, and was afterwards discharged on the ground that the Committee had no power to administer an oath. Mr. Cochrane then

THE UNITED STATES SUB-TREASURY AT NEW YORK.

Now that the United States are reduced to borrow money, and the newspapers are full of accounts of large sums paid in gold to the Sub-treasurer at New York, we have thought that an illustrated account of the Sub-treasury in this city would be both interesting and instructive. On calling upon Mr. Sub-treasurer Cisco, and stating our desire to make his office the subject of an article, we were received with a courteous welcome. Mr. Cisco regretted that the rooms occupied by his department and officers were not as large and commodious as they should be. At a glance it was easy to perceive that the area afforded by the building was miserably inadequate to the business transacted; and that, to avoid confusion, at least twice the space should be obtained. Still, such as it was, Mr. Cisco kindly offered to show us through his office, and to explain the functions of each officer.

Every one is aware that the crowning merit of Jackson's Presidency was the establishment of United States Sub-treasuries—in other words, the creation of Government offices for the deposit of Government funds, and the establishment of the national finances on a purely specie basis. At first the Sub-treasury system encountered great opposition—The banks assailed it with venomous hostility. Politicians called it an engine of oppression. It survived these assaults; and now the unanimous verdict of the financial community is in its favor.

It is very simple in its operations. All the financial business of the Government is conducted on a specie basis. No bank-note, however meritorious, ever enters the national coffers. Custom-houses, Land-offices, and Post-offices pay their receipts into the nearest Sub-treasury or depository in coin; and in coin all the officers of the United States—from the President to the poorest tide-waiter—are paid. In flush times, when the importations are large and immigration copious, the receipts into the Sub-treasury overload its vaults; when trade is checked, coin flows out of the Sub-treasuries into the banks. Experience has proved that, so far from being hurtful to the banks or the commercial community, so were at first apprehended, the Sub-treasury system has, in fact, proved a valuable auxiliary to both, by accumulating coin in times of bank expansion, and disbursing it when a bank contraction was necessary.



THE SUB-TREASURY—PAYING IN THE LOAN.

The award of the late loan afforded us an opportunity of studying the modus operandi of the Sub-treasury. An average of perhaps $200,000 a day has been lately paid into the Sub-treasury on account of the loan. This is paid in gold coin freshly taken from the banks. It is customary to put up this coin in bags of $5000 each; and when large sums are to be paid four of these bags are put in a box. Our illustrations depict bags and boxes; one of the accompanying pictures represents the actual payment of sums of money on account of the loan.

When money is received at the Sub-treasury it is straightway handed to Messrs. Birdsall and Cisco, Jun., to be counted and tested. The bags are emptied upon a counter—one of our engravings gives a fair representation of the scene—and these gentlemen proceed to count. It seems a very simple thing to count a few thousand dollars in gold coin. It is, in fact, so difficult a matter to do so, for the service of the United States Sub-treasury, that, in the language of the head of the office, to succeed in the business a man must be born with the requisite faculty, and must have improved his natural capacity by experience. For the difficulty of detecting spurious or imperfect coins is immense. It is not generally known—but it is nevertheless strictly true—that the banks and specie-brokers are in the habit of taking counterfeit or imperfect coins. We all read the other day the story of a Troy Bank President who brought to this city, in his trunk, $20,000 in counterfeit bills on his bank without suspecting their genuineness. There is just as much error afloat with regard to coins; so much science and skill are now devoted to the imitation of specie that, in the language of Mr. Cisco, to detect counterfeits a man needs to have been born with an eye, an ear, and a touch adapted for the business, and, further, to have improved these senses by large practice. Every one can tell by "the ring" a base metal coin from a silver or gold one. But to distinguish the ring of silver from that of gold—to detect unlawful alloy in a piece which really contains a large proportion of gold—to discover a piece that has been sweated, or filed, or bored, or diamonelled—needs no common tact.

The gentlemen who do the counting for the Sub-treasury count with both hands. When a $1000 bag is emptied before them, they plunge both hands simultaneously into the glittering mass, and with, draw each with a coin between the thumb and forefinger. Their sense of ear is so acute that if, in pouring out the contents of a bag, a spurious coin happens to strike against the counter, they will detect and denounce it though they may happen to be many yards distant. For the proportion of alloy they rely in some degree on the eye, which is so trained that the least imperfection is at once discovered. It is the sense of touch which serves to detect sweated or filed coins.

Latterly spurious gold coins have generally belonged to one of two kinds. They have either been sweated by a new process or they have been diamonelled. The new sweating process consists in filing off the edges of the coin and then remilling it. The old sweating plan was simply to rub the face of the coin on a file till it was smooth; this method is now obsolete, as even the banks will not take a sweated piece. But by taking an eagle and filing off the milled edge carefully a rogue may, if he be careful, get $1 50 worth of gold from a $20 piece, and, by remilling it with pice is set in circulation. These coins are so difficult to distinguish from each other that there are not half a dozen persons in the United States who can discern that they have been tampered with. Mr. Birdsall, we are told, singles them out with unerring accuracy, and to the amazement of the bank from which they came, rejects them. A few weeks since the police were set on the track of a woman who was engaged in passing coins altered in this way. One of the most acute detectives was set on her track, and every license was afforded her in order, if possible, to discover the factory where the nice operation of boring and filling these coins was performed. Unfortunately, some zealous but thick-headed policeman got wind of the lady's performances, and, by arresting her prematurely, defeated the aims of his superior officers.

A GOLD BRICK—ACTUAL SIZE.

Messrs. Birdsall and Cisco, Jun., count several hundred thousand dollars every day. When they have gone through a bag, they shovel the coins into the funnel depicted in our illustration, and transfer them to a bag, which is instantly tied and sealed, not to be opened till its contents are required for disbursement.

Specie is kept in the Sub-treasury in various shapes. Gold and silver coins are kept in bags. But the bulk of the bullion is in the shape of "bricks." These are solid pieces of metal in the form of small oblong blocks. We engrave herewith the largest of these "bricks." It is worth $5492 35, and is of the size of the engraving. Other bricks are made of various sizes, down as low, we believe, as $200. These last bricks, which one can take between the finger and thumb and stow away as conveniently as a tooth-pick in the waistcoat pocket, ought to be more generally used than they are by travelers. A couple of hundred dollars in coin is an awkward sum to carry in the purse or on the person; in the shape of a Treasury "brick," it can be carried more conveniently than a watch.

In the Sub-treasury vault, of which we give herewith a graphic illustration, these bricks and bags are ranged in rows. A common man is not a little amazed to find himself in a room the walls of which are, literally, solid gold. But there they stand—the gold bricks—as close as they can pack, each of them worth from $6000 to $1000. A shelf of such bricks is a large fortune. A cupboard, such as is represented in our illustration, would set up a millionaire. It will be noticed that several cupboard doors are represented in the engraving closely sealed. Only a few out of the number are kept open for disbursement; most of them are closed, and sealed with the seal of the department. Enough of them, however, are left open to bewilder the gaze of visitors, and to remind one of the tales of the Arabian Nights.

The New York Sub-treasury is, in fact, the Government Bank. There are other Sub-treasuries, and the Government has a trifle of money at Washington. But the real business of the Government is done at New York. Almost all the public subsidies are paid by drafts on New York. Nearly all the depositories are supplied with coin by transfer drafts on New York. Army, Navy, Civil and Diplomatic service, contractors and Congressmen—all, Cisco's office on a fixed day each month, with mathematical regularity. There are small drafts. Mr. Cisco is not unaccustomed to receive drafts for hundreds of thousands of dollars. Once, indeed, he was called upon to pay a little government check of no less an amount than seven millions of dollars in one sum, for the Mexican indemnity. The piece of paper on which it was drawn was no bigger or more distinguished in any way than a draft for a month's salary of a Government clerk.

THE SUB-TREASURY VAULT—GOLD BRICKS AND BAGS.

It may be remarked, in connection with these drafts, that such is the system with which the New York Sub-treasury is conducted, and such the skill and exactitude of Mr. Russell, the paying agent, and Messrs. Birdsall and Cisco, Jun., the clerks who count the receipts, that never since Mr. Cisco's appointment has an error of a dollar been committed in the accounts. A business of over two hundred millions a year is done; over eight hundred drafts are received, on the average, every day; but never, since Mr. Cisco had the management of the office, has a bad coin been taken, or a short payment been credited, or a forged or incorrect draft been cashed. It is not saying too much to add, that there is not a bank in the city of which as much could be stated.

Not the least curious desk in the Sub-treasury is that of the clerk who pays the interest on the public debt. The coupons and interest on about seven-eighths of the debt of the United States are paid at the Sub-treasury in New York. As is known, part of this debt is in the shape of coupon bonds, payable to bearer; the balance is in the shape of an "inscribed" debt, on which the interest is payable to parties whose names are entered on the great rolls at Washington. Every six months the names of these parties are written out in a book at the counter, and sent here to serve as a guide to the sub-treasurer.

These books are a curious study. Many of the names which they contain are household words. Some are the names of European: others of West Indians, and even Asiatics—Barely a third of the public debt is held in this country. The bulk of it, we imagine, is held in Continental Europe. One is not surprised to find the names of John J. Astor, Wm. B. Astor, Jacob Little, George Peabody, and such men, in a list of creditors of the United States; but they and their countrymen are in a minority. The heaviest foreign creditor we noticed is Lord Overstone (the famous Jones Loyd), who has lent this country no less than $250,000. A Spanish lady, Mercedi de Layrens, is our creditor to the tune of $200,000; and a noble friend of hers, the Count Cara Montalvo y Castillo draws six per cent. on $100,000. Several persons connected with the royal families of Europe are creditors of ours. The brother of the King of Naples took $50,000 some years ago, and instructed his agent to invest the dividends accruing thereon in the same security; he now owns over $70,000. His niece, the daughter of Bombs, is registered as a creditor for over $50,000. These wise people have been looking out for a rainy day. Another noble personage, the late Duchess of Orleans, has enough in United States Stocks to save the Count of Paris from being compelled to follow his grandfather's example and keep school; several of the Saxe Coburg Gothas have also invested in the same security.

The Count Rossi saw enough of this country, while he was here, to invest a few thousand in the famous name of Sontag; and little Paul Julien has a trifle—enough to keep him when his violin fails. One can readily account for the appearance of the name of the Rothschilds, both of London and Paris; but it is curious to note that the famous publisher, Panckouke, of Paris, is a creditor of the United States, and that the descendants of Beaumarchais de Toequeville to lodge some of his savings in the hands of our Government; and Lord Macaulay, who began with a bagatelle of some $5000, has since increased his venture to nearly $20,000. Now, we should never end if we attempted to enumerate all the great people who think their money well placed in United States securities. Here are Lord Dundonald, the great sailor, who has a large sum for a son of Neptune; the Duke of the Peninsula, the Count de Survilliers, Joseph Bonaparte, the Marquis of Chasseygne, Baring Brothers, Count de Beaumont, Count Carmedoli, and a host of other titled people who, perhaps, depend on the honesty and solvency of the United States Government for a living. Lord Elgin was enough of us to leave $17,500 of his savings in our six per cents; and the famous historian, Alexandre Herzen, has a bagatelle of $60,000 in the same security. There is another creditor whose name is a curiosity. It runs thus: Baron Louis Numa Expaminondas Justinian Aristides Decius Salis Hahnestein Lichtenstein Grotenstein. Have a man with such names drawing twenty-six dollars and fifty cents from the United States!

DID SHE LOVE HIM?

It was a dreary November day. The rain fell unceasingly on the ground, carpeted with sere, dead leaves. A chilly dampness was in the air. The bare branches of the maple-tree, whose shortlived crimson was now a dull brick, swept the parlor window like prison bars, so unlike the bright fruity lattice-work that but a few weeks before kept the too warm sunlight out from our room. Just by the window, my face pressed close to the pane on which the drops were trickling, I looked down the long walk which led from the front door to the street, just as I had been looking for more than an hour. I did not see Cyril Hamilton. The wet brown leaves spun the ground, the dull, dark sky, but the dreariness of all out-of-doors in my heart unawares, and made it more wretched.

For he had gone—he left me. He whom I loved better than life, better than my own soul, but my own selfish pride, Let left me forever. I had loved him for months. He had been to me by night and day and night. I had watched with eager happiness every sign and token of his growing love, and yet I had never, never, look, or hint, or betrayed the secret of my own.

It was my nature to be reserved—to shut up my heart from every one—to hide my thoughts and feelings; and, however stormily they might rage below, to wear always a calm and unmoved face. Even when a little child I used, when heart-full of some sudden joy or some baby-grief, to steal to a grave, quiet air from those who were watching me, till out of their sight, when I would throw myself on the ground, and laugh or sob out the feelings I would not have others know of. And when older it was always so, until now I was the nearest friend dreamed of my being otherwise than the cold and quiet girl I seemed.

So when I had given my whole heart to him, loving him with all the depth of woman's love, I shut up his secret away from every one, and was outwardly indifferent to him.

That he loved me I knew. That he watched me closely to see if by slightest sign I gave him encouragement to woo me, I knew too. But that sign I never gave. "I will never show that I love him," I said to myself, "till he asks me to be his wife."

So I closed my heart, and was always cold and calm when with him. As the days went by I seemed to grow colder and more distant, and my love for Paul grew greater. I shrank from all his attentions, and smiled haughtily away from every look and word of love.

I saw that I was grieving him, yet I was firm, and drew my pride closely about me. At last even his loving, hoping heart could see no light or hope. So he came to me to-day on autumn day to tell me that he was going away to seek a home and fortune. He told me, scanning my face eagerly to see if even then I might not show some sign of love, some sorrow at his departure. But I listened coldly.

"I shall be very sorry, Mr. Weston," I said, "to have you leave us. You have been such a pleasant addition to the society of which I will belong."

He answered as quietly, "I shall be sorry, for many reasons, to leave, Miss Marion."

Then there was a pause, when I tried to fill by saying, "I hope you will not forget your friends here, Mr. Weston, or our pleasant summer rambles, picnics, and parties—our literary society for the last season." I said this laughingly, but it replied gravely, sadly.

"I shall not forget, Marion."

He had never called me so before; he did not mean to have me repeated, half unwarily.

"I shall not forget," then started hurriedly to his feet.

"Must you go so soon?" I asked. "Can you spare me but this little call before you go so far away?"

"I had best go now," he said; "it will do no good to stay. If I lingered to say all that my heart wishes to speak it might possibly destroy our friendship, and would certainly give us no nearer, dearer tie in its place."

He said this hastily, as though he could not help it; said it half to himself. Then he held out his hand, took mine, looked one instant with his cold, earnest eyes into my face, said, in a low voice, a "Good-by!" which seemed an utter despair, a benediction, and a lament, and was gone.

I stole up stairs to my room, sat there with my face pressed close against the cold glass, looking down at the path he had just walked through, and trying to realize that he had gone forever.

Weeks passed away, and though I still wrapped myself in my pride, I grew pale and thin, my eyes lost their light, my lip its smile, and the color crept away from my cheek.

My parents were alarmed; and, not guessing the cause of my trouble, thought I was lonely, and needed young society. So they sent for Arthur Weston to come and spend the winter with me. She came. Kathie was my cousin; she was Paul Weston's cousin also; but we had never met before.

She was very unlike me; quick, impulsive, noble, warm-hearted, with no reserve. You could love down into her heart through her clear, brown eyes when it was your own to diversify. I loved Kathie; and as she never wearied me by asking for more of my love, and granting me all mine, I rather enjoyed having her with me. I talked with her no more freely than with my former friends, but I thought more freely of them. When others were around me I never allowed myself to think of Paul Weston, or to look for any hearth's grief. It seemed that my very thoughts, as they rose in my heart, would betray me.

But with Kathie here it was different.

Many a time have I sat with my head leaning in my hands, and looked at her, in her dark blue dress, that parting with Paul, while Kathie sat silently by my side.

I feel a jealousy. What young girl is there, however reserved and unsocial, who has not some friend in whom to confide, if it is not a sister, or a kitten, or a piece of blank paper?

Yes, I kept a journal, and the thoughts which I have been hoarding and dreaming were mine were written down in that little book. And while I told it all my grief—and my little cares, too—Kathie, Kathie sat by, looked at me with her great brown eyes, and never asked to see what I wrote. She knew I did this that I was wasting away. The blue veins showed more plainly every day on my temples and hair, while beneath my eyes were dark shadows, and my voice faint and low. I scarcely ate or slept, and seemed to care for nothing—nothing but my journal and my thoughts.

It was one cold day that winter we were sitting, Kathie and I, in our little room, before the bright wood-fire. I was sitting, with hands clasped in my lap, looking into the fire; and Kathie was reading, she, I journal, in which I had been writing till, from very heartsickness, I laid it down, was on the floor by my side. Suddenly I heard a sound and looked toward me. I did not look up. She stooped and took from the floor my journal, and held it to me, saying, "Going back to her choir, still holding the book, she sat down and said, "Marion dear, I looked in—"

"This is your journal—the one friend who shares with your sweetness—and I have read every word your health and life, what has taken the color from your cheek, the smile and brightness from your face. Is there any thing I can do? Shall I be the place of us—your father, your mother, and me—as your friend? I have taken your place, I will shall know all this book knows. I will not let you shut yourself away from us. You shall not suffer alone. All I have is yours, and nothing you do help you but the pain. You are too proud and calm to think that I have any right to speak, but I shall take advantage of that phase of your character, and read this record."

She opened the book. I did not move or speak. She was right in coin thing—I was too proud to know that I cared for what she did. I sat looking at her. She began, and read slowly on. I kept pace with her. I knew just when she was reading of my happiest and what of my saddest hours. She smiled—ah! yes, that was at my merry account of a ride with Paul. There she had her brows contracted pain, then drawing a sigh of relief, read on—that was when I fell from the bridges and Paul rescued me. Then her head fell forward and hands clasped each other nervously, her breath came short and quick—that was the end of my love—the ending now! How does she understand it so well? Did she ever love? There, she is sympathizing with me, for I hear a sob, and see her unclasped glance at me over the book; then she reads quicker. Oh yes. She loves him, blush, or start again, but reads quietly to the end.

Then she shut up the journal, came and laid it down in my lap—stood on the hearth and laying her head down on the book, burst into tears. A storm of grief shook her slight frame, and she wept passionately, her whole form quivering and throbbing as she knelt there.

I did not try to soothe her. I did not caress or speak to her, but looked moodily into the fire. Presently she became quiet, and rose, and throwing back her dark hair, wet with tears, she said:

"Now, Cousin Marion, bear me. I have read to-day journal. I know all your secret—that you have suffered much, but he has suffered more. It is not beginning to be known over her, that he loves you? Is not his love a treasure rich enough to fill a whole life with sunshine? But for him, poor beggared love! there is no light. He is working on alone, with no hope of your love, no smile to cheer him, no voice to speak to him to be his companion always. You are cruel, cruel, Cousin Marion, to sacrifice his happiness, his life to your pride. Think of him, and repent of the pain you have suffered too. You have grieved, you have wounded, you have killed him with your pride. Marion, why did you send him away, my"—she hesitated a—"my Cousin Paul?"

"Marion, I have done one deed you perhaps will never forgive. I have read your journal. I will do another deed, and then perhaps you will hate me." She stepped to me and took the journal again.

"I will send this to Paul Weston! There, you start. I have roused you a little. I shall hurt your pride still more. And I can see it is. Here" her voice softened down into a low, pleading tone. "He must see this, Marion. He must know that you love him. He must not die, even to save your pride."

With the book clasped to her bosom she turned and walked slowly from the room. As soon as I was alone I sprang to my feet, and paced the room in an agony of shame and rage. My pride, my pride! To have this read that record, know how I worshiped him! I would sooner die! And Kathie—she had read it—Kathie! And a bitter hatred sprang up in my heart at the thought of her. But I grew calmer after hours of raging, and went down stairs with a steadfast face, and found Kathie sobbing on the sofa. Kathie and I met as usual, and not one word was said of that morning scene.

But all that night, as I lay awake restless and excited, I heard Kathie's heavy step on the stairs when she thought me asleep, she put her arms around me and drew me close to her.

Several days passed. I grew restless and nervous, wondering constantly if she had sent the journal. And every day Kathie took the same walk all by herself. I could see her from my window. Down by the old elm, then across to the road, then down the street to the Post-office. Every day for more than a week, and yet I heard nothing.

But one day as I sat in the autumn twilight, dreaming, Kathie came in. I did not look up till I felt her hand on my shoulder, then, raising my eyes, I saw her. She was standing before me, her brown eyes full of a solemn, painful light, her face and lips colorless.

"Kathie!" I cried, and sudden awe and terror.

She knelt down by me, took my trembling hands in her own, bent her cold brow on them for a moment, then raised my cold, Marion, she said, and away now. Let me comfort you. Let me pray God for you."

I knew it all then. I felt it in the very touch of her hand, saw it in her pitying eyes.

"He will not come," I said.

"Marion, Marion, he can not, can not come. He is—"

"Dead!" I whispered, in a hoarse whisper.

She bowed her face.

Then I sank, panting, from her arms. When I opened my eyes I was lying on my bed, while Kathie bent over me weeping. She did not speak to me as I looked up at her. She knew that silence in that way; but she knelt down by my bedside and prayed for me. I heard her voice across voice pleading—heard her ask just what I most needed, strength, and peace, and resignation, and that God be by very near me, and very gently with me, and then she added, what my tired heart was longing for, that he would let Paul know that I had loved him. With that last petition all my pride left me, and as Kathie rose I drew her down beside me. "Then suddenly pushing her away I cried out in bitter anguish, 'Dead! how could he die without hearing of my love? Oh, how I have killed him!' and growing wild with grief, I said that I was his murderer, and shrieked aloud in the bitterness of my grief. For many days I was a raging fever burning in my veins. All the time I raved wildly of his death, and that always I was his murderer. Then came days of consciousness, when I lay, knowing all around me, remembering every thing, and yet so utterly weak in mind and body that I could not feel grief or joy. And in those dreamy days I recollected Kathie always near me, caring tenderly for all my wants, though I had not strength to thank her. I had afterward a dreamy recollection of many days, when, even when she thought me asleep, murmur as she bent over me, 'If you only knew, my poor Marion!—if you only knew!' But it was a very dreamy memory.

My strength gradually came back to me, but not my pride. Kathie was all gone, and I lay humbled and subdued, while Kathie was all my strength.

But, oh! the misery! it was the end of every coming on, to watch the bursting buds of the maple at my window, to see the tender grass springing up, to hear the birds singing their glad songs, when he was gone forever.

One year and a day passed the coming spring together; he so full of life and happiness, of tender love for me, I so cold and proud. How I hated the hateful pride now! Then, but he was gone. I longed for one hour with the dead one—only one hour, in which to tell him that I loved him again and without stint or saving.

It was a mild day in April. I was sitting up, Kathie had drawn my chair to the window and left me alone. And there I sat, drinking in the soft, warm air, and thinking, perhaps I was better, the grass on his grave.

The door opened; Kathie came in. She came to me, and, stooping, kissed my chair, bent over me and said, "Darling."

There was a full-expressed happiness in her voice which gave me a pang of selfish sorrow that this lovely day should have so gladdened her heart when I had given mine such pain.

"Darling," she said again, "I have something, dear, that will please you, I know, very much."

I shrunk from the pain her words gave me. It was cruel, I thought, to hurt me so uselessly, but I looked up wearily.

"Marion, be strong, my child, and I will tell you who has written you a letter which will bless you."

I caught her hand, my quivering lips tried to speak, my eyes imploringly sought hers, and then I fell back in a faint, from which I came to me!

I was in his arms, clasped to his dear heart, which beat with strong throbbing pulses, the heart I had thought stilled forever. And Kathie stole away, leaving us to wonder together over our new happiness.

And then he told me his story; how he had been very ill, far away, and once they thought him dying and had written to some one who knew him, and that one had written to his friends that he was dead, and the truth never came until he came himself to say that he yet lived. And when Kathie's letter reached him he was in the far west and water-stained and wholly illegible, and yet he knew my handwriting, and knew there must be some strange reason for sending him those leaves, and he came back to me, and all was well.

Kathie went away.

"If you do not need me now," she said, firmly resisting my entreaties that she would stay until my happiness should be complete. I shall never fit, get the strangely sweet and holy look her face wore, as she laid Paul and me good-by. It was like the expression I have seen on the pictured faces of martyrs dying for the truth—calm, sad, but so triumphant, I haunted me for years, and I never knew what it was till the day of that countenance until, long afterward, our old maid cousin Kathie died, and in her own last written command they sent to Paul and me her journal, and then I knew it all. Oh, faithful, darling Kathie! faithful even unto the end!

MORTE.—PASSING AWAY.

BY C. H. WEBB.

THE death-bell is swelling, ask not whose knell tolling,
But hear it, and ponder well;
The sad rhythmic roll tells some Christian soul
Is passing away.

What casts matters not, the soul has forgot
Its tenement since;
All little joys vanish in realms of the air
If pauper or prince.

The Parsicite pray, as Christ taught the way,
But count it no sin
And vex not with slow—crimped craps is not woe—
A way with the world!

Tread softly and slow, speak gently and low,
'Tis a touch that yet most
Our sculptor entrusts with Juno's fairest roses
Entwine yo the bier.

As need of rain weeping, the scarlet is sleeping,
And happy the bird
Have done with mingling—joy, but pray for the living,
The dead need it not.

Alike with the sod the mantle of God
In tatters o'er the steeper
In the portals of Morn an angel now born
Now weeps for the weeper.

Soft swings the death-bell! ask not whose the knell,
But kneel ye and pray!
For the departing a soul now Christian soul
Is passing away.

IN MORTE VITA.

Mourn ye for the dead, the living need from thy side,
She stands by the Groom?
Then the eye cold dead has gone to be wed—
The altar the tomb.

The sword-winged Night is usher of Light,
And herald of Morn;
From darkness and fear, a pall and a tear,
The Dayspring is born.

The diamond once hid by earth's cuffined lid
Is freed from its clay,
Transfigured to-day in King's diadem—
It "passed" not "away."

Then wails the decree that sets the gem free,
In prison-bed riven?
Is death not a boon? say not "Last of Earth,"
But write First of Heaven.

Oh! strangely mistaken, a truth hids us waken,
As error to flee
Bewildered by breath, we call the change Death
Which angels name Life.

I MAKE A PRE-EMPTION.

I HAD read, re-read, in fact committed to memory, the contents of the few elementary treatises and odd volumes of reports composing my law-library. My coat and pants were polished by the constant friction of chair and table. I was weary of conducting imaginary cases.

No wonder, then, that I at once acceded to the proposition of my friend Nimrod, who burst in upon me one morning at Delhi, in early May, with the exclamation:

"What's the use of feeling away your time here? I've just heard of a vacant quarter of splendid timber, up in Minnesota, near magnificent prairie. Down's your pocket-book, and I'll go. Come up with me and make a claim, and I'll give you half."

I consigned the knotty points I had been considering for several days to the whistle wind of Crain and Hilliard to the father of lies and lawyers, shook hands with my friend in testimony of the contract being signed, sealed, and delivered, and proceeded to purchase the necessary outfit. Blankets, flour, bacon, sugar, salt, a bottle of whisky (rattlesnake medicine), two axes, and a few other indispensables were collected, were packed in the smallest possible compass. Armed each with an Arkansas "tooth-pick" and a pair of revolvers, we mounted our horses (I had voiced the previously expressed determination of Nimrod to make the trip afoot, planning with customary physical exertion very unprofessional), and are sunrise of the following morning sallied forth.

Away we rode over the broad prairie, an insignificant spot in the most magnificent landscape Thanks Heaven ever smiled upon, Nature's smile. The ever-changing roll of the prairie, now gently undulating, now bluff and precipitous, studded with clumps of timber; the immeasurable hues of the grass, ranging from pale yellow to deep emerald, variegated with the brilliant colors of a thousand wild flowers, harmonizing and blending with the fleecier blue of the atmosphere, the shimmering intense blue of the sky—such it was one of those grand master-pieces the Divine Artist has scattered with unsparing prodigality over the American continent. The exulting sense of freedom, the buoyancy of spirits, the reckless disregard of the world and all therein, experienced while galloping over the prairie at such times, almost makes one resolve never again to fetter himself with the spirit-crushing, soul-deadening ties of civilized life.

We designed stopping for the night at the cabin of a settler friend of Nimrod. Sunset and its accompanying shadows found us at an appointed cabin, with every indication of an approaching thunder-storm. Minutes were precious. The con-tinous mutterings of the thunder and the subdued whimpering of the wind warned us to flee to a shelter. But where was that desideratum to be found? A dense mass of black clouds came rolling up from the northwest with tremendous velocity. Nimrod, turning to me, exclaimed,

"The curtain will rise in a moment! We shall have the witch scene in Macbeth—blasted heath, thunder, lightning, rain, and—Here it comes!"

Reader, station yourself on the bumper of an express locomotive running sixty miles an hour, and you have the force of the wind. Stand under the Falls of Niagara, and you may plausibly appreciate the force of a torrent upon us. Blinded and half-suffocated, we had but one course to pursue—turn tail to the storm, pull our blankets over our heads, and, in the classic phrase of my friend Nimrod, "let her slide!" We remained thus a sufficient length of time to become thoroughly soaked. Packed, close, sheet, and then a mingling of all three. The sharp, rattling peals of thunder, followed by deep, long reverberations, rolling around, across, up, down, and in every conceivable direction, shook and quaked the ground earth like an earthquake. It seemed as though the Gods and Titans had released hostilities, and that some Phlegethon grudge was settling in a "little mean grape" at every discharge. Poets and romancers may wax eloquent over the grandeur and sublimity of a thunderstorm; five minutes in my position, at this particular time, would have sufficed to wash the poetry out of the coarsest coat of linen. I may have indulged, at intervals, in short naps; for, ere I was conscious of it, the storm was over, the Monad Nimrod had made into its appearance, and, to my great joy, I discovered Nimrod, with the horses, galloping over the prairie and yelling like a madman. Our explanations were mutually satisfactory. The dangerous was trifling, and, as Nimrod said, "a real adventure," we "pushed ahead."

Night again found us on the prairie. Not a cabin in sight. We concluded to camp out. The grass was our couch, a blanket our covering. It was first awake in the morning, and while searching after materials wherewith to kindle a fire, discovered, to my horror, a large yellow rattlesnake, coiled and asleep, within a few inches of the unconscious Nimrod. Here was a fix. The slightest movement on my part, and the reptile would be undoubtedly his last of earth. Prairie life teaches one to think quickly and accurately, to act promptly, to do the right thing at the right moment. There was one chance of saving my friend. I stepped cautiously to his side, noiselessly drew my gun, and with a powerful jerk threw him at least ten feet from his unbreaking. There was a loud hissing—a rattle—and the reptile was harmless. Nimrod commenced swearing at me—caught sight of the dead monster, and then fairly shook with joy. He was a narrow escape—a decidedly tight squeeze, as Nimrod afterward remarked. We were treated to a blunderbuss of the medicine and sprang into our saddles, not caring to remain in such an unpleasant neighborhood.

We soon reached the timber, and without difficulty found our quarter. It was situated on a creek, we immediately commenced the erection of our cabin. Said cabin was finished about sundown—two of us knowing order of architecture necessarily large enough to allow Nimrod and myself to sit in it at the same time—had neither door nor window—was not chinked—was not obliged to step out of doors to look at the stars, and had no fear of denying the floor. Our furniture consisted of two saddles, two blankets, a frying pan, coffee-pot, and two tin cups. It was all that was necessary; however, for a month's residence, and would answer the requirements of the pre-emption act. Unused to manual labor, a couple of days' work by every we fancied, and Nimrod brushed our into his pocket.

Next morning we made preparations for clearing the requisite land and building a mile of rail fence. In answer to a query of mine, Nimrod said:

"Now don't be green! The law requires a house. There is a! Ha! Ha! Half an acre of clearing and building!"

"How are we to do the breaking?"

"I'll manage that. My two axes and stout arms can break this turf, and a rod of fence will go as far as an alkali-ax a mile."

"But how are we to get around the speculating?"

We must swear that we are bona fide settlers—that we have no intention to sell this land on speculation?"

"Never you mind; I'm making this claim, and I intend to do the swearing."

We worked steadily on our claim during the week. No planting were ever endured more toil and privation. One evening, after we had been reclining upon the roof of our cabin we were enjoying a smoke, a strange, savage-looking being approached, and with a "How are ye, strangers?" made himself very much at home. The appearance of the gentleman was not prepossessing: long matted hair and beard of the color of rusted iron, a rim of felt on his head (once a hat), ragged, dirty —very dirty—shirt and overalls, and a pair—no a quarter of a pair—of what once had been boots. The expression of his countenance was— Well, a thought of the hangman, and involuntarily grasped my revolver.

"Makin' a claim, are ye, boys?"

"Yes."

"Mighty nice piece of timber, this 'ere. Worth twenty-five dollars an acre of it's worth a cent."

"Yes, Sir!" quoth Nimrod.

"I'm pre-empitin' the quarter jinin' ye. I've got a half jist above, and a quarter t'other side there."

"You must have done some tall swearing, stranger."

"They can't fool me on provin' up! I know a feller down near the line got ten forties all at once. He managed it slick, too. All ye got to do is to swear right straight through, and I'd like to see any body trouble ye! If he did, he'd hev to have mighty sudden. This climate wouldn't agree with 'im! But that ain't what I'm come to tell ye. There's trouble brewin', an' I thought I'd give ye the warnin'. There's many fellers down here goin' to jump your claim. They're powerful wrathy, and if ye don't look out, will run ye slick as grease."

"You tell them fellers," said Nimrod, "to jump ahead whenever they're ready. I've made this claim, and I'll hold it."

"Well," replied the stranger, "I've did my duty; I've given ye fair warnin'. You kin go or stay; it's nothin' to me."

And we were relieved of the stranger's presence.

"That old scoundrel is at the bottom of this," said Nimrod. "We must prepare for trouble."

We carefully fastened the horses near the door of the cabin, and looked at the priming of our revolvers ere we turned in for the night.

The following morning we were absent from the cabin cutting rail timber. On our return we discovered that the "jumpers" were carrying out operations. They had stolen every bit of our provisions, and all our cooking utensils.

We could see the very owner, adding thereto several moods and tenses not laid down in the books, had thrown the last bag of flour on our provisions. I did not know the way, and declined I would not remain alone in the cabin. So we went together, and found Nimrod correct. The cabin was a mass of smouldering embers. As if to prevent any further depredations on our belongings, we were greeted, as we came to a halt in front of the smoking ruins, with laughter and jeers by a crowd of Kentuckians.

"It's no use, strangers," yelled one; "you've had two fires already. The next one will be a rope or a chunk of lead. Will you leave now?"

See you d——d first" shouted Nimrod, drawing his revolver as he spoke.

Crack went a pistol, the ball whistling disgracefully near my ear. Nimrod, dismounting and cut horses into the shadow of the trees, as it was evident the scoundrels intended to murder us.

"Now comes the tug of war," said Nimrod. "We will have to give it up; they are too many for us."

"Is there no law to protect us?"

"Lynch law—nothing else—and we'll get a taste of it in a few days, if we don't leave. Come, let's be there they come! Pick your man, and then ride for your life!"

As the foremost ones rushed into the light of the burning cabin we fired. Two dropped. Amidst yells, curses, and shouts of vengeance, we were off. It was a wild, breakneck race through the timber. Nimrod's horse stumbled and fell, and I never drew rein until we halted at the door of the squatter's cabin.

I shall make no more pre-emptions, that's certain. My brief experience in the matter constrains me to indulge a portion of the sweeping ire of this great republic, acting in the belief that corporations and governments have no souls, pay very little attention to their sins, and are especially in need of the services of a missionary. And, furthermore, I believe that I am not exaggerating when through ignorance or knavery, often suffer the government to be outrageously cheated and swindled.

ENTRY OF GENERAL GEFFRARD INTO PORT-AU-PRINCE.

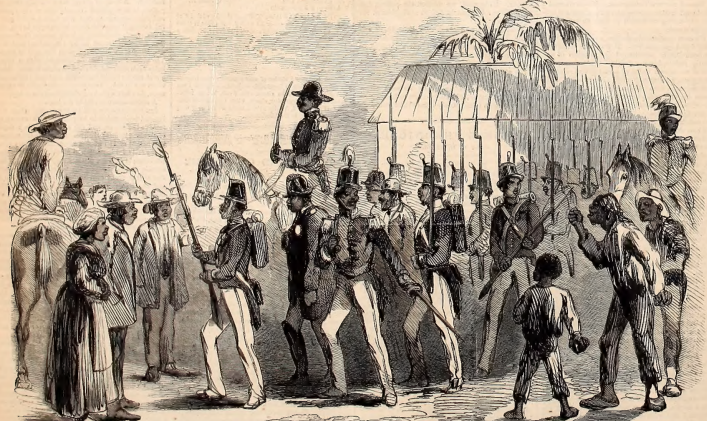
THE REVOLUTION IN HAYTI.

We engrave herewith two of the principal scenes in the late Haytian drama which has ended in the expulsion of the negro emperor Faustin Soulouque, and the establishment at Port-au-Prince of a negro republic, with General Geffrard as President. We gave the facts in our last number.

Faustin Soulouque, a negro, whose first step in life had been an appointment as valet to a negro officer, was, it will be remembered, elected President of the Haytien Republic in that year of revolutions, 1846. For half a century previous the island had known no peace. Wars—incessant, bloody, exhaustive, merciless wars—had desolated Hayti from the day when the French proclaimed the emancipation of the blacks. A long series of negro rulers, sometimes called Presidents and sometimes Emperors, had wielded an authority which, for the time it lasted, was generally absolute, and often tyrannical and ferocious. Each in his turn had been subverted and put out of the way by some bolder or more aspirant to power. In the course of these never-ending contests the island had been dismembered; the eastern end—Dominica—which is more Spanish than French, had separated from the western end (Hayti), and had organized a separate government under a republican form. Both ends were shockingly misgoverned; the people were disorderly, agriculture was neglected, the laws derided, property and life continually menaced.

It was under these circumstances that Faustin Soulouque, a soldier of fortune, was elected President of Hayti.

It appears that, notwithstanding the crimes of Soulouque's later administration, his earlier policy was creditable to him and beneficial to his country. He proceeded with considerable vigor and skill to restore order to the finances, and to enforce the laws. He put down several revolutionary movements with a strong hand. He forbore to carry out the traditional policy of his party, and made peace with Dominica. A few months of this wise course, however, exhausted his stock of virtue. In 1850 he followed the example of his predecessors and overturned the Constitution, proclaiming himself Emperor; and a couple of years afterward he had himself solemnly crowned by the Roman Catholic Primate of the island. The ceremonial was most faithfully copied from that which was observed on the occasion of the coronation of the elder Napoleon; not a functionary was wanting, though, of course, with the exception of a few visitors, all the personages were negroes. The farce concluded with the appointment of a large array of noblesse, dukes, barons, marquises, etc., among whom the Marquis de la Marmalade and the Duke de Limonade have achieved general notoriety.



ESCORT OF THE EX-EMPEROR FAUSTIN SOULOUQUE TO THE BRITISH VESSEL "MELBOURNE."

In 1855 Hayti once more declared war against Dominica, and Soulouque led 20,000 into the field. What the real cause of the inglorious issue of the campaign was, we have yet to learn; certain it is that, before a blow was struck, Soulouque and his army ran away. The Emperor himself was lost for a time, and when he turned up, at his capital, dirty, sad, and much excited in mind, his officers were actually engaged in casting about for a successor. It seems likely that the event hardened Soulouque's naturally tough heart. He became unusually suspicious, tyrannical, blood-thirsty. The stories of his later reign bear a strong resemblance to the historical accounts of the late Cæsars. Rebellion after rebellion broke out; but still was the energy of the Emperor, and such the power he wielded through the agency of a secret idolatrous society, which was believed by the negroes to have endowed him with supernatural authority, that until last month he was always victorious in these civil commotions. His punishments on these occasions were unsparing. Death was the invariable penalty of treason; banishment of suspected loyalty. Mulatto women with negroes who have been exiled from Hayti, or who fled to escape the cruelty of the Emperor Faustin.

At length, on 22d December, General Geffrard, a colored man, just a person, it is said, of liberal sentiments and considerable intelligence, proclaimed at Gonaives the restoration of the Republic. Corresponding movements were made in the south, and a large army was quickly collected, which marched on the capital. Soulouque vainly endeavored to rally his forces. It was evident that they were prepared to desert at the first opportunity, and despair he fled to Port-au-Prince. General Geffrard followed. Soulouque hastened to abdicate, and the Republic was proclaimed.

Our first illustration represents General Geffrard's entry into Port-au-Prince early in the morning of 15th January. The second gives a view of Soulouque's departure from his palace, prior to his embarkation on board the British ship of war Melbourne. He is surrounded by Geffrard's guards, who experience some difficulty in saving him from the hands of the populace.

The overthrow of the barbarous empire of Hayti can not but be viewed as a happy sign. No island of the West Indies, without excepting Cuba, presents such opportunities of prosperity as St. Domingo. In the hands of industrious and prudent holders it would soon be as rich as Cuba itself. Let us hope that now there is a prospect of better days for it, and that the republicans who have overthrown Soulouque will redeem their race and their nation from the disgrace which almost perpetual bloodshed and disorder have brought on them. Many persons deny that negroes are capable of maintaining an organized free government; Soulouque's regime confirmed this belief. We shall now see whether Geffrard and his friends will controvert or corroborate it.

PRINCE NAPOLEON'S BRIDE.

We give herewith a reliable portrait of the Princess of Savoy, who has just married Prince Napoleon. The portrait is from a photograph taken a few weeks ago.

The lady's name is Clotilde Maria Teresa of Savoy. She was born on 24 March, 1843, and is consequently just sixteen, and a very pretty girl. Of course, so young a person, however distinguished by birth, can have but little history as yet. It is said that she is very much tempered and amiable, though extremely bigoted in her religious views. It is also said that her aversion to her future husband was such that her father had to beat her with a stick to make her consent; but this we may be permitted to doubt, in common deference to humanity. One writer says of her:

"Imagine a girl with golden-brown hair, and a skin of pearly whiteness, just dawning into womanhood; a form already full and round, a figure of commanding aspect. Then the expression of the Princess's face is tenderly intellectual."

Another, the correspondent of the London Times, saw her at the opera with her future husband, on the occasion of the state visit of the King and the nuptial party to the theatre at Turin. He writes:

"I can not indorse the statement of the Opinione that the Princess was brilliant with beauty. She is not beautiful, but she has what is perhaps better than beauty, a very sweet and amiable expression, which, I am assured, is but the faithful mirror of her charming character. She is rather petite and girlish-looking, with brown hair, and a beautifully white skin. Her bearing was graceful and free from any sort of embarrassment, although her position last night, at the house of the palace, must have been a little trying to a young lady not yet sixteen. I saw many eyes turned upon her with an expression of almost mournful interest. She is looked upon by every body here as the victim of political considerations. Doubtless the gentle little Piedmontese Princess will be made much of in Paris, and I am sure she will bear home the general wish of all her father's subjects that, whatever the political results of the alliance, they may not prove to have been purchased by the sacrifice of her happiness."

The correspondent of the Herald says that, at the state banquet previous to the marriage little Clotilde was in great spirits, and conversed very lovingly with her affianced.

The marriage took place on 30th January. The newly married couple left the same evening for Genoa. On the 31st a ball was to be given them at that place, and on the following day they were to leave for France.

The following Paris story about the corbeille of the Princess will be read with interest by our lady friends:

"Paris is astir in anticipation of the corbeille, the design of which is already established; the sides are supported by Cupids in the Louis Quinze style, holding small mirrors in their hands, upon which are to be painted the portraits of the divers members of the Emperor's family of France. The shawl and dress of point d'Alençon, manufactured for the Great Exposition of 1855, and bought by the Prince, are to be deposited within, as well as the diamonds once belonging to the Princess Catherine of Wurtemberg, which, during the imperial régime of the first Napoleon, were considered the finest in point of brilliancy, and what the French jewellers denominate 'series,' being wholly of one size, shape, and water. These diamonds, which were stolen in 1815, remained for a long time lost to the family. After the departure of the Bonaparte family from Paris at that time, in consequence of the publicity given to the theft of the diamonds in the hurried arrangement of packing, an anonymous letter was received by the custodian of the Garde Meuble of the Crown, in which the writer declared his reasons for believing the diamonds to have been thrown over the Pont Royal by one of the servants belonging to the household of the Princess, who had secreted them in the confidence of pain, but who had failed in his endeavor to hide them among his own luggage. In consequence of this communication, the river was dragged in every sense, new inventions for accomplishing the work being largely paid for by Louis Dix-huit, who would have dearly loved to have recovered his diamonds, which had been collected from almost every princely house in Europe, and where Mme Sans Gêne would, were she alive, attend on the soirée as having formed the clasp to the aigrette which adorned the cap worn by Queen Christina, of Sweden; but, after the most persevering efforts, the task was abandoned as hopeless, and it began to be imagined that the letter had been written with the view of hoaxing the authorities, and of arresting pursuit until the thieves had got clear out of the country. Such must have been the case, in a great measure, for many of the jewels were bought back by the family at Venice, and some at Genoa, at long intervals of time; and it was only when dredging the river for the construction of the works on the Seine, a few years ago, that the ornaments were at the bed of the bed was in reality fished up, among other things which had been stolen from Mme Sans Gêne at the same time. This last discovery completed the set, which is now entire, save the waist-buckle, still missing, but which Prince Napoleon has never given up as wholly lost, and which Prince Jerome declares to have been one time offered to him for sale, once at Moscow and once at Florence, but which he had declined to purchase."

MISS CICELY'S PORTRAIT.

I DO believe, said Mr. Dipchurch, the steward of the Grange, while doing the honors of the pigtuns—pigtuns here never came down upon God's earth a sweeter angel than that little child with her arms about the dog's neck. She was the joy of the house; and if you were ever so low-hearted, the sight of her bright face, as she danced round the lawn or tripped down the passage, was as good a cure at a sorrowing man could desire—better, a deal, than can be found at the bottom of a tankard. I declare there was music in her merry laugh, fine music as was ever played; and a little speech of hers made heavy work come very light. Every one was glad to have her at his knee, to hear her pretty talk and prattle; and she had such coaxing ways, there was no refusing her any thing. She would come to me with, "Dear, good Mr. Dipchurch" (I was under-steward then, and had charge of the bread-room), "dear, good Mr. Dipchurch, I want a very very big loaf for the poor woman at the gate." And though squire would not have been overpleased, as he said it encouraged rogues and trampers (which I believe it did), yet I could not resist her little ways; and she would go off with her large loaf in her arms down the avenue. She had such delight in doing of good works, that she might have been a little Sister of Charity; and I believe most of the pocket-money the squire took delight in giving her she gave away to the poor people about, always getting some one to take her out. It was a pretty sight to see her going on these walks, in her straw hat and blue cloak, her little basket on her arm, and the dog following on behind. Fincher was the name of the dog—a sheep-faced, blinking, yellow-haired, good-for-nothing creature, who was good for nothing but lying in the sun all day, and eating at all times. No one cared particularly for him; and Fincher had been sent away long since (shaming the house as he did), but that he was Miss Cicely's friend. One day he came panting up the avenue with his tongue hanging out and his fore-paw broken by a stone, flying from some cruel boys of the village who had been hunting him. At the door he fell over on his side, and lay there quite patient and exhausted. It was Miss Cicely who, chancing to come out upon the lawn, took him up in her arms, cried over him, and tied up the broken paw with her own little hands. The squire was for having him shot at once, to put the poor brute out of pain; but Miss Cicely begged so hard that they would only try—just try and save his life, that he was brought in and taken all care of, and soon after was going about quite sleek and fat. From that time on he was Miss Cicely's own dog, going with her everywhere; and very often I have seen her as you see her in that picture, sitting on the terrace, dressing her yellow neck with flowers, making frills for his sheep's face, he blinking his round eyes lazily, and letting her do much as she pleased with him. For she was a pleasant child.

Some way I could never take much to her cousin Lady Alice, and I believe already about the place ever did. I fancy that same ladyship to her mamma went a good deal toward turning her head; for she had been—one Donna Maria, as she told us. Which was like to be true enough, as her father was a proud man, and was said to have married a prouder lady over in Spain. He was all this time away at the wars, fighting the French, and for four or five years his daughter was left at the Grange, and brought up with Miss Cicely. It used to make us laugh sometimes to see her little airs, and the way she would walk up and down in her black lace, a red rose fixed in the side of her hair, with a fan, in the broad daylight, as she told me the Spanish dames always did. This was droll enough; but there were other times about her that came, so to speak, from some Spanish island, which we servants were not long in finding out. If we were long in standing to her when she called, or if we were crossed in getting what she wanted, she would toss back her head, and beat her little hand on it, and stamp her foot—looking so wicked all the time. The squire used to laugh at these fits, I believe, encouraged them unknown to himself, giving her her way in every thing: but the old people would shake their heads, and say that such a temper would never bring her to good. Miss Cicely, curious enough, loved her very much in spite of things, and giving in to all her perverse ways, which the Lady Alice took easily enough, as if she were a princess, and all things were only her right. But what I fancied least in her was the fondness she had for a limping dog—wondering how any one could take up with such a low-born cur. Often, very often, I have seen her exactly as in that picture before you, standing, behind and looking down with a sort of contempt on Miss Cicely and her dog Fincher. It is a mystery to me up to this day how she ever came by the odd notions she had. I suppose she took them from her mother's country, where I've heard that they are women full-grown at sixteen years old. Once, indeed, when Miss Cicely was taken very bad with some sickness (a sickness that came only once more in her little life, and took the sweet child away along with it); once, I say, when she was lying ill, and every body going about with think faces and a dead weight on their breasts, I think Lady Alice took it to heart. I saw her at the end of the long gallery, when she thought no one could see her, crying bitterly.

I think she would have died sooner than let any one see her cry, and I recollect she had picked up some story out of the old history books about a boy who had a sister, or some other little child, and he ran into his flesh rather than cry out—which, she said, was a fine thing, a noble thing, of the boy. And I think then, I think, and what you might expect from unchristian people. But the way the poor dumb brute she knew took on was enough to shame Christian men with souls. To see him—for he had taken for a time to another creature, with no thought but for his meals—moping, and searching, and turning up his long face to every passing whining footstep of a dog, and refusing his food, would have touched a heart of stone, and made you heartily repent having so misjudged the poor animal.

There was much jubilee, you may be sure, when Miss Cicely got over that attack. Poor thing, she had nearly gone distracted, and in his trouble, I do believe, would be to build a church, if she got well. Whether this was so or not, a church was begun immediately, and there it stands on the southern hill of the estate, some three miles away. It might be a year after that, coming on to November—but kept for November, the month in which Eve was only a few days off—that young Mr. Richard came down to the Grange for the shooting. A fine, high-spoken, cheery fellow, full of life and spirits, with an off-hand manner which took with every body that came near him. He was full of dash and spirit, and was bound for the great French wars then being fought. So he came down and shot and ranged over the fields, and every keeper and follower about the place, and squire himself, thought they never and never had a finer lad. As I said, he was so ready and off-hand with the men, and indoors, as you may well suppose, the two little girls thought there was nobody far or near to match with Cousin Richard—only each liked him in a way of her own.

It was pleasant when the long evenings came on, and the lamps lighted, and the fire blazed, and the shutters were all sitting in this room—the squire weary with his day's hunting, and young Richard having displayed to great effect his day's shooting, where he was fond of visiting—it was pleasant to see how he would draw up his chair and fall to work amusing himself with the two little things. He would have them one on each side of him, and very often Miss Cicely, his pet, upon his knee; and there she would laugh and chatter, and ask questions on the morning. He would promise to make one laugh to see Alice's aire, and the way she tried him with her dignity and stately looks; all to let him know what a great lady she was. Then she would dress herself up in all manner of queer ways, and come in and walk up and down with her hand back, trying to attract Cousin Richard's attention, of which he would purposely take no heed, but would laugh with the squire and wave his hand, telling her that he loved simplicity, and to be always quiet and natural. Then on the other, having flaunted to no purpose, would be ready to sit down in a corner and cry. Not that she would think of doing such a thing, but she could not give him that satisfaction, but would sit and sulk the whole evening. Then he would coax her with a kind of mock respect, calling her the grand Spanish lady, the Donna, the dark-haired Donna who had a right to queen it with the ac-count of her high blood. "Poor little Cicely," he would say, "you have no blue blood in your veins."

Blue blood! that was his word, on which she would stamp her foot and fire up, saying she had a great deal to spare for her uncouth, rude, boisterous, big sword, and would protect her and kill any one that insulted one of his family. And then terrible threat Mr. Richard would nearly drop from off his chair with laughter, and the squire would lift up his face from his newspaper to look on; and then she would step away out of the room, looking round as if very wrathful indeed. Then Miss Cicely, with tears in her eyes and putting up her hands, would beg and pray of Cousin Richard not to be so very cruel to Cousin Cicely; and it would all end in Mr. Richard's going out and bringing her back with much affected gallantry, her outside the long corridor like a seared deer. She would tell us that she hated him!

Pretty much the same scene used to go forward every night, but the fact was, that for all her pettishness and love of hating him, she was very fond of Mr. Richard. Whenever he would pretend to be angered at one of her sweet speeches, and not speak to her for a time, I could see she got troubled, and tried all manner of little tricks to bring him round again without bringing down her pride. Once, when she had marched herself out of the room into the corridor, Miss Cicely came running out after her (I was just then coming up stairs, and so I heard it all), and putting her arms round her, said:—

"Come back, darling, do. Cousin Richard didn't mean to be unkind. He only meant to tease you. He told me so the other day. I'll run and tell him, and make him promise not to do it any more."

Well, I declare, I saw her put on the sweet child from her, firing up as if she had been a woman of twenty.

"Don't speak to me in that way," she said. "I don't want your help, you poor child. I can do without it." Here came a little scornful laugh. "I dare say Cousin Richard loves me, though he doesn't set me on his knee and pet me like a baby."

With that she flounced away, leaving poor Miss Cicely standing there, with her head hanging down, and looking after her quite scared.

Would you think it? The proud little lady was jealous. It was queer, the notion of such a thing in one so young; but so it actually was, as I afterward came to find out.

Poor Miss Cicely was sadly distressed at finding her so cold, and could not make out what was at the bottom of it; however, they were soon friends again. Meantime, Mr. Richard staid on over a month, until his time grew very near, riding over every day to Arbor Court for reasons of his own. One day came down to us, as usual, Miss Cicely, to ask for her beef. "And," said she, as soon as she came in, "dear, good Mr. Dipchurch, when I have my own large, big house, I shall have plenty of beef to feed you with, and you shall come to it, and have a great room to yourself."

"I thank you, Miss Cicely," said; "but I fancy we shall have to wait a few years before we get into the big house."

"Not so very, very long, Mr. Dipchurch," she said, patting back her yellow curls, with one of her regular looks, "not very long—"

"Pretty well, I think," I said. "Say ten years, at the least."

"Listen, good Mr. Dipchurch. I have such a great little secret; oh! such a wonderful secret," she said, opening her little eyes. "Can't you even tell any one?"

"Trust me, Miss Cicely, for that."

"Well," she said, "dear Cousin Richard—you know Cousin Richard?"

"Yes, I know him, Miss Cicely."

"Well, dear Cousin Richard says, as soon as he comes home from the wars, that I am to be his little wife, and we are to live together in a big house.

"You don't say so!" I said, pretending to open my eyes with astonishment.

"Yes, I do," she was up and popping her hands and giving one of her merry laughs; "he has told me so over and over again."

"Also, Miss Cicely," said, "he doesn't meet with some beautiful lady in foreign parts—a handsome princess, who might fall in love with him, and who was taken prisoner, and marry him for good and all."

She turned very grave and thoughtful on this.

"Do you think so really, Mr. Dipchurch?"

"Nothing more likely, Miss Cicely; these military gentlemen do it every day."

She began counting on her fingers, and looking on the ground, and I think it was nearly an hour.

"I must speak to Cousin Richard," she said, taking up the bow of her skirt, and plaiting it as she were going to sew.

"I think that would be the best way," I said, looking over. "In fact, it would be very desirable to put it out of altogether until he came back."

"Do you think so?" said she again, still plaiting.

"Well," I said, "it's purely a matter of convenience, but I think it would be better." At once, your cousin, Lady Alice, I fancy he has promised her too."

"Oh no!" said Miss Cicely; "Cousin Richard would not do that."

"Nothing more likely, Miss Cicely," I said.

She seemed wonderfully confounded at this news, and didn't know what to say, only kept plaiting her hands to her little head, she called out suddenly:

"Oh! dear Mr. Dipchurch! such a strange pain in my head! such an odd feel!"

I was frightened, for what she said, for you don't hear of children of her age complaining of such things, and it was in that way what she had died. Although, At that moment, Miss Cicely threw up cousin, looking stately, as usual. Miss Cicely turns out and rops her, putting her arms about her.

"Darling cousin," she says, "good Mr. Dipchurch tells me that you have promised Cousin Richard to make you his little wife when you grow up and have an open house."

"And if he has?" says the Donna, looking very wickedly at her; "hasn't he the right?"

"Oh, darling," Miss Cicely says gently, "I thought I was to be his little wife."

"I know it," says Miss Cicely, hanging down her head; "but I thought when I grew to be tall you would not mind changing."

The Spanish Donna laughed scornfully.

"Did Cousin Richard promise you?"

"I thought he did."

"Good!" says Lady Alice, getting into one of her fits of pride and temper, decided pride, "I dare dare to speak to me again."

She flounced away in a fury, and all the rest of that day Miss Cicely was very silent and dejected, keeping much to herself, and talking a deal to her doll. Then, when the evening came on, and the frosty one, with the sun shining out, she came running to me before breakfast to tell me something.

"Oh, Mr. Dipchurch!" she cried, "I have made up my mind I shall be like little sister Alice. I thought it over in bed last night, and I have made up my mind."

"I tell me all about it, then, Miss Cicely," I said; but, first, how is that little pain?"

"Oh! a long time last night," she says, "but it is better this morning. I will give up Cousin Richard to Cousin Alice, and she shall be his little wife, and they will be very happy together."

Don't you think so, good Mr. Dipchurch?"

I also said that I did, and that I thought it was me earnestly and sadly that I could have taken her up in my arms and cried before her.

"Yes," she said, beginning again to plait the corner of her frock. "I think it will be all for the best. When Cousin Richard comes in for breakfast, I will go to him and tell him all, and that Cousin Alice is much more worthy of him."

That little pair of hers troubled me very much, and I determined to let squire know of it at once. Presently they all came in to breakfast. Squire, and Lady Alice looking haughtier than ever—all except Mr. Richard, who was out riding. Squire looked knowingly and laughed as he said he was gone over to Arbor Court—perhaps might come home to breakfast, perhaps might not—squire rather thought he would not, and looked knowingly at me.

He did not come back then, but just as they had finished, Miss Cicely, who was at the window, called out that here was the postman on his pony, coming down the long avenue, and Cousin Richard riding beside him. Not long after I saw him in the oak corridor, with a great open letter in his hand, and a very sad look upon it.

"I must go to the wars at last, Dipchurch," he says, trying to be cheerful.

"Well, Mr. Richard," nothing like honor and glory; but I hope they have given you a long day?"

"Only ten days, Dipchurch," he says with a sigh, and went on muttering about a bubble to the gentleman's nature.

Then it all came out; Mr. Richard was engaged to be married to one of the young ladies at the Arbor Court, and now it was settled that they should hurry on the marriage before he went.

There were great doings and rejoicings at The Grange that day. Every one about the place having the story that Mr. Richard was going for a soldier, but was first to be married to Miss Alice, I thought the Spanish Donna, when she heard it, would have died. She was in a terrible rage and excitement; but she only tossed back her head and her little curls, and said not a word.

But for that sweet child, Miss Cicely, my heart bled and bled again. She was so grieved, and I believe took so much to heart the loss of her cousin's mortification. But she loved Mr. Richard so, and thought so when he went off for the little noise she had first taken into her head, but because he was so free-hearted with her, and so kind to her, and so full of fun, that I believe in those times. She would sit on the grass as before, looking by her self, when I heard her sing, and passing softly behind her, "You, poor Pincher, you are the only one left that I love, after pops, the only one—the only one." And then would say over and over again, while the creature would look at her fondly, with his heavy, blubber lips and whine, as if he understood what she said.

Soon she began to complain of a certain weariness and feeling almost tired, and that first pain turned out (as I thought it was) the warning of the old and more serious build again. Then it-on-the-heath-they called it.

As I said before, I don't like thinking over those days. It gives me a cold weight on my heart, and such a choking feeling in my throat. I may as well say at once that, before the Christmas, poor little angel was taken gently up to heaven, where, added Mr. Dipchurch, huskily, it is my firm conviction she is and even that she would without end! From which happy country, it is on my firm belief, those sweet eyes look down on

"And Pincher, the dog?"

He went about for some days in a restless sort of fashion, though, I think, for his little mistress in all manner of places. I once met him coming down in his own parish, and he, though a place he never was known to be found in before: and squire met him there, too—burst out crying over him—crying as if his heart would break.

I had to go away, up to London, a little after on business, and when I came back found they had told me that Pincher had been found one morning under a rose-tree, which Miss Cicely herself had planted. Lying there, almost in the very spot where sheep's-face resting on a bed of moss which grew about the rest of the tree.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, Feb. 19, 1859.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been more active for the past week than for some weeks before, and there has been good from regular buyers and from speculators. The Cotton Market has been active, but the high rates declared for desirable lots have checked operations. A moderate business has been done in Breadstuffs, but the tone has been freely offered, and has favored buyers. The Provision Market has been active, and prices for fair business have been maintained in Beef, Pork, Naval Stores, Hides, Sole Leather, and Wool at our quotations. . . . Cotton has attracted much more attention, and closes more firmly than . . . Provisions have been freely dealt in, at however, irregular prices. Beef, Pork, Lard, Naval Stores, Hides, Seals, Tish, and Candles have been quiet.

The Fine Arts Exhibitions have likewise exhibited increased activity and firmness for Beeves, Milch Cows, Veal Calves, Sheep and Swine, at our quotations. . . .

The Country Produce Markets have been well supplied during the week. The demand has been fair. Quotations figs have declined. Other commodities have not varied much.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HOARSENESS, &c. Brown's Bronchial Troches are unequaled for relieving coughs, Colds, Asthma, and all affections of the throat, Lungs, Stomach, and Liver. Public Speakers and Singers will find the Troches useful in clearing the voice when hoarse, and relieving the throat after an unusual exertion. Obtain only "Brown's Bronchial Troches." Sold by all Druggists.

NO DANGER FROM THROAT AFFECTIONS when Dr. Brandreth's Pills are used. A specific that diseases can originate in any organ or solid part of the body, it keeps up the blood by purifying it well. Local diseases are generally produced by deposits from the blood, and a remedy that keeps that stream pure is the best for individuals.

Forces are efforts of nature to overcome these corrupt humors, and Dr. Brandreth's Pills make them so.

Superfluous and corrupt humors, either floating in the circulation, or deposited in different parts of the body, are then the immediate cause of disease.

Every one who is troubled with Brandreth's pills all corrupt matter, and you purify the whole mass. There are at this moment in every part of the civilized world individuals whose maladies have been completely removed by their use.

Every one who is troubled with pain to use this instructive medicine, without any obligations to those who previously have used them. And those who have become experimentally acquainted with its value feel that their time and energies could not be better employed than in the elucidation of its sanitary, its health-producing properties.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.—The fifty-two numbers of this admirable and entertaining publication, completing the last year, have been gathered into a single volume, and we have but to say that it contains the same variety of the variety, the spirit, and the value of the contents. There is no more popular history of the current events of the year—there are ample dissertations on the leading topics of discussion—there are stories and poems of merit, however, but preferably of the kind which are suited to the columns of a newspaper—there are the pictures of the times, and of the men who make the times, and, above all, there are those striking wood-cut representations of American scenery, of public buildings and habitats, and of customs and countries—all contained in the numbers which make up the volume. It is a grand picture-book of the human life of the nineteenth century, in all its phases, and is nearly all nations. Every class of readers, moreover, may be interested by it—old and young, male and female, and any man of business, the child and the woman.

F.Y.S.

We learn from our special correspondent, Mr. Daniel McCarty, who left the city of New York in September last for the purpose of exploring the gold regions of Pike's Peak, and who has recently returned to Kansas, Nebraska, K. T., that these mines are capable of yielding the precious metal in such abundance as to satisfy the most extravagant wishes of gold-seekers. Throughout Kansas and Missouri, and the surrounding territories, the merchants, farmers, and mechanics are forming private companies, and making active preparations for a start to the mines early in the Spring. Mr. McCarty also informs us, that although many of the enterprising adventurers have ventured themselves during the short season they have worked in the mines, they have suffered the most severe penalties of physical information. Exposure to malarious diseases, in the form of Fever and Ague, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Flux, Cholera, and Cholera Morbus, Bilioumus, Coughs and Colds, Cramps, Influenza, Impediment in Breathing, Sore-throat, Sudden Losses, Lung or Complaints, Contraction, Indigestion, and other ailments, which are the result of the sudden changes from temperate to tropical, upon the system, have made fright-ful wrecks among those who had not the precaution or forethought to carry with them RADWAY'S READY RELIEF AND REGULATING PILLS. Those who were provided with these remedies, did not a single day from sickness of either of the above-named complaints. Mr. McCarty applied the Ready Relief and Pills to a number of the sick, and had the gratification of restoring, through the aid of these remedies, all who used them to health and renewed strength. Let all who purpose trying the mines, provide themselves with a supply of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF AND REGULATING PILLS. At the mines the Ready Relief is now selling for $5 per bottle, and the Pills at $1 per box.

In all cases of Sores, Humors, Ulcers, Nodes, Bronchitis, or Scrofula, RADWAY'S RENOVATING RESOLVENT should be used. Price of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF, 75c., 50c., and $1 per bottle. Price of PILLS, 50c. per box. Sold by Druggists every where, and RADWAY & CO.,

LYON'S MAGNETIC POWDERS
Will destroy Garden Insects, Cockroaches, Bedbugs, Fleas, Ants, Moths, and all pests of the Vermin kind.

The importance of a reliable article of this kind is indisputable. In warm weather all nature teems with this annoying race. This powder is the only article ever discovered which will exterminate them. A company of botanists, from the Horticultural Society of Paris, with amidst the forests of Asia, observed that all insects lighting upon a certain kind of plant very soon dropped dead. From that vein made use of to guard their rapid ravages from those intruders. Quantities of the plant were brought to Paris, and the powder made from it found to be destructive in every instance. It is therefore confidently hoped, chemically prepared to resist the effect of the atmosphere. Medals and Letters Patent have been obtained from the governments of England, France, Germany, and Russia, from the World's Fair, and numerous medical and horticultural colleges and societies.

COMMODORE VANDERBILT.

The accompanying portrait will be recognized as that of the most distinguished steamboat owner in the United States—Cornelius Vanderbilt, popularly known as the "Commodore." No man connected with our merchant navy has done so much for the advancement of steam enterprise or the expedition of travel as Commodore Vanderbilt.

Like most of our leading men, his beginnings were small. He was born in the year 1795, on Staten Island. His father owned a farm, and a small ferry-boat which plied between the island and the city. When the wind was fair, the boat sailed; when it was unfavorable, the boatmen relied on the oar. One, and the most useful of these boatmen, was his son Cornelius.

The father wisely obliged his son to work for him in the ferry-boat for a certain number of hours each day. The rest of his time was his own. This spare time he used so thriftily, that by the time he was eighteen he owned a boat of his own. For some five years it may almost be said that he lived in this boat; carrying pleasure parties to pienics; boarding ships; and performing all the work of a boatman. There are many still living who remember "Cornell the boatman" how skillful he was in managing his craft; how daring in encountering the roughest weather; how perfectly reliable in every respect. No matter how it blew, or stormed, or froze, if Cornell had agreed to board a ship or to deliver dispatches, he did it. Many and many a time anxious ship-owners could not have communicated with their ships in heavy wintry storms but for Vanderbilt's courage and skill; we may depend upon it that if he knew the pecuniary worth of those rare gifts, never was money more cheerfully paid than the reward he obtained on such occasions.

The knowledge Commodore Vanderbilt acquired during his life as a boatman he never forgot. Not many years have elapsed since, in the yacht Cor, he won the great club race of the year solely by his thorough knowledge of the intricate currents and tides of the Bay, and of his remembrance of the manner in which the various headlands affect each prevailing wind. On another occasion he probably saved his own life by his skill with the oar. He had, we believe, been attending a railway meeting somewhere in Jersey; and instead of taking the ferry to return to New York, he, in company with his brother and one or two other gentlemen, took a small boat a short distance above Hoboken and bade the boatmen pull them over. Night was falling as they started. It was in the month of January, and the North River was full of ice. The boatmen pulled for some time steadily ahead; but in a short while they got into an island of slush (broken ice and snow), through which their utmost strength was insufficient to force the boat. Presently a large cake of ice came floating along, and gave the boat a rude shove. It was now becoming very dark, and the cold was intense. In a short while it was evident they would be frozen in. The Commodore had from the first sat quiet in the stern sheets; and his companions, who looked to him as their leader, had followed the example. At length he sprang up.

"Boys," said he, cheerily, "this won't do. Give me an oar! Now you two," he added, addressing his brother and one of his friends, "take those oars and row." Noticing some signs of rebellion on the part of the boatmen, he quietly said, in a tone which there was no mistaking, "You keep out of my way, or you'll maybe come to grief."

Standing, then, with one foot on each gunwale of the boat, he steered with his oar, guiding the little craft through each leak of water between the ice cakes—now heading north, now south, now toward Staten Island, and now toward Albany, but steadily contriving to approach the New York side. It was midnight, and the moon was up when the boat reached a dock on Manhattan Island. One of the parties who shared the Commodore's society on that evening has been heard to declare that he grew ten years older in the five or six hours they spent in the boat.

To return to Vanderbilt's early life. As a boatman, at the age of 22 or 23, he was making an income of $3000 a year. But he saw that the age of oars and sails had ended, and that steam was henceforth to be the great agent of navigation. To study and understand steam became thenceforth his object; and to achieve it, he became the superintendent of Mr. Gibbons's line of steamboats plying between New York and Philadelphia.

He was ten years in this employ, during which time the line was very profitable to the owners. At length Vanderbilt, feeling that he was master of the whole subject of steam navigation, and finding his family increasing rapidly, announced to Mr. Gibbons his intention of establishing himself on an independent footing, and requested him to engage a new superintendent. His employer met the observation with an offer of an increased salary, which was rejected. No further notice of the subject was taken for some months. At length Vanderbilt inquired whether Gibbons had found a substitute for him. He was then told that he might draw three times the salary he was receiving, but that he must remain in his present position. He again declined, and reiterated his determination to leave. Gibbons finally asked him what the steamboats and other property connected with the Philadelphia line—belonging to him (Gibbons)—were worth; Vanderbilt, who knew their value much better than their owner, estimated them at $100,000. Gibbons offered them to him at this figure, leaving it to him to specify the conditions of payment. Still Vanderbilt would not be convinced, and would not buy. The end of the transaction, we believe, was that the Stevenses, who already owned one end of the route, bought out Gibbons in the other end, and that Vanderbilt forthwith established an opposition. This was the first of Vanderbilt's many fights.

At the outset, as he was a young man without apparent capital or resources, it was confidently prophesied by his opponents that he would presently fail. Every week was expected to be his last. Still, week after week elapsed, and he did not fail; nay more, he ran his boats more regularly and more swiftly than the opposition line, and he carried off the lion's share of the traffic. After a season of fierce rivalry, his opponents, weary of losing money, sent for him to negotiate a compromise. They began the negotiation by observations necessarily tending to an inquiry as to how much Vanderbilt would take to abandon the field to them. He stopped them, before they made an offer, by calmly offering them $80,000 to abandon the route to him. This terminated the negotiation, and another year of intense rivalry ensued. At the end of the second season Mr. Vanderbilt was again met by his opponents with proposals for a compromise. It must be premised that during the year he had discovered a more fruitful field for his enterprise: for when the Messrs. Stevens and their associates now appealed to him, he met them with a hour list of ex-employés of theirs, who, in consequence of the rivalry and their attempts to economize, had been thrown out of employment.

"Gentlemen," said he, "pay to each of these men what they would have earned had it not been for the opposition, and I will withdraw my line."

His adversaries were only too glad to compromise on such favorable terms. They paid every one the sum mentioned by Vanderbilt, and he, as he had promised, withdrew his line.

After the close of Mr. Vanderbilt's connection with the Philadelphia line of steamers, he ran a line to Elizabethport; and soon afterward began a series of conflicts with the established lines on the Hudson, the Sound, the Delaware, etc. etc. It has been much the fashion to regard these contests as attempts on his part to levy black-mail on successful enterprises. It is hardly fair for any man to undertake to decide what are the particular motives of his neighbor in undertaking a specific work, if the work be in itself legitimate and fair. He must be judged by the results; and the results, in every case, of the establishment of opposition lines by Vanderbilt has been the permanent reduction of fares. Wherever he "laid on" an opposition line, the fares were instantly reduced; and however the contest terminated, whether he bought out his opponents, as he often en did, or they bought him out, the fares were never again raised to the old standard. This great boon—cheap travel—this community owes mainly to Cornelius Vanderbilt.

Twenty years ago most of the steamers plying between New York and neighboring ports were owned by powerful corporations, who enjoyed a monopoly of the traffic, and where wealth and obsequious soullessness were a terror to steamboat men. Of all the enterprising men of that day Cornelius Vanderbilt was the only one who had the courage to assail these monopolies. He did assail them, and with success and unbridled vigorous war. The monopolies were sometimes ruined, but the public traveled at half the old rates. One may be sure of the latter issue, but, after all, the latter is entitled to some sympathy too.

The Commodore once, in conjunction with his brother, Captain Jacob Vanderbilt, ran a boat on the Hudson in opposition to an established line. His brother commanded her. One unlucky day the boiler burst and killed upon the instant, or in consequence, several the feelings of the people to frenzy. They threatened to lynch the Captain. They exhausted themselves in menace and invective. Captain Vanderbilt was compelled to seek refuge in the city, and the monopoly re-established the old tariff of fares.

All that Captain Vanderbilt had in the world had been invested in this boat, and the explosion ruined him. He had neither the means, nor, indeed, the heart of the popular fury, the ability, to renew the contest. Not so his brother.

In the midst of the storm of indignation, when the very name of Vanderbilt aroused execration, pale and loud all along the North River, the Commodore quietly announced that he would run a boat in the place of the one destroyed by the explosion. The exasperated river towns and villages swore that he should not. They would not ride on a boat to make sad to their pays. They would not be fat fright to brought to him or their families. When he ran to a wharf he could get no hand to take the rope to throw ashore to make fast. As he backed, it is recalled that not a soul came out daily receipts did not exceed $6 12½. When a tall fiery youngster did take passage in a boat he kept himself from the public gaze, as though he had been doing a guilty thing.

Meanwhile Vanderbilt had said that he would run his boat, and run her he did. Threats, alone, opposition, unawareness of all kinds did not disturb him. The same hour, day after day, the execrated boat made her appearance at the usual landings, and steamed pleasantly on to the next wharves at which, for many days previously, she had been urged with rage to keep away from the moorings. The Commodore knew mankind. He knew that the storm aroused against his family was too violent to last. Nor did it. A day came when some river people quarrelled with the monopoly, and one of spite took passage in Vanderbilt's boat. Others, sympathizing with the man's fortitude and perseverance, declared that they would see fair play; let him land at the wharf. Then the proprietors of the monopoly quarreled among themselves, and began to rebuke and sneer, each about a house divided against itself. So things went on, the Commodore's boat running swiftly and regularly, the other boat lagging, and meeting with accidents, till the old familiar end came. Every body patronized Vanderbilt, and the monopoly went to pieces.

The crowning feats of Vanderbilt's career have, however, been connected with the Central American Isthmus.

For a year or two past the reopening of the Nicaragua Transit Route has engrossed much public attention. This great thoroughfare between the Atlantic and Pacific States has now been closed nearly three years; and although, from time to time, negotiations have been entered into with the Nicaraguan Government, and grants have been obtained, or supposed to be obtained, which should have led to a speedy reopening, all these have proved abortive or delusive, and it still remains matter of doubt, to the great loss of not only to the great profit of a private monopoly. By the last steamer reports were brought to this country of the Costa-Rican treaty, which by many is looked upon as a positive guaranty that the Transit Route will soon be thrown open. It remains to be seen whether this will done through the White party, or the Wells Fargo party, or the Cornelius Vanderbilt. Meanwhile, it should be borne in mind that the veteran Commodore was the only man who possessed money enough, and pluck enough to open this new route before.

A brief sketch of his connection with this great enterprise will show how thoroughly he has been identified with it from first to last; and, as a chapter in the Transit history, will not be considered void be interest.

The grant for a Ship Canal Company was made by Nicaragua, in 1843, to C. Vanderbilt and his associates. The grantees were subsequently incorporated under the name of the Accessory Transit and Pacific Ship Canal Company. This grant was for the exclusive right to construct a ship canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific by the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua, which at that time, by reason of the imperfect surveys made, was supposed to be practicable. It further gave the exclusive right to transport passengers and merchandise between the two oceans by means of steamboats over said waters, and by rail or carriage road, or other means of conveyance, over the best part of the route. To protect the ship canal project to English capitalists and secure their co-operation, Mr. Vanderbilt made a trip to England in 1850. The brother capitalists of London agreed to engage in the construction of the canal if, after new and fuller surveys, it should be pronounced practicable. These surveys were made, and by them it was ascertained that there was not a sufficient depth of water in the lake, the previous surveys on this point having proved inaccurate. For this reason the ship canal project was laid aside, and the grant remained unused until 1851. In that year the Government of Nicaragua, on application of the Canal Company, separated the Transit grant from the Canal grant, and conferred the Transit privileges upon the Accessory Transit Company, which at the same time was incorporated for that purpose.

The Transit Company was forthwith organized, and Mr. Vanderbilt was chosen President. In the winter of 1850–51 he had built the steamship Prometheus. Prior to this, and soon after his return from England, he went in person to Washington, passed up the San Juan in an open boat, and spent several weeks in taking the soundings, in measuring the depth of water on the rapids, and satisfying himself of the practicability of the route for steamboats up the San Juan and across the lake. The whole of this time he slept in an open boat, and for two days did not take off his clothes. His constitution, naturally a tough old sea-captain, declared he would not go through such work again for all Central America. The Prometheus was put on the route. Resigns the Pacific port for the new line, but the Commodore determined to find a steamer which could be constructed the harbor of San Juan del Sur, at that time unknown and unnamed, and which could run on the waters of communication could be at that time obtained even in Nicaragua. Having decided upon that as the best harbor, he selected the mouth of the Colorado road from the harbor to the lake. He had then mapped out and fixed upon the location of every station to be, and having acted upon his favorite maxim, to, "Settle every doubt before you start," he returned to put his plans in successful operation. He immediately sent out the like, boat Director, and the river boats Pioneer, Independence, and North America were sent round to the Pacific, to run in the lake and San Juan del Sur. The Pioneer was launched on July, 1851, the Prometheus made her first trip to San Juan del Sur, Sailing-vessels from the lake to the Pacific, the boats the Daniel Webster, to run in the Atlantic line with the Prometheus, and went out in time to meet her first trip. The Pioneer was put on the new lake boat Central America. This boat was towed from New York to San Juan—the first vessel towed, drawing, and steamer, quite characteristic of the "Commodore." He, in person, took the United America up the lake, and, with his family, and safely into the lake; and, having successfully opened the route, returned to New York. Under the management the route became a favorite one with California travelers; and from time to time, the Webster, he, in 1853, was put on the line with the Northern Light and Star of the West on the Atlantic side, and the Pacific and Sierra Nevada and Golden Gate on the Pacific; and the semi-monthly line, via Nicaragua, was placed on a firm foundation. The Commodore encountered no small, for the first of almost incredible difficulties. In the hands of most men it might have proved a fatal obstacle to the visionary scheme; in his hands it became a noble and successful enterprise. The price of passage for the steamers was at first extremely low. In 1852 San Francisco was permanently reduced from $600 to $300. He did all this, too, without Government aid, but in direct opposition to a Government-aid monopoly. The line continued in successful operation until 1853, when Vanderbilt withdrew the Commodore sold his steamers on both sides to the Transit Company. The steamers were put on agent until his celebrated yacht-trip to Europe in the North Star, in May, 1853. In June, 1853, Charles Morgan and associates bought out the Commodore's connection with the Company terminated. He had no further connection with it until February, 1856, when he was chosen President.

In 1855 William Walker landed in Nicaragua. By his connivance the charter of the Transit Company was revoked in 1856 [1857], and a new grant made to one Randolph. Of the stupidity of this act there could be no question. It may be to Jacob Vanderbilt's credit to embrace the Company's property in Nicaragua, and seize upon the steamships as they were plying between New York and San Francisco. If so, he was woefully disappointed. The prompt action of Mr. Vanderbilt saved the steamers from the hands of pirates, and travel of them from the line cut off Walker's supplies and reinforcements. The Transit property was driven out of Nicaragua, and a native government restored. Since then, owing to the unsettled state of affairs, and the hostile attitudes of the host, no satisfactory grant or recognition of the Transit rights has been obtained from Nicaragua, and the transit remains closed.

In the spring of 1856, within sixty days after the transit was seized by Walker, Mr. Vanderbilt went to Washington during Mr. Pierce's administration, and there pledged himself to the President of the United States and the Government that he would reopen and establish the Transit line on sixty days' notice, provided the Government would protect the property employed thereon; and the Government was made by the President's message so on the incoming of his administration. Up to this moment he has been ready and anxious to do the same thing; but he has declined to engage in hazarding his own property and the lives and property of his passengers, so long as the Government of Nicaragua refuses to give him protection.

During all this period he has, from month to month, been in hopes of being able to open the transit, and the arrangements of the Ocean Steam Mail Company was predicated on the belief that under no circumstances could it last more than a month or two; but causes for delay have arisen, and continued to operate to continue this uncertain state of things.

Pending this, a new line to California via Panama is announced, which is understood to be under his powerful patronage. His steamships include the Vanderbilt, Ocean Queen, Northern Light, North Star, Ariel, Daniel Webster, and a new iron steamer now being built, on the Atlantic; and the Uncle Sam, Oceanic, Sierra Nevada, and Golden Gate, on the Pacific. With this powerful fleet, and his great wealth and life-long experience, he must prove a formidable rival for any opponent. At all events the Commodore in a California steamship will be eminently "the right man in the right place."

In his many victorious fights Mr. Vanderbilt has never had to say he lack. He is not a man living, probably, who more carefully foresees and provides for every possible contingency, leaving nothing to chance. Every enterprise is brooded over for weeks, if need be for months; he sleeps on it again and again, and every doubt is mused and disposed of before he takes the first step, but when that step is taken there is no turning back. He is not a speculator in the sense that he risks his fortune on a single chance. He will not risk his fortune unless he is all confidence, and not a doubt exists to disturb his peace. Hence he is a man who is endowed with the qualities of patience, pluck, and perseverance. Herein is, we think, the secret of his success in life.

Mr. Vanderbilt has met confined himself or his capital to steamboat enterprises alone. His wealth and his counsel he has assisted many of our most important railroad enterprises, and aided in bringing them to a successful issue. Whatever it seems to be his pride, and an honest pride it is, to have made himself what he is—a self-made and profitably employed. We have heard it said that no man in this country gives employment directly and indirectly to so many persons. He does not allow the rust to gather on his money, or colewebs to gather on his brain. He is not afraid of working for live, he now lives to work. We commend his example in this respect to our men of wealth. Indeed he is, in a well-doubtless, identified with many new enterprises.

The likeness of Mr. Vanderbilt is taken from a photograph by Brady. In person he is full six feet, and of fine presence. He is now about sixty-five years old, and his portrait, taken in June or July, 1851, the Prometheus made her first trip to San Juan del Sur. Subsequently to this we have the boat built the Daniel Webster, to run in the Atlantic line with the Prometheus, and went out in time to meet her first trip. HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 1859.

NEW YORK AS A MURDERER.

MRS. CARLOCK has been duly sentenced to and disposed of. The wretch whose treatment of the poor child had occasioned her decease was such that her neighbors were wearied beyond patience by the incessant visits of the tortured creature to their doors. A number of murdered foundlings has found at last an appropriate home in one of the penal institutions of this State. The Tombs is overcrowded.

The Ten Governors still lease out the right of murdering foundlings at the moderate rate of two dollar a week. Their Excellencies therefore still ready to certify under oath that the murdering is done according to the soundest scientific principles. The Governors and the visiting nurses continue to be of the opinion that the murderesses (who do not always, as in the case of Mrs. Carlock, embrace the excitement of receivers of stolen goods with that of professional infanticidesses) are persons, on the whole, of the most humane dispositions and the gentlest tendencies. If these respectable persons—Aldermen, Governors, and visiting nursing nurses—are to be believed, the murdering of foundlings is so beautifully and so admirably systematized that it is a pain and a shame to alter any thing in the process.

For all this, we doubt whether the New York newspapers are to be congratulated on the success in this city should out-herod Herod in slaughtering infants, as they appear to be doing at the present time. Not that we have any sympathy for baby-killing, or even for baby-starving, but because we believe that the murdering of foundlings is so beautifully and so admirably systematized that it is a pain and a shame to alter any thing in the process.

FOREIGN BLUNDERING ABOUT THE UNITED STATES.

THE blunders which foreigners make when they attempt to write about the working of American institutions have been frequently shown up that it seems almost useless to point out another one at this time. But latterly there appears to have been a fresh access of ignorance in the European mind; the British and French journals which of late are fuller than ever of ponderously asinine remarks on everything that is American.

In France it can not be expected that newspaper editors should appreciate American institutions at their proper value. The French man lives in terror of ravine and murder, and he has a gendarme at his elbow. Accustomed to being, without compunction, ridden over. Liberty to him is a vague essence, of which the outward and visible signs are bands of turbulent soldiery and the utter prostration of property on communist principles; and intelligent orators and journals demanding to be used heads as well as hands. Under such a state of safe and comfortable society, according to his notions, implies thousands of gens d'armes, hundreds of corps de garde in the principal streets, and a sound law condemning people who speak or write, or act as they please to a given number of minutes imprisonment. The views and views inculcated at all the schools in France, and implicitly adopted by the vast majority of educated French people. Consequently, if such persons condescend to turn their eyes to the United States; when they find that there is no gens d'armes, no corps de garde, no press censorship, no penalty on speaking or writing or acting beyond what may be necessary for the safety of others, no more than the restrictions of any kind on the ebullitions of the populace fancy or temper; and, above all, government under the law, they are shocked and insult to its face, they come to the conclusion that such a society must be on the eve of destruction, and that a bloody deluge of anarchy may be enthroned any fine morning. With their views they could hardly be expected to judge differently.

It might be supposed that the English could enjoy as much personal freedom as we should judge more intelligently of the working of American institutions. But with the English there appears to be a certain amount of infatuation that seems almost to prevent them from seeing what is plain to be seen, and their institutions are so different to have utterly obfuscated their intellect.

One of their best friends in this way is just stumping the kingdom on behalf of a movement which he is about to introduce for the extension of the suffrage, and which he assures us will be unless he pays so much rent. Mr. Bright desires to reduce the amount necessary to entitle a man to vote. He does not propose to give the suffrage to all men, but he thinks that every man can undertake to controvert the propositions he lays down. No one but an absolute idiot can pretend that the payment of $20 rent ought to confer upon a man political privileges for that the payment of $20 less rent ought to deprive a man of them. Mr. Bright says that the laws by which he is governed, justly or unjustly, we do not find that the English journal Mr. Bright's opinion of the English people. But as he has in his speeches alluded occasionally in terms of commendation to the United States and its political institutions, we will take upon this, and ask in furious tones whether Mr. Bright desires to introduce into England the town-ship system of America, and whether Mr. Bright wishes to see corruption the basis of British society, the admission of our highest magistracy, and the corner-stone of American politics? They would ask our papers for accounts of social life and elections, and would be overwhelmed with recklessly-conducted or blindly partisan journals; they gloat over exaggerated accounts of corrupt elections; and they triumphantly inquire whether these are the substitutes which Mr. Bright offers in lieu of the splendid institutions of the British aristocracy?

THE LOUNGER.

THE LATE NUPTIAL SACRIFICE.

A FEW years ago, as the Lounger was one evening lounging in the French Comedy, where Rachel was playing Thisbe in Victor Hugo's play, he was thrilled, upon raising his eyes to the Presidential box—it was before the Empire—by seeing the very living image of Napoleon Bonaparte.

He stood in the front of the box, his arms behind him; his round, smooth face, with the Byronic moustache laid to the stage; and for a moment the resemblance was as perfect as resemblance could be. Then the figure moved. Behind it stood the old Jerome, Napoleon's brother of Westphalia; and it was clear that the apparition of the Emperor was a son of the Westphalian, son of old Jerome.

It was in the early days of the reigning glory of the Bonapartes. The saturnine and sly Louis had been only a few months President, but was doubtless already plotting in his heart how to subvert the republic—a plotting against which Lamartine had warned the Assembly. But Frasne was a generous and humbrella of Frenchmen, dying in Cayenne.

With the right side of the house the Prince Napoleon—who, as son of old Jerome, the heir-apparent, stood alarmingly near his succession—rose also. He showed in every thing his boyish and public respect. His name has been for the last seven years a perfect talisman of dissoluteness even in Paris. Probably there is not a man in the world who respects him. Certainly there is not a Frenchman.

But his cousin the Emperor, whom ambition is Napoleon), has seen that a princess is a necessity in Italy. That country has been heaving in churning re-enlistment; and the most reasonable expectation is that it will gravitate toward the head of moral and able of its established governments, even if it were monarchical. That government is the Sardinian. The Sardinian king burns to be King of Italy. It is a tradition of the house of Carignan. And the king has no son. But he has a daughter, Clotilde, fifteen years old.

Napoleon has a great ambition upon which Louis Napoleon could digest at leisure; and the political combinations of the Continent he probably understands quite as well as any man living. Therefore last year the King of Sardinia went to France, and was magnificently received. And on the 30th day of January, in the Sardinian capital of Turin, the Prince Napoleon—a fat man of fifty, the grossest roué in Paris, and the husband of Clotilde's mother—was married to the eldest Princess of the royal old house of Savoy, a maiden fifteen years old.

Of course it is only a move in the astute imperial game of Louis Napoleon. The old kings and princes of Europe pause in perplexity. The head of the Leicester Square refugee, as he plays for power, the lives of thousands subject to his decision, as all Italian girls are equally at heart misery, and are equally sacrificed.

What a mockery upon our common humanity that a criminal like Louis Napoleon, who has hesitated at nothing, should seem possible to succeed! The undoubted ability is no more an excuse for his career than uncommon skill excuses forging or stealing—a person who, with consummate ability, robs every one of the crimes he has committed resting upon him, would be almost the most contemptible of men. A respecting man—should he also to go beyond his own country, and drag into his trails a pretty, innocent princess, and, for the sake of power and of his own, noted only for his vices, and who would be kicked out of any door of decent gentlemen, on the were not a prince of the imperial blood!

Because Louis Napoleon has made himself Emperor of France and Napoleon's nephew, no man would confer by any purpose under heaven, we need not suppose his political success will continue. There is no denying the supreme success with which he has managed his game, but there is certainly no respecting him. Success is not the only consideration. I cast that which would be knavish in the poorest foreigner stunning Mayor Lecount—and the man striving to get a dinner, is not less so in the same fellow contriving to get a throne.

If the sons of Napoleon have to submit, it is their own affair. But the wanton sacrifice of a poor little Italian girl ought to move a world's pity.

THE STATUE OF WEBSTER.

A CLUB of respectable gentlemen in Boston, who call themselves, we believe, the Saltus Club, in memory of that late lamented and most excellent political organization, have recently received the certain state of the Hon. Daniel Webster, upon which Powers was commissioned to execute several busts, and several copies of the original model, but the vessel foundered at sea. In the case of the present one Providence was less kind, and it has arrived safely.

The club of respectable gentlemen have drawn an elephant, and they have not the remotest idea what to do with it. First of all, it was unpacked and erected in the vestibule of the Boston Athenæum, and illusion of every body who entered there.

Oh, woeful day! There was no possible point of view from which the work could be praised by the most intrepid member of the club. It is no exterior to be offended as to be offending, and no one believes every spectator from the necessity of even trying to admire it.

There is a tall, gaunt figure, clad in a dress coat buttoned up closely; trousers of the texture and aspect of vest cambric; one hand holding a piece of paper, pointing feebly at the other, which rests upon the top of a large fagget. Poor Allan-a-Dale!

The presence, which was Webster's great personal peculiarity, is entirely wanting. The thing is big, but not large; and no man who remembers the massive impression always produced by the original but will be puzzled and amused to know how an artist could have so utterly lost every trace of it in his work.

The Club have held a meeting to deliberate upon the final disposition of their property. They heard a report, presented by Mr. Everett, in which they deprecate the present situation of the statue, and suggest that, under other circumstances—when there is either more or less light (we forget which, and it doesn't matter)—there will be a better opportunity of viewing and judging the work.

Many thanks, but 'tis hardly worth the trouble. The light, whether more or less, whether from above or below, will ever give to the brazen pile that grave intellectual aspect which struck all beholders as they saw the original. No charitable contemplation will ever put into these features that marvel expression of a mighty mind clouded with sentence of Webster in his decline. The whole moral of his life and character is lost in this unmeaning and lifeless mass.

Permission was obtained from somebody in Washington to have the statue in the vestibule of the United States Court-room. Then the Governor said he would intercede with the Legislature to have it put into the State House grounds; and there it will probably go. If it were only possible literally to put it in the grounds every body would be satisfied.

There is one situation, however, which has not yet been mentioned, and which, for many reasons, would be appropriate. Between the Tremont House and Parker's Hotel, in Tremont Street, there is a little bare Common, a sort of Leicester Square, but without its Duke Humphrey. Let the statue—no bust of Webster, but the statue—be set there, and let the Club build a fine Doric temple over it, and let the Club meet annually, in the Frog Pond, ought to be accepted.

BRIGHTENING.

At this time of day, in a tolerably intelligent nation, living under some kind of constitutional government, whenever an orator demands that the whole people shall have a full and fair representation in the Legislature, he is asking for that people what they are sure to obtain, and which is the scope of Mr. Bright's movement in England.

The argument that England is well enough governed, if ideal as a plea against any political agitation, is simply absurd, because it is nothing but total indifference that can be construed approbation. It is on the part of the governing class, that counteracts the inevitable tendency of all classes possessing unquestioned power to abuse it.

Undoubtedly the whole aristocratic system is philosophically, and will consequently always be, so practically, inconsistent with a popular representation and government. Where the people govern, there is no aristocracy, and it is there in a perfect jurisdiction, of an aristocracy; and wherever the privileges of a class are not openly and organized in a state, its constant political tendency will be to popular government.

That is the normal condition of England, and the difference between Mr. Bright, who is a cheerful leader, intelligent politician, and Disraeli, or Lord Carlisle, who is an amiable, good-hearted Earl, is only this: that the commoner wants to smooth the road that the nation must inevitably travel, and the peer wants to drag the wheels.

Nothing, therefore, can be more ludicrous than that the chief public opponent hitherto of the every middle-class Englishman, except, to the philanthropist, a very powerful, Earl of Carlisle, our Lord Morpeth of other days. Good, pleasant gentleman, with a kindly expression of face, as Exeter Hall, he said at the Lord Mayor of York's dinner that, when the time came, his "order" would make a stand and fight themselves. Dear Sir, the time has long since arrived, the fight has been fought, and the "order" has not made a stand, is not the cry of attack, it is the shout of victory.

For you kind of fight does not begin except expect a simple, practical trial of the necessity of his order? The moment the people of England are convinced that they are not represented in action, that moment the fight is over. It will long exist in form, but the people will be to grow. The battle may smell of the state long after the essence has evaporated. Forms of government grow out of state of the people, and not the people out of the forms.

Thus the aristocracy of France is done. There is a Faubourg Saint Germain, but that is only a French Soulouque, Faustin. There is Napoleon and a Louis Napoleon, and a Duke of Malakoff. But the real aristocracy of France is Duke of Persigny and a Count of Gouselerry-sart in Hayti. Empires founded in the year of grace eighteen hundred and fifty-two don't count. The Napoleonic prestigious performance is only the present aspect of the French revolution, which is the people, with the growth in intelligence and political ability of the French people. The French aristocracy was not necessarily any existence. It was only required to fulfill its functions. Of course it wears its old costume still and is a mockery relation.

The Faubourg Saint Germain is only Mr. Toots in Paris. Tis of no possible consequence to any one.

And when the English aristocracy as an institution, as an "order," is in the same situation, it won't make any "fight for itself," as the good Carlisle intimates, over a glass of Burgundy and a fillert; simply because old clothes can't fight. The whole matter is in this fact, that Guy, Earl of Warwick, made nominal kings because he was strongest of the real kings, and that now Samuel or Lemuel, Earl of Carlisle, declares confidently that because he is strongest in name, he and his friends will make a good fight, if it comes to the point. Guy of Warwick represented the strong power, and was king; now it is John of Manchester who represents the kingly, or controlling, power.

And Punch can't find in his position only a Quaker climbing a greased pole to clutch a flitch of pepper-and-salt bacon! But how Douglas Jerrold, who was the original vital elixir of Punch, would have hailed him, heart and hand! How kindly he would have had to the amiable Earl, "Sit down, your Lordship, sit down; and let us follow the ladies to the drawing-room."

MRS. KEMBLE'S ADIEU.

In the New Monthly Magazine (we think) for some month in 1832 there is an article by Thomas Noon Talfourd describing the first appearance of Miss Fanny Kemble with a theatrical success worthy the traditions of her house. Early in the Spring of that year, Talfourd, in his characteristic recollection of Millman a few years ago is furnished only by the enthusiasm which yet lingers even in the remembrance of her dramatic career. In the wildest moments of our modern delight in every Lind, some grave and genuine senior nodded and replied, "You should have heard Malibran." And at every dramatic excitement of the last twenty years the same reply has been repeated, "But I saw Fanny Kemble!"

During the last few years her readings have given us all, who had never seen her upon the stage, some impression of her great talent and of the peculiar dignity of the female dramatic school. In this city, as elsewhere, the interest in the reading has never flagged, and the popularity of the course may have been. They were unattended by any "puffing" of the Barnum school—no pomp of Beitz. Mrs. Kemble merely announced that the recent series would be the last she should ever give in New York; and on the last evening of the course, on Friday evening, February 18, 1859, with a small, moderate dignity, she read a series of flowers which the hands of unknown friends had strewn upon the platform, the woman who, as a girl, twenty-five years before, had electrified the town with enthusiasm, stood, rich in the ripened admiration and affection of a new and discriminating and wide popularity and power yet undiminished, bade them gently farewell.

Longfellow has already spoken for those who read:

"O precious evening! all too swiftly sped!
Leaving us lonely as unshed tears
Of all the hot thoughts of the greatest ages,
And feeling tongues and hearts that throb in vain.
How our hearts glowed and trembled as she read,
Interpreting to us these wondrous words
Of the great poet who forevens the ages,
Anticipating all that shall be said
O happy reader! barring for they text
The much that shall be written, leaves havo caught
The rarest essence of all human thought!
O happy poet! whose every word
How most thy listening spirit new rejoice
To be interpreted by such a voice!"

THE LAST WORK OF MR. HAYS.

MR. HAYS, whose new formed engraver, has just done a service to all men who live by any department of creative art, in obtaining an injunction against a pirating publisher. The publisher copies and sold false duplicates of "The Retriever," a picture of the artist's. It is one of his most popular and most profitable forgery, and one to which painters are peculiarly exposed. Their debt to their engravers is at all the greater.

But how origin Photography? Every picture is now at the mercy of the rest, and the engraver's operation or sermon is at that of Stenography. The constant tendency of the age is to the multiplication and popularization of every thing by art. Cheap literature will be followed close by cheap art, and the lender will circulate the portraits of historic lands with the statues and the pictures faithfully reproduced in its stereoscope.

A prowler of sermons is the only rule within the walls of his own church. He may contemplate an exchange of pulpits for a day with his friend, but with two hundred miles off, and he will repeat this admirable discourse. Vain hope! it printed itself as he spoke, and the reverend gentleman is further off to the faith two hundred miles away has read the sermon aloud in his family to Wednesday evening.

A poor lecturer takes the train to repeat, in a neighboring city, the lecture he delivered last evening. Yes, but the newspaper forestalls his train, and his neighbor in the car sits reading a verbatim report of the lecture he will hear delivered to which he is going to deliver to that neighbor this evening.

However, there is something that can not be smuggled and defies reporting. It is the color of the painter is his own secret, and the oratory of the speaker can not be strengthened. So the artist and the orator need not fear the progress of the arts and the advanced civilization. The printer can't get at it together. The photograph that shows the outline only kindles desire to see the color, as the printed report the speech beget the wish to hear it spoken.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—A SUBSCRIBER is informed that all communications for the "Library," or for any department of Harper's Magazine or Weekly, are to be addressed simply to Harper & Brothers, New York. In reply to the numerous questions, she is informed that the Musical World is probably the one she means.

—GEORGE SANFORD'S poetry is not to be found, nor does the Lounger recall its receipt. It is the Lounger's habit to take some notice of every communication.

—Who will help Du F. F. II., of Homer, New York, to discover the line—

"Oh, Coniston'er! thou art a jewel."

—J. H., Natchez, wants to know the address of the President of the Panama Railroad, and asks the Lounger! Did he ever hear of the man who inquired for royal Royal Engineer of the Prince of Wales?

A NEW RACE OF MONKEYS—THE GORILLAS.

We give herewith four engravings of a new race of monkeys, termed Gorillas, which are only just beginning to be realized by zoologists, and of which no living specimen exists in any zoological collection in the world. A skull of the adult gorilla is to be found in the Museum at Boston, having been sent thither by the African missionary, Rev. Mr. Wilson; and the most learned professors of Great Britain are now engaged in restoring the body of a gorilla lately sent them from Africa.

The peculiarity of the gorilla consists in its size and strength. It stands at least a foot taller than any known description of monkey; and its strength is such that it engages in single combat with lions and panthers, and overcomes them.

Monkeys, as is known, are found in most of the southern regions of Asia, especially in Hindostan and in the Asiatic islands; throughout Africa; and in South America. But, with few exceptions, all of these monkeys are diminutive in stature. The monkeys which are sold at the Cape, at Fernando Po, at Rio Janeiro, at the Columbian ports, and at the ports of Java and Sumatra, seldom attain a height of over thirty inches. It is doubtful whether any member of the family of Simiadæ exceeding three feet in stature has ever been placed in a European or American museum. Of the larger varieties of the monkey tribe—the Pithecus, the Gibbon, the Hylobates, the Orang-outang, and the Chimpanzee—it is doubtful whether any adult members have ever been captured alive. Monkeys of these races have been taken in infancy, and bred in captivity. They have been uniformly, as is supposed, stunted in their growth. Their character has also been altered. Instead of growing fierce and impatient of control, they have generally proved docile and amiable; whereas, in their native state, they grow in ferocity as in size. They have generally been short-lived.

The gorilla has usually been classed among the chimpanzees. It seems now, however, that it is entitled to constitute a separate family. It reaches the enormous size of six feet in height. When it is borne in mind that a man three feet high is, in respect of muscular development, a match for a strong man, one may imagine the force of a similar brute six feet in height and broad in proportion. One can readily believe the stories which are told of these animals assailing lions, and battering their brains out with stout sticks; of their assailing villages, and carrying off young girls in the teeth of their fathers and kinsmen.

The gorillas are gregarious. They live in herds, perhaps we should say villages. When other animals or men appear in sight, the females seize their offspring and fly to the trees for refuge. The males proceed to give battle. Whether the intruder, man or beast, have come upon them casually and unaware, or whether he have sought out the gorilla colonies with deliberation prepense to kill and murder, it is all the same to the infuriate quadrumana. Wrenching in hot haste a branch from some neighboring tree (if he be not then armed already), he utters a harsh cry, sounding like Aha-ha! and rushes upon the intruder. If the latter be a man, and armed with a gun, there is a chance for him; just one chance, and no more. If he discharge his piece at too great a distance, so that the ballet, however rightly aimed, can not penetrate the tremendous skull, then is the gorilla only the more terrible for the attempt on his life. If, on the other hand, the hunter wait a little too long, the gorilla is upon him with a terrific spring. In an instant the firelock is wrenched from his hand, and the next moment it is crunched in two between the monstrous teeth, just as easily as a donkey would bite in two a carrot. Next comes a terrible death for the hunter. The gorilla never forgives, and is never afraid. The creature kills his antagonist either with a blow of fist or club, or by a bite with those tremendous teeth of his, which can hardly be put to any honest use, seeing that the gorilla is a fruit-eating animal.

A NEW MONKEY—THE GORILLA.

GORILLA'S HEAD.

The Africans believe that gorillas are men like themselves, who would speak if they did not believe that they might be obliged to work. A sulky race of elders, in truth! ill tampered, and—though partial to young negresses, whom, it is said, they frequently keep for months together in captivity, and for whose society they desert their proper spouses—very fierce and implacable to man. Sometimes the gorilla kills a negro; this is regarded as an omen of evil import. Sometimes the negro is the victor. The corpse is not insulted, as it is not certain but that the gorilla may not have been, at some former period, a relative of his slayer's. His skull is cut off and hung up; Mr. Wilson procured the Boston skull from the cabin of a negro. The body is decently buried.

The contrast between the gorilla and man it as striking as the resemblance. The gorilla loves heat, and crouches by any fire which negroes leave in his native woods; but he does not know enough to heap wood upon the embers, and so keep his fire alight. He loves to suck sugar canes; but when he tries to carry off a bundle to his nest, he does not know enough to tear them up one by one. He seizes an armful with his long arms, and tugs vainly at them till even his prodigious strength is wasted. Muscular strength, courage, cunning—all the animal qualities are as predominant in the gorilla as in man; but when it comes to reason, the brute is nowhere.

The specimen of the gorilla which we now engrave was recently sent to the British Museum. On the 11th of September, 1858, Mr. Bartlett of the Crystal Palace, was invited to be present to see the cask opened in which it arrived. Upon the opening of the cask, in the presence of Professor Owen and other officers of the Museum, the appearance of the animal was such as to leave little hope of its being saved, and the stench was so great that it was found necessary to have the cask immediately closed; in fact, the animal was in such a state of decomposition that it required considerable decantation on the part of Mr. Bartlett to undertake the task of restoring and preserving the rare creature. For this purpose it was immediately removed to the middle of a large field at Norwood, in which place, for several weeks, Mr. Bartlett and his assistants were engaged in the operations required for its preservation, and by which means it has been restored to its present state. Mr. Bartlett was assisted during the whole of the process by Mr. Ashton, in taking the photographs and stereoscopic views from which our engravings are copied.

THE GORILLA RESTORED.

THE OPENING OF THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT.

THE accompanying illustration will convey to our readers an accurate idea of a scene which, once a year, is described to them in the papers. It is the opening of the British Parliament by its Queen.

We have preserved in our government some trace of the old monarchical ceremonial. There are occasions when the representatives of the people at Washington throng the avenues and alleys of the Senate chamber. But the grand pomp and ceremony, the state and magnificence, the antique forms, and the majestic usages which accompany the opening of the British Parliament are wholly unknown here.

In Great Britain, when Parliament assembles, both Houses organize without debate or delay. In neither House is the office of Speaker subject to the vicissitudes of party. The late Speaker of the Commons held office over twenty years; with ordinary good fortune Sir John Denison may preside over the British Commons for as long a period. Presently it is announced that the Queen is in the building. She is draped in the royal mantle by a duchess or two, who, on this august occasion, perform the office of lady's-maids. The Duchess of Sutherland—who in all probability never undressed herself without assistance—is very customarily on duty at the opening of Parliament. She and her associates fasten the royal mantle and pin it in front. They adjust the head-dress, and take a general survey of the royal costume, to see that all is in order. Time was when, in case of need—as in the days of Royal Elizabeth, for instance—dames were provided with needle and thread to repair any accidental rent in the garments of the sovereign; now it is presumed that on such occasions the Queen will need no seamstresses. When her Majo-ty is fully accoutred, she emerges from the private ring room. There Prince Albert, her husband, and her Prime Minister, for the time being, are waiting for her. The latter bears a gigantic sword, which taxes the strength of his arm; this is the sword of state which he is supposed to wield in behalf of his royal mistress. In our engraving it is Lord Derby who carries this enormous weapon; he looks all the better for having left his spectacles at home. Prince Albert, as usual, appears unobtrusive and quiet, with his bald head and jackboots. His function in life is to listen, and he has never been accused of discharging it unsatisfactorily.

Presently all is ready, and her Majesty is ushered into the House of Lords, all rising to receive her. She and her husband take their seats, and the members of the House of Commons come crowding in. A printed paper is handed to her Majesty, which she begins to read. This is the Queen's Speech. There is seldom any thing in it. It is a number of sentences without meaning added together without art, and generally composed without grammar. No information of any value is ever conveyed to the world by a Queen's Speech. Language, in this case, is emphatically used for the concealment of thought.

Our Presidential Messages, which used to be read by the President, are a great improvement on Queens' speeches. But how could Queen Victoria ever recite such a document as one of the Messages of Buchanan or Pierce?

The occasion depicted in our engraving has been as well described by one of the London journals that we make some extracts:

"The doors of the House of Lords were opened at twelve o'clock, and considering that the fair sex are in question, it is rather surprising to see the numbers that are there in time. In a very few minutes after that hour both sides of the gallery are nearly filled, and the dresses look like a rich band of variegated colors, which relieves the effect of the dim impressive grandeur of the chamber above. All are, of course, in full evening dress, though the labors of the toilet are at present concealed under shawls or cloaks, for the day is far from warm, and scene of the startled windows above the seats have been left open, making gaps in the succession of one line of kings.

"The persons arrive fast in little groups of two and threes, and after much bowing and talk with friends are at length ushered to their places by the messengers, and occupy themselves in gazing at that rich, angular, but strictly Gothic throne, now uncovered, and declining to view the only uncomfortable seat in all the House of Peers. It is not much to look at, but still it is sometimes used and would be hailed as an object of interest to the poor ladies who, by dint of influence and interest, have got tickets for the Royal Gallery outside to the hope of seeing the princess go through to the throne. It is now getting the persons go through to the throne. It is now getting full, and the ladies are seen, and the ladies who are seen are many by another group in the royal pew, and are waiting as patiently now, as they will presently be impatient for the chief personage of the ceremonial to arrive.

"At one o'clock there is a great and sudden influx of noble ladies, all superbly dressed in the fullest amplitude of the present fashion, who make their way to the body of the House, looking with something like disarray at the very narrow aperture through which they have to pass through which they are required to pass. In vain the messenger says, 'Very easy, ladies, very easy.' They do. The ladies are all smiles, but as immovable as Stonehenge, opposing a passive resistance to the gentle efforts of all attendants to officials who have to be polite and do their duty at the same time. At last they settle down with a great rustle, as an unknown Baron, with two new hats of crimson in his valor of arms, announces the arrival by the Earl of Allemarle. Through the glazed doors of the throne's chamber are seen the gold and crimson mixed with the rich uniforms of ambassadors and the great officers of state.

"An audible whisper runs through the house as the Duke of Malakoff, wearing his badge and star of the Bath, enters with his beautiful bride. The Austrian and Hanoverian Ministers, with their wives, follow. There is much notabilities, and these are followed by a basket of samarian poets, who sit and talk with the persons and relieve with their sonnets the tedium of the ladies' drawing, which now, at a little distance, much both ideas of the House resemble two rich parterres. The Sardinian Minister follows, making a stiff and safe or distant bow to the Duke of Malakoff. The Bavarian Envoy in walking down to conduct the Countess and Lady Emma Stanley to their seats; and in the rear of the noble Premier follow the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Salisbury, Oxford, Llandaff, Gloucester, Carlisle, Bath, and Wells.

"The American Minister, wearing the distinction of plain black coat, enters the seats reserved for the diplomatic corps, where his simple dress and his quiet expression and calm manner, and his self-possession amid all the rich uniforms and glittering orders which all around him wore, excited the admiration of several Ministers fellow with the Minister Hayti, whose though what is generally called a handsome man of color. Mr. Dallas, nevertheless, cordially recognizes and shakes hands with. An unknown Minister from some of the remain those of the smaller states next arrive. A diplomat in costume so exceedingly like the dress of the beau of Queen Anne's reign as to attract universal attention, and a sister of surprise.

As new visitors, a messenger enters rather in a hurry, and requests 'my lords and ladies to uncover,' at which there is a general bowing, followed by the appearance of the Queen with the Prince of Wales, who, with much and a great rustle and audible laughing, monitor and absorbs are laid uncovered, and the Queen takes her seat, effectually out of sight. There is a long pause of anxious expectation, during which the Earl of Clarendon appears, and who has for his motto "ne gronde rien," on gone. Repaid, walks up to the throne, and, after making a profound bow to the late Speaker of the House of Commons, the Marquis of Westminster, the Earl of Shaftesbury, and Viscount Ebury, the latter in the very newest robes of state. Again there is a long pause of expectation, and a groom come in that additional benches have to be sent for, though hardly a peer, comparatively speaking, of the liberal party is present. The Duke of Argyll is seen to enter by putting on their shovels, with as much care as such a fortive toilet admits of, by the doors on each side a group and the heralds enter two by two, having stiffly in their rich and awkward hands the rolls of parchment they carry thrown. The great officers of the household, in their splendid robes, immediately followed by the Duke of Derby with the Sword of State, the Marquis of Winchester bearing the Cap of Maintenance, the Duke of Hamilton carrying the crown before the Queen, at whom appearance all rise and bow.

Her Majesty was superbly attired in a robe of white and gold tissue, covered with a mantle of crimson velvet, with ermine, and the heavy folds of which were borne by her ladies in waiting. On her head she had the high crown of brilliants used on these state occasions, and her Majesty also wore the collar and jewels of the Order of Isabella. Prince Albert wore the uniform of a Field Marshal, and took his seat on the throne chair, where he was almost hidden by the Earl of Derby. The seats for the Princes of Wales, on the right, remained vacant. The Duke of Norfolk, as Earl Marshal, with his staff of office, either carrying the Great Seal, stood on the right of her Majesty. Immediately after the Queen had taken her adjusting her footstool, Her Majesty commanded the House to be seated, when the Deputy Clerk of the Crown had was dispatched to summon the attendance of the Commons. During the interval that elapsed her Majesty conversed with the Prince Consort, the Earl of Derby, and the Marquis of Westminster, till the silence was broken by a confused rush of feet, and, headed by the Speaker and Mr. Disraeli, the Commons appeared at the bar, and the tumultuous cagerness, assembled at the bar of the House.

Her Majesty then rose, and receiving the Speech from the Lord Chancellor, proceeded to read it, pausing at every paragraph was almost inaudible from the repeated "hear, hears," by the members of the Lower House. Her Majesty slight interruption, every word was audible.

METROPOLITAN GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

WASHINGTON, February 24, 1859.

I AM A MODEST LANDER, non cher Redacteur, or my hand would have been turned into a fist long before prunes heaped upon my Belgravian prototype and myself during the past week. Editors and reviewers, correspondents and reporters, in deploring the late Napier Ball, have each taken occasion to declare that there is no such thing as a ball-room now, or at most earnestness as some of the wall-flowers at the National Hotel enjoy that people don't talk about them as they do about a fair widow who is the belle of that caravansary. Unhappy gallivanters! Who, to read their plebeian ball journey small-talk, would even suspect their ability to chronicle fashionable life, or to describe the attire of those who are its ornaments? They do not, they best, I am pleased to admit; but it is very evident that they have never read Thackeray's Book of Snobs, or read that work which Thackeray calls the Briton's Bible, Burke's Peerage. Mysterious indeed are the mysteries of the toilet to them; neither can their unpractised eyes distinguish between real lace and imitation, or tell diamonds from paste. In short, these press-Hessians, who so sneer at "the Jenkins style," are but snobbish imitators, who obtain "items" in return for puffs of ballets, pastry-cooks, and faded belles, which they spin out usque ad nauseam. It would, however, be as easy for Mrs. Partington to sweep back the advancing waves of ocean with her broom as to prevent the flow of this literary slop, so I will not weep them with fashionable gossip; and I feel sensible of the kind consideration of my fair correspondents, failing would-be imitators.

The echoes of the aforesaid Napier Ball yet linger, in the murmurs of a rose-tinted sea-shell, and those who were present are now looking forward to Washington's Ball with pleasure. They expect to find in the next number of Harper's Weekly, The fact that the promised pictures will not be ready in time to appear in it will not make them far more valuable than the pictorial fancy-sketches which usually serve as illustrations of the sheets, of former festivities; and it is only to be regretted that you could not give the costumes of the night before which formed the constellation of loveliness. Cold and stately shoulders from New England, their cool brunettes from the sunny South, the jubilant belles of the Atlantic cities, and the awkward squad from Pike County, were all in a brilliant array at the grand ball-room in mammoth camera of Brady, who not only gives the exact physiognomical expression, but also keeps the exhibition of dresses open to the public.

Of course there are grumblers! It was a ball in which the Democratic party predominated, and not one who invented ten dollars therein had a right to exercise the prerogative of an Anglo-Saxon. Treasury gentlemen, grumbling at the absence of expense, grumbled because there were not looking-glass tables and gilt chairs; while Congressmen spoke of the "first families" grumbled because there was a lack of spittoons; deaf gentlemen grumbled at the lack of knowledge of the language of signs; fastidious epicurean gentlemen grumbled because they could not get a dinner at the ball; and, because the thirsty gentlemen grumbled because there was no thing stronger than Champagne; and other gentlemen grumbled because they had to pay five dollars for grumbling. Yet the ball was a success; and if Mr. Dallas will only give us a Presidential ball instead of the M.P.'s and the inhabitants of Belgravia, he also will doubtless be first at the departure. Mr. Buchanan was present at the ball, and at those who were there, were given on the Saturday evening following to the Prince de Joinville and to Comtesse de Surigny, who occupies the Carter mansion on Georgetown Heights, into which the Prince Napoleon moved on the departure therefrom of the Count de Sartiges. The criticisms of the Misses are not yet published, but the opinion of the Misses and their dressers, were amusing in the extreme; and then we had the home-comments of the Misses on the same, as they left the Willard Hotel, who is a distant connection of the hostess. Rainy days are the topic of conversation, as they are the only merry road to travel, those who were out on Tuesday last in search of a Collegian in the corps diplomatique have been the theme. Where turn will it next be? The Prince de Joinville, Secretary Cass's guest, had last reception, and a crush it was. The saloons were packed like sardines in a box, and the fashionable rout of Old Hickory looked grimly upon the degenerate Democracy, which has lost in the pleasures of this world all its former exclusiveness. Even my those who have just now started the old log Buchanan-cabin fire-side Democracy, with Tyler

House elm, are now burned. From this was derived the sceptre of the Pendletons, N. G. Pendleton having married a daughter of the grantee.

A second man, named Crear—or, as he was more familiarly called, Pa Crear—died near Columbus, Georgia, on the 8th of February, at the advanced age of 120 months, or ten thousand years. Crear, according to his own account, was an African by birth, and was brought to Louisiana, when a Spanish province, when he was about fifteen years of age; has resided in the vicinity of Columbus for more than half a century, and was, when a few months of his death, in the possession of his mental and moral faculties, engaging in conversation, like the Patriarch Abraham, on the things of his youth. He has frequently spoken of having been present at the landing of the Spanish flag at Natchez in New Orleans, besides other incidents connected with the early history of the State. As a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, his remains were attended to the grave by a military detachment of Covington, besides a vast assemblage of the colored population, who have never resided Old Crear in religious veneration, as the patriarch of their race and color.

Governor Seymour's birth-day was celebrated on a scale of magnificence. The old gentleman is nearly eighty years of age, but is hearty, health, and walks as great as a man of half his years.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

In the House of Lords, on the 10th inst., Earl St. Germans asked the Foreign Secretary whether there was any other person to fill the office of Regular in the Danubian Principalities, instead of the one who had resigned with the spirit of the country, and in what manner the new Regular would act in order to "protect" over the Union, to preside over the Assembly and determine the interpretations of the treaties of Paris and Vienna. He also asked if the Government to attempt to anticipate the decision in the Commission. Mr. Hammond said that the matter had been given no attention of the august duties. On the 11th inst. the proceedings generally were unimportant. Mr. Disraeli gave notice of a bill for raising money in England for the service of the United States.

THE "THUNDERER" ON THE THIRTY MILLION LOAN.

The London Times has a playful editorial on the proposed acquisition of money by the Secretary of the United States for the purchase of Cuba, and strongly commends the system to the notice of the British Government. It says that Austria has certainly deepened the sense and enlarged the principles of finance.

A MAN IMPRISONED FOR FIFTY CENTS.

A gold coin, not a new thing even in England, by the neighborhood of New Cross, Deptford, was, a few days since, taken in execution under the authority of a writ of the Greenwich County Court, and committed to Maidstone jail for the full period allowed by the law—forty days. The debt for which the man was taken from his house and a wife, in a delicate state of health, was the trustee's bill of law shillings and costs; and as the plaintiff was unable to pay the trustee's bill, and in the absence of thirty-two miles to expiate the offense of property by six weeks' confinement in a prison, for the merely rate-payers. The benevolent desires of the jail, however, would not allow him to be starved to death, and he was served with three meals a day, and was permitted to receive the visits of his friends, but exercised no control over his movements, and not only refused to proceed, but manifested a disposition to resist, when there was nearly recourse to take him comfortably home.

THE BURNS MONUMENT.

On the 25th inst., the prize pictures of the Crystal Palace Burns Centenary Inauguration Festival will vary much each other in their merits, and will be exhibited in the Crystal Palace. The Queen will send her portrait, which will be set off by a suit of gold, and will be placed in the centre of the gallery, and was quietly sitting at ten, when a mechanic came on the errand, and modestly asked to see the coin. As she had seen the newspaper announcing that her verse had turned out of the prize. The lady at once handed him out of it in the authoress. Soon then she has received the windows of the men behind the counter were filled with all sorts of great, celebrated, and high-born people —in short, she is the talk of the town.

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR'S SPEECH.

The session of the French Chambers was opened on the 16th inst. with an important speech from the Emperor. He announced by referring to the existing prosperity, stating that it was excited without any apparent and immediate danger; and after expressing regret for the latitude, and pointing to his peaceful policy as a proof of his moderation, he proceeded thus:

"To-day it is my duty to explain again to you that which it appears to me you have not clearly understood, or have been my principles? To reassure Europe, to remove from her mind all fear of conquest, I declared solemnly our entente with England, and I concluded with the continental Powers of Europe the series of new relations, according to the conditions of the treaties of 1815, which of their relations toward France. It was in that spirit that, on the eve of my marriage, I went to Bordeaux this declaration: 'The empire is peace.' I am anxious to prove by new facts that this word is the key of Napoleon the Third has ascended that throne, he would encompass a system of policy which has as its object for the purpose of defending great national interests, and with respect to the treaties which sanction them, but with my perseverance to consolidate it, and I have found, in the sympathy of the people, a support in the attention of sentiment of the army, and the devotion on the part of all statement, of every shade of opinion. Also have I thrown aside all opposition of rivaling irritability, by remembrance of the past, and by the moderation which has dictated by prejudice and the national antipathies of my own country. The union of the powers of order has not only have we acquired together a lasting glory in the East, but we have secured to Europe for a long time to come, as an immense empire to the progress of civilization and of peace. Thanks to this union, the conferences which at present assembled at Paris have assumed a character of the friendly relations which exist between the Powers all the guarantee of the maintenance of peace, and the congratulating myself on my relations with Prussia, which have never ceased to be marked with mutual good-will.

THE AUSTRIAN QUESTION.

"The Cabinet of Vienna and that of France, on the contrary, speak it with more reserve, because more important questions, and it required a most conciliatory spirit to succeed in doing so. Thanks to the moderation of the Danubian Principalities has not been compelled without many difficulties, to overcome the full satisfaction of their most legitimate desires. Soon, I hope, the question will be settled, and the great countries watered by the Danube, I should have given a great interest of prosperity and security to Europe. It is a great cause, and where civilization ought to be made to prevail. Unfortunately, there are certain circumstances that France and Austria should draw closer to find, which proved herself to be the most powerful, and is faithful to our policy during peace. The happy union of my well-loved cousin, Prince Napoleon, with the daughter of King Victor Emanuel is not one of those unusual but which some hidden reason must be attributed, but the natural consequence of the community of interests, of the two countries, and of the friendship of the two sovereigns. For some time past, in fact, the relations of our national position, where order can not be obtained by force, but by the moral power of justice and of liberty. This, however, is not a sufficient motive to give rise to the hope that I will do. Some may invoke it with all their hearts without legitimate reason, and others, in their exaggerated fears, endeavor to show to France the dangers of a new coalition; but I shall remain firm and invulnerable in the path of right and justice and of national honor, and my Government will not allow itself to be led away or intimidated, because my policy will never be provocative or pusillanimous.

THE EMPEROR DEFINES HIS POSITION.

"For be from us, then, these false alarms, these needless suspicions, these interested apprehensions, as peace, I hope, will not be disturbed. Moreover, I have not the usual course of your labors. I have explained to you the state of our foreign relations. I will now add that I correspondents with all that I have made known during the last two sessions, by the treaties and alliance, and, I shall better myself, find that my policy has never ceased to be characterized by the same principles. I have, however, confidently rely upon your support as well as that of the nation, to maintain the honor of the flag, to be ready to meet any danger which may present itself, and to be ready to meet any danger which may present itself, and to be ready to meet any danger which may present itself, and

FAC-SIMILE OF THE CARD OF INVITATION TO THE NAPIER BALL.

WILLARD'S HOTEL, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE NAPIER BALL—THE SUPPER.

THE NAPIER BALL AT WASHINGTON.

We gave in our last so full and so graphic an account of the great Napier Ball, which came off at Willard's Hotel, Washington, on 17th February, that we need only direct attention to the accompanying illustrations. They are executed from sketches made on the spot at the time, and may be relied upon as accurate in every particular. The Ball itself was a historic event. Lord Napier's career shows how much may be achieved by a British envoy who has the tact and the good taste to make himself agreeable to our people. Never has any British minister departed from our shores with so much of the good will of the American people.

NESTOR HALL.

He is no Somersetshire-man—I had almost said no Briton—who has not heard of Nestor Hall and the Mountstalls. It is my lot, and he is indeed of all Nestorian village, that very soon after the subsidence of the waters of the Deluge and the abandonment of the Ark, the Hall began to be built by one of that ancient race. Their sons should be among generations of the family in antediluvian times, but we will suppose, in order to preclude unchery of genealogical argument, that after the Flood it was recommenced by Shem and that Japhet Mountstall was practically the founder of the family. If ever Hall was completed in a single line, after recent experiences, he laid the foundation of his mansion upon a very lofty hill, with great quantities of the wood about it, especially serviceable for rafts.

In Nestor Park still stand these innumerable trees, many single trunks of which—carved with the rough usage of a thousand winters—would be easily afforded, in a modern all-world disease, with hallows excrescences and writhings of superficial agon—several feet high, and many feet in girth together, linking their outstretched hands, can scarce ring round. What circles of wood-smoke are they make for all, for Age to rest under and Youth to revel; and yet not shade, so much as sheltered smiling, for with a pattern of leaves so light that upon carpet such as never art portrayed. From this wood the Mountstalls took Nestor Hall—and, beside parish clerk and sexton as I am, I have looked forth from there more than once upon scenes of general festivity—that the country is seen lying beneath like an open orchard—lawn and village, wood and river, and the distance, between the farthest hills, a long dim misty line, which is the sea. Though that is several miles away, so dark and transparent was the air on all my life, from the turret I have seen through a spy-glass the white sails of ships at the peak of a terrible mountain that is even across the sea, they say, and in Wales. It has always seemed to me to be the whole kingdom of the resident over by Nestor Hall, and fenced but by the territory and kingdom of its ancient lords the Mountstalls.

They were indeed, even within my own memory, a race built after a kind of which we have no relation. The old man, Geoffrey Mountstall, sat a king in pride. I see him now, in his embroidered dress, as though he anticipated some cross or opposition (when, goodness knows, he had all things his own way—ruling, walking about, sitting as though he complimented the place by his presence; or giving the law in his grand old hospitality, just before the lawn, and preparatory to going off to sleep, like a fine old gentleman of the olden time, as he was, soft after his sumptuous custom of his endless line of ancestors. Some are born to work, and some to play, and Geoffrey was to be most always by; but I confess that in my too conspicuous boy, beneath old Mr. Hunsdrum, and in a July afternoon, when I have had my fill of dinner, I have felt a little envious, and desirous of altering my station in life, of being one or two, or more than one or twice. Had you chanced to call the Squire Mr. Mountstall, he would very likely have looked as you down: but to call him so because that time-hallowed name was Masculine, and was was to be inherited who took it into his mouth from the merest spelling.

When I first came to Nestorton the old gentleman had been a widower some years; but Geoffrey, Ernest and Beauchamp, and his only daughter, Eleanor, divided him at the Hall. Not that not which was the proudest of the four, but in those days I used to think that it was Miss Eleanor. Had she been the eldest, or even more than the haughty high-born beauty which she was acknowledged to be—she would have commanded downright uncanny awe; she had such terrible lightning black eyes, and such beautiful evil eyes. She was open-headed, and I think the best of her race; but there was a little blankness in the management of the pale-pink cheek, as if the nest was the masculine double of her, unforgiving, cruel upon the least liberties, and exacting, in return for a generosity, submission and lowliness enough. Beauchamp was the least rigid, although the most passionate of the four, and was, I think, perhaps the least unpopular.

In spite of which I have said against the Mountstalls, they did no little good among us in their unpleasant way. Poor men—not such as we, but those who are in the country poorer, since there is something like gentle folks themselves—suthers, musicians, and painters, painted—sometimes bad, and a helping-hand stretched out to them by old Geoffrey and his sons. I have known as many as half a dozen of this sort of folk staying at the Hall together at one time, eating and drinking of the best, and driving and riding the Squire's horses for all the world as though they were their own. The painters came in my way more than the others, because of my office, for the church was old and ramshackly, with ivy and rubbish about the big great tower—which afterward pushed it down, by-the-by, as I expected—and altogether such a building as delight your artists, who seem to care most for places that are become ruinous and dangerous to other people. "Gabriel Grub, Gabriel Grub," they would sing out at my cottage door—although my name is not Grub, nor any thing like it—"give us the keys, sweet grumbler!" They were a mad lot, and therefore I did not take much count of them, although I must say that they paid their fasting handsomely for anything so deserved, poor devils, to be richer. One Mr. Adam Dayntree, I remember, was a very fine painter. It was the inside of the church which he was engaged on, the sculptures, and the carvings, and what not, and I have a sketch of what he painted them, but, as it seemed, even to me, exceedingly dirty. I was not a bit ashamed to say it: "let no one disturb me at my work, and here is a crown for you."

About a score of years ago—in the June of 1838 or so, or it may be a year later—he had come for his keys one day, and in had I gone with him before, and was inside the building, when I had occasion to fetch from the vestry the surplice of a new chorister, who was to sing his first service at Nestorton the preceding Sunday, had left it there, and not his service for the time, remembering. The great door was locked on the inside, as I had expected; so, not wishing to disturb Mr. Dayntree, I dropped into the parochial chair, which was the one that chanced to be open, and there continued to get what I could out of the morning service, as I was being noticed. On my way under the north gallery to the vestry, however, I was surprised to hear Mr. Dayntree at his work, and I was surprised, because a witness as well as a hearer, my astonishment became confusion.

Miss Eleanor, the haughty beauty, the contemptuous queen, was Mr. Dayntree's companion, and, as I learned from her own lips, his model for the crotchet bride. That they had met there alone, and secretly, was evident to me, and was strange enough, but it was reserved for me to hear that day, with my hair on end, their open confession of love. I shall never forget the scene—I shall never be the scene or the words. He was drawing from the great figure, and she was sitting on a cushion near, or he had at least his easel and painting utensils opposite to it. His handsome face was very pale, and his eyes in their sockets like Miss Eleanor's brow and cheek the mid-day sun had entered full, and poured down. I had my first glimpses from the animated panes. Even in that very spot, within reach of her great-grandfather's—Sir Nestorius's—sword, and of the helm that had come forth from his monument (and I almost wonder that he did not, considering the circumstances!) with the very life-blood of her line, as it seemed, mantling upon her cheeks—she plighted faith with the young painter. They were to be married, and come together as he looked upon her transcendent beauty, to study and work together. Such a picture of splendor upon her forehead she was a very queen, and he her loveliest subject; that, with that halo of fiery round her, she was the very Queen of Love's outer fervor. And she, instead of withering him with her wonted scorn, or crying for help, and having whip the madman from her imperial presence, fell fairly into his arms at once, just as my own poor wife did, twenty years after that, for I was then no more, and was sorry enough, for my own sake, that I had not been dead. But I was not to come to be known that I had been privy to this without revealing it, the Mountstalls were not the men, as I believe, to let me live to tell the secret of me. It was probable, on the other hand, that I should not be murdered in cold blood, and that I should smooch as the first whisper of such a dialogue having occurred to one of their family would be sure to rouse the very devil in the whole race, I mind of fury. And then, to betray the generous young fellow! Never! I would sooner, I felt, let a stone rob a tigress of her feline admirer as cross him Eleanor in such a matter. My secret was not to be thought of, either, for my own sake, as well, and waited to see what would come of such a love-affair with great curiosity. I was not long reward, upon a beautiful summer night, Mr. Dayntree and Miss Eleanor eloped from Nestor Hall without a word to any one, and were gone next morning. She left a letter behind her for her father, and expressed her affection (which was quite too well for that), not asking any thing of his love and tenderness, nor appealing to her brothers for their good offices, but simply telling the whole fact, and waited to see what would come of such a step—after which she departed.

Geoffrey was a beautiful sight to see, when he came to the Hall. He thought of what suffering must needs be before he, it was the sole reflection which gave him any consolation, for the loss of which he lasted his daughter. His fury was such, when he learned of her flight, that it brought on a stroke, and he lay for hours speechless, with his eyes fixed, with his paralyzed tongue, to utter curses upon her.

He and his sons, they say, took a solemn oath together that they would have no more communication with her or hers as long as they lived. Mr. Ernest came up that very day to my cottage (terrifying me therefor to the last degree, since I made sure my secret was discovered), and bade me bring him the register, which I did not dare refuse to do, and with his own hand he erased his sister's name from the register, as if he would have made it as though she had never been born. His brother and himself, and the old Squire as soon as he was well enough, were seen in the country—how in public above their wont, as though they strove to leave the matter out, and prove that they were heart-whole and above disgrace.

We did not hear any thing of Mr. or Mrs. Dayntree for nearly a year, when some of us read in the papers that she had been a son; and very soon afterward the postman said that he had taken a letter in her handwriting to the Hall, addressed to the old Squire. Had the girl, then, forgotten years and of man her father in the last time? or had poverty bowed her lofty spirit so low, and so changed her heart, that she could ask of the hitherto spurned insult and invited contempt? She forgot not, neither was she changed: but she was driven by despair to entreat that for her child which she would have died rather than demand for herself or her husband. Like a true lit of the Mountstall blood, she argued; his grandfather and ancestors will suffer him at least to be nipped by the chin and kissed by his sister, and they are rich! If she could but have seen the old man's smile when he took that letter, and how he had it was about to tell us though he had read it—placed it unopened in an envelope, bidding his servant prepare the horses for the journey, and that he would indeed, though, and that gladly. The Dayntons were very, very poor. Miss Eleanor had wept, had not a shilling in her own right, and her husband's talent was not a thriving one. Presently a little box arrived for some to them, in plastic, fragile as flower, and another letter arrived at Nestor Hall—to returning.

The eldest son of the house thereupon offered, privileged, and addressed in a somewhat trembling hand, to tell that she was a wonder, and the issue of silence—she went to the length of writing their was now renewed; but when this letter came back to her like the other, it was not opened by the Squire, and, with her almost baby-boy beside her, set forth upon her bitter life-journey, unaided by friendless, and by no money or prosperous days to mock her.

About this time the Mountstalls of Nestor Hall began to thin. The old man died without repenting him of his wrath, unforgiving, and not even as mentioned his banished sister or her offspring in his will. Soon afterward Ernest died also of a strange complaint, the nature of which I which I am unacquainted with; only, because so many of the race went to the tomb in a decline, as the Mountstall fever. It is said that on his death-bed he adjured his brother Beauchamp to see that the will of his father was carried out in case after him, by any means, into Dayntons hands; and Beauchamp, as though determined to be the last Mountstall, was without an heir, married almost at once. His bride, though fitting enough in rotherhood to the old race, was not of their blood, and then, and by no means worthy. She had been the pet of her family, and when the young people, for the Hall, had become a wooing, she parentally said to draw that excellent prize out of the matrimonial lottery for Beauchamp Mountstall. In spite her seeming success, however, the young Mrs. Mountstall found herself, they say, very far from happy indeed. Her lord and husband was very serious at all times, and tender only by fits. His unsympathetical wife, who had been so making their appearance so soon as had been sanguinely calculated upon would have been ludicrous in manner present, he thought like a child, and anyway, Theodore Daynton, was already looked upon as near-presumptive heir to the Hall, and he was still with fury, and made very many persons, who were certainly in no way to be blamed in the matter, heartily resenting discomfiture.

What would have been mere vulgar life-temper in a person of the middle class, was set down in a strong proof of "force of character" and "impatience of circumstance" in a Mountstall; but we at Nestorton were certainly not disappointed in Mr. Beauchamp took himself off, along with his handsome wife, to the continent, for which the little afterward we had news of her having given birth to a daughter; but the family did not visit us again until the year 1850, when Miss Mary Gertrude, then a girl upon the brink of womanhood, was presented to Nestorton as the Squire's whose beauty, indeed, was failing Immediately: fairer than her aunt Eleanor—whom nobody had heard of for many years—Mary Gertrude was said to fair as she was good. It I seem to boast of Miss Mary Gertrude as if she were a weakness of which all Nestorton indulged likewise. She was higher-bested, placed more above all meanness, I do believe, than ever women was, and was not a bit proud. She came among the haunts of poverty and misery naturally and unconsciously as sunbeam. Her noblesses was discovered mainly in the grace that attended every thing which her hand touched. I see her now, with her parasol on out the rich red wine from the cellars of Nestor Hall, for the refreshment of a poor old woman lying in a broken jug, upon a widow-sill, a score of simple well-flowers. I see her now, under the poor parsonage, and how they have yet been really good to the poor, aunt have cried strongly in their number of giving, and how the poor people have said kind deed be lacking, is not lightly held, believe me; but the kind deed without the kind word gets indeed inadequate. Few of us have been such famous perceptions as dulled by poverty but that we can tell the difference between the two, and even the beggars by the roadside don't like to have churlishness thrown at their heads.

Thus Gertrude Mountstall was the idol of her lordly race who ever reigned in the hearts of those around her. Even my poor little boy was grieved for heaven twelve months ago, the dear young lady is now gone to her rest and more in our little cottage, and so I learned to know how good she was. Master Wilmot, the young painter—since Nestor Hall no longer patronized the arts—was then living at the Pig and Whistle in our village, instead of the Mountstall Arms (which did not suit my reach for his taste), and met Miss Gertrude under my roof for the first time. I saw how it was with him at a glance, having had equal experience of artist-love at first sight already; and when he said that he need call at the vicarage for help on Sunday, that the altar-piece was to very well worth studying, I walked a little way back with him upon his road home, and gave him a good slice of my mind. I told him how, even before, just such another pique, re-chap as he, and not so determined a looking fellow either, had carried off the pride of Nestor Hall, to the ruin of all concerned—" which," observed I, "young gentleman, shall not, if I can prevent it, happen twice. It was ill enough for Miss Eleanor, who was fit to hold her own wherever she was; but Miss Gertrude was another sort of a young lady, and I'll be your lawyer, sir, immediately—"

"A what?" cried he, flushing to his temples, and looking for the moment just like one of the Squire on old times, only with a greater passion than he would have ever shown. "Marry a what?"

"Marry beneath her," said I, coolly enough.

She's a Mountstall; I know the whole lot of them, and she's pretty girl good to please to wonder. Not, Sir," added I "I would not have slandered her to any man for any earthly purpose—" not but that Miss Gertrude was quite capable of making a blessing with her upon whomsoever she wedded," as I had in reserve to be a good girl, and she would, and went his way. Still, as he hung about the village weeks enough for the altar-piece to have been copied a dozen times, and as I had seen him speak to our young mistress without result, I made bold to tell her, one day, of my fears, and how the old man who was under greater obligations to her than he could ever repay, in how great a danger she might be lying. Her cheek colored deeply upon tell me one side, and her quiet, self-possessed reply another I will answer to my dying day. I cannot I knew Miss Gertrude to be truth itself. She said that if she had loved Mr. Wilmot ever so much she should not have given him her heart without the consent of her father; and that, knowing beforehand what his answer would be, she had given it to the young man as her own, and so dismissed him. For all this, I think, love concealed, "like the worm in the bud," as the poet says of our bashfulness, "preyed on her damask cheek," and was that hour which I saw her last. Poor girl, she no breast at home wherein she could repose her sorrow. Her mother was unsuffocionate; or, at least, in some unaccountable way, she was not a relation to nervous disorders. Her father had become, in three short years, grossly, surprisingly unsympathetic, able, from mental causes as well as from physical. The Mountstalls had been famous for their iron constitutions and their determined wills; but Beauchamp had been growing weaker in body, and more wretched in mind, for a long time past. The broken man, the hyp-hondriac woman, in that unpeopled Hall, must have indeed been cheerless company for the young girl. Poor girl, poor lady, nevertheless, which was always a labor of love to her, and was to her father's daughter even after their close in death, she seemed, with her quiet usefulness and undespairing ways, as though she kept the ark of the shadow over the Hall; yet, as evil death-bed. The healing spirit who was the old man's stern and unjustifiable ruler during most of his fear; he would let her go, leave him, and quit the house, as the cause of all his misery and disease. His wife, nervous and terror-stricken, vent about the house wringing her hands, and complaining that she was left alone, without a protector, and exposed to the persecutions of the little Lizzie. It was strange how even Mrs. Beauchamp, comparatively unacquainted with the family, yet dreaded this exiled woman. Her character, her acquaintance with the world, were known to her; the very lack of all communication with Mrs. Dayntree of late years, seemed to her to put a barrier during which the tempest gathers itself up for some terrible burst. The event proved her fears to have been indeed strangely true.

Upon the morning of the burial-day of Beauchamp Mountstall, when half the lords of acres in the county were assembled in the church, mingling—soon, and the transitory in the steward's chamber, with their mourning for the master, which they grieved so bad a man was dead, and so excellent a young lady his heiress; when hearts of poor and plain, were the day were, were thronging the park, and the mourning-coaches stood before the great hall-door, and the hearse, with its black sea of plumes, was awaiting its unconscious burden—Eleanor Dayton came.

Her coach was not of mourning one, nor its pace such as befitted a funeral. She sat in a dirty, second-hand chaise, with a broken-down old horse, which scattered the crowd to left and right, and routed the array of mutes and feathers. Even the post-boy would have drawn up before they reached the door, but the imperious woman would urge permit them on, and compel the startled horses to be backed out of the way for her. She was in gay colors, contrasting strongly with the sable and white array, and especially with her own stern countenance and malicious looks. Another carriage followed, with a female servant in it, whom she beckoned to come after her into the house. She swept through the entrance-passage to the great hall, before the coffin was still lying in state, and, with a cruel smile upon her face, bade one of the domestics who was there to say to Mrs. Beauchamp and the Girl down"—who were of course alone, in a private chamber—

"My Lady and Miss Gertrude?" said the man, in doubt as to whom she meant.

"Yes," impatiently replied she, "the lying woman and the cheating girl; those two. If they come not, say you from me, it will be the worse for them." And the man—who were of course alone, in a private chamber—

"Liar!" broke in the other. "Come hither in with me."

She took the girl by the wrist, and led her into the dining-room among all the guests. Her two companions followed, and closed the door behind them.

"Do you remember me," she demanded; "my name?"

"Yes, my Lord Trevor; and you, Sir Richard; and you," turning to a third person, "Colonel Somebody, whose name you Poverty, I at least, on my honor, after women strangely. Sir Eleanor Mountenhill, gentlemen—she that married the traitor. I was the girl whom father and brethren, and friends—oh, excellent friends! turned their backs upon, and refused to speak to or speak with: she who was left in the slough of poverty without so much as one hand outstretched for pity's sake to help her. Yes, I am the same wretched little angel-daughter died of Want, murdered by that—that—for whom you have all in a body pounded, but whose soul is in hell-fire. I am the widow whom he strove to wrong; from whom he would have her back. I am the woman who have kept back this inheritance by fraud. This girl, whom I have by the mercy of God saved from cruel and impudent that she blushes not even now, and in Irish peasant's hut whom Beauchamp and his wife have reared this long and peaceful as their own. For sixteen years and more they have acted this scene in the life-drama of a good actor for one moment did they deceive me. I tracked them and their wicked doings like a sleuth-hound over the very dust, and now I have them at bay. I have held the proofs of this thing in my possession for years, and then some one stepped in—you, I see brought with me, well know it, and that I held them now. I have waited—not patiently, because keenly, but I did wait—because I would see this month, year after year, for the day of retribution to arrive; and now, thank God, it has come.

Some score of years ago I was discarded, penniless, disgraced by the masters of this house because we could not—I say positively could not—as the least patience for the support of my ailing child. She died. Very recently I received a letter even on their death-beds; the last, that felon corpse under the worst. The law can not now reach him; but on for the woman his wife, who should have used so fairly, and fooled with, and flattered for his own ends, and then left to starve—left with a prison-gate, breathe prison-air, and reap, in all respects, the harvest of her deeds.

The whole company were astounded by these revelations, and by the imperious behavior of her who spoke them, but no one attempted to gainsay, or find with her in the least; the two persons who accompanied her corroborated all her statements; and I, moreover, was present when Sir Eleanor, Beauchamp, upon hearing that Eleanor Dayston was in below, and the matter of business for the payment of terror, confessed every thing that had been alleged against her. The furious accuser recommenced her tirade against—against—Girl—shatter!—chest!" cried she, addressing the unfortunate Gertrude, who, during the whole of this never once quailed before her accuser, or trembled in a limb, "you act well to the last, but your farce will be brought to an end ere long.

Innocent, madam, innocent; I will stake my life on it!" said an imploring voice, and the speaker who had just entered the room clove the interposing crowd, as a wedge cleaves driest wood, and reaching Miss Gertrude's side, took her hand and held it as a vice, encircled her protectingly with his arm. It was the young gentleman who had first fronted the revengeful woman, reflecting in his masculine features the same fierce determination which glowed so unmistakably in those of his companion.

"Theodore, Theodore!" exclaimed she, passionately, but with a perceptible vacillation in her tone, "cross me not in this matter at least. Heaven is my witness that I am—"

"Deceived!"

"I believe it, mother," cried young Dayston, for he it was; "I believe it, and that is why I appeal to you with confidence. Mrs. Mountenhill is not my mother, nor, as I am told, my father's sister. This young lady—who is as conversant with fraud as an angel, and who is of as pure and spotless truth from whatsoever source she may, than any who have yet ruled in Nestor Hall—is my affianced bride, mother, and I claim your love and protection."

Eleanor Dayston trembled from head to foot; in the issue was what sort of storm it was to be hurled, and from whose side it came, and was silent.

"My lords and gentlemen of the country," continued he, "if, perchance, in future you may deign to visit me, I wish this pitiful misunderstood to end, the time may seem scarcely fitting, to introduce you to the future mistress of this house."

The young man lifted his hat, and led Miss Gertrude to the stair-foot, on her way to rejoin Beauchamp, whom Eleanor beckoned him to forward her.

"I will go with her myself," whispered she, in a dry, hoarse tone.

Theodore raised his mother's hand to his lips, and kissed it respectfully.

Then he turned from her; and Mr. Dayston, taking his place in the formal procession as chief-mourner, fulfilled his duties, in the unavoidable absence of much feeling, I must say, with admirable coolness.

The late visit of this young man to Nethcton, under the feigned name which he and his mother then bore, had been paid without the knowledge of, nor without her knowledge. She had dreaded lest his propinquity might be the means of working in favor of the young usurper; and her heart was fearfully—painfully—at this return—assured that he confessed it not—that her boy had indeed fallen in love with his worst foe. Dutifully fond of him as she was, she could not bring herself to contemplate such a union with calmness; and being aware of the experiment of the extreme determination of his character, she had come down to the Hall to combine her long-cherished scheme of retribution during his absence, and without informing him of her intention. She had hoped that the wound which she had thus inflicted upon the girl would be too wide for the possibility of after-healing; and, to do her justice, she had strenuously sought. An accident, however, had informed Theodore of what was going on; and his mother, conscious of the clandestine wrong she had intended to do him, and not venturing to provoke him further, had victimized, with even opposition, as he was aware, to Nay, such miracles can a heavenly nature still effect, such power to turn away wrath has gentle virtue, that the incendiaried Theodore was melted in course of time toward her son's Gertrude. Her brother Beauchamp's generous nature, and her own harshly, it being indeed abundantly manifest that she had been but the tool of her kinsman. He was taught him to look upon the dwellings of the poor from other than the mere picturesque point of view. We in Nestor-vale have indeed a good cause to love and admire the young couple. We seem to have borne the whole brunt of their wrongful doings, and with considerable equanimity; and in spite of a score of legends to the contrary, the grand old towers still stand of Nestor Hall.

CAST AWAY.

It was a quiet lovely evening. I remember, and I had lingered upon deck half hour after half hour, and willing to go below, for I was not sleepy, but unseamar. My life had, until then, been so continued and formal that there was a delicious delight very nearly approaching to pain in the novelty and had been since the moment that I bade adieu to my uncle and aunt Dunbar, departed from the chaperonage of a fat, good-tempered Dutch lady, to join my parents in Australia. These parents I had not since remembered, and even from the circumstance of them was not happy; for my father's wife was not my mother, and family of young children had displaced me in my one parent's affection; so that this present freedom seemed like a delightful trip taken without leave. I was under my aunt's sternness and the strange uncertainty of the home to which I was going, and thought of others on deck besides myself, but of their identity I was not conscious, excepting one. I watched his figure as he leaned over the bulwarks, gazing towards from me, occupied only in wreathing clouds of smoke from his cigar, and I was grateful for it, and I had assimilated from the very commencement of the voyage; and I could not have told how far the giving up of my self-consciousness had tended to the balance of my regrets at the prospect of the voyage's terminating—a voyage of months, the end which would wander to where he lay, and he raised his wide-awake hat and smiled, and I was glad at the look, for I felt that it was intended to attract the attention of me. I again looked across the water, which, my mind's eye told me, was the sea of the Captain Conyngham—when my attention was diverted by that horrid Mr. Loring, who had unknown to me approached me, and stood at my elbow. One hates to be interrupted in a day-dream; and I am afraid I was not very civil in my response to his remarks. What he said I do not know, until my attention was arrested by discovering that he was actually preparing to take his seat beside me. I felt for a moment aghast, principally at his impertinence, and I should have spent an hour in my cabin rather than sit beside him until he came to a pause, as if waiting for an answer. I had always disliked the man from the moment I had seen him, and Captain Conyngham also disliked him; and now, as was said before, I felt that I was unreasonably set to hatred. He was dark, and strongly built, what is called a fine looking man; a complete contrast to Captain Conyngham, who was tall and slight. But he was waiting for a reply. I said:

"What should he have expect me to say to you, Mr. Loring? Have I ever given you encouragement to suppose—" He interrupted me:

"None whatever. It is unnecessary you from ever having shown me any kindness." I could hear by his voice that he my company—and no wonder. We explored as he proposed, carrying with us crab-shells full of water, in case we should find no nearer stream, and the remains of the meal which the men had left. Fortunately for us it was lovely weather. When we reached the copse we laid down our burdens, and spent the whole day fruitlessly seeking for some tree sufficiently large to live in. There were none but those of stunted growth. In the evening we sat down exhausted, and the chaplain said,

"I expect the only thing left for us is to endeavor to make a nest of the branches."

"Without any means of cutting down the branches?" asked Mr. Loring.

Mr. Hart relapsed into musing.

We had made a fire, to make the place look less gloomy, and my companions were buried in thought. As I passed Mr. Loring I could not refrain from saying,

"I am very grateful to you for rescuing me from Watson, this morning; indeed I am."

He bowed to me, perhaps forgetting at the moment that we were on an uninhabited island instead of in a London drawing-room. Then I felt embarrassed at his silence, and moved away. That night we slept in the open air; or, more truly, I slept, and my companions sat and kept a bonfire—for we knew not as yet but that the island might contain wild beasts. During the night it awoke. It was Mr. Loring's turn to release Mr. Hart. He leaned against the trunk of a tree near me, and I could see his face even through the darkness; for the fire was burning low. I was conscious that he was looking at me, and that one of his irritated him after a few moments, and he turned his back completely upon me with an impatient gesture, and sat down before the fire. He did not sleep the rest of the night. I was wondering how Captain Cuttle and Jack would bear it when I had been placed under Mr. Loring's present circumstances. I had scarcely thought of Captain Cuttle and Jack since I had been upon the island. While I was so musing Mr. Loring, as if in pursuance of a train of thought, rose to his feet, and with his hands impulsively up toward heaven, whither his eyes followed, exclaimed, "Perhaps I may succeed!" He flushed through my mind that Captain Cuttle's hum would not have noted so.

Mr. Loring had succeeded of obtaining boughs by climbing the tree and hanging with his whole weight to the branch—a somewhat dangerous feat, which made me tremble many times for the consequences, and shut my eyes so to descend. By this means we obtained a considerable amount of branches as a foundation, which were interlaced in the trunks of four trees which grew near to each other, and the interstices filled up with faggots. In this latter I could assist, and I never worked more heartily than when I was in some degree of fear that on the labor of the man who had done so much for me. But this bee-hive again is a wet, uncomfortable many days to make, and I think "them little hands" of mine were in a very rude condition by the time it was roofed and finished. I was overwhelmed myself at the amount of hard work I was capable of when called on to do it. But what was to be the end of all this? Were our lives here to be spent in this breach but, living on from day to day—collecting—and existing from day to day? Perhaps Mr. Loring had managed to make a sort of fishing-tackle, and had discovered various fishes which occasionally young birds ready to leave the nest, still crabs were our staple resource. Such thoughts as these would, however, often intrude upon me. If from my inner room at night, could hear him tossing restlessly on his bed of leaves, and now and then, by guess, to call one day Sunday.

Oh!—it must be acknowledged, sooner or later —how I loved him! And yet how I hated him upon me, I shut my eyes to the fact for a long time. I, who had declared I loved Captain Bingham, who was not worthy to tread the same ground with Mr. Loring! I saw my mistake—how entirely it had been a fancy, how I had made this noble gentleman, this true-hearted man, whose honest affection I had won, the victim of my imagination. It was too late now; I felt it each moment of my present life. From the hour in which I had shown myself in my selfishness unworthy, Mr. Loring acted as he had ceased to care for me. He had, with his masterly, generous mind, crushed his feelings whose object was unworthy; and had entirely succeeded. Oh! I was properly punished! I could not see an act of his now, that was not kind, even without being reminded of the value of the heart I had thrown away. He only asked me to be deserving to add to his comfort; and my only resources in avoiding his presence was in pretending to be. Our clothes, of so limited a stock, were continually in need of repair, and it was full employment for me to make small holes about the edges of the rents and draw them together with tough grass—sometimes with a thread composed of a dozen or two of my own hairs.

I ought to mention that, shortly after the departure of the natives in the boat, the dead bodies were thrown upon the beach. They were floated in by the half tide, and hence we took advantage of their clothes. Mr. Loring and Mr. Hart buried them in the sand, and the latter repeated from memory some of the funeral service.

But the lovely weather upon which I had congratulated myself began to change; and with the change of weather Mr. Hart became ill with a species of low fever. It may seem strange—it did so to me at the time—knowing all the years of complative happiness which I had spent—they seemed years of bliss to me now, looking back upon them —I had never given a serious thought to any thing beyond the passing hour; or if sometimes my heart would ask the question which ought to interest us most, I had ready means of avoiding an answer by diverting it. But I could not do so here. Every thing seemed forced home upon me, whether I would or not. There was no possibility of escaping to fly to; and I, who had my life through turned a deaf ear when churches were open and the Book of God unclasped, was, when deprived of all those things—now vainly longed for—compelled to listen.

Mr. Loring's time was a good deal occupied in attending to Mr. Hart, who soon became too weak to rise from his bed, he was very much alone; but, when we saw each other at all, Mr. Loring's manner was kind, and it was the first time I had been since we landed. As I was returning, one morning, from a little creek, whither I went daily to bathe, I found Mr. Loring busy in cutting a door-way directly into my sleeping-room. I asked him what he was doing, and, without pausing in my question, he rose, and taking my hand, led me out of hearing distance of the hut, and then said,

"I am afraid—very much afraid—that Hart's fever may be infectious. I think it best that you and you ran any risk until we know. You must not my more pass through his room."

"But," said I, "where am I to be taken care of?"

"Can not I," he asked, "continue to take care of him?"

"But if it is infectious," said I, carried away by my terror into betrayal, "if it is infectious you will die, and I cannot remain ill. What should I do? Oh! Mr. Loring, let me wait on him! Let me, at least, share the risk with you. I cannot die—"

A strange look came into his dear eyes as I spoke, and he still held my hand, and breathed; then, all at once dropping my hand, he answered, coldly,

"Of course; it is natural enough. But never fear, poor child! He will not leave you without protection."

That he should think me so utterly selfish!

"I did not think of that," I said, sadly. "I commenced, but I was unable to continue; and, sitting down upon a heap of grass near our hut door, I buried my face in my hands.

He walked up and down several times; then stopping in front of me, he said,

"It seems very sad that your brightest days of youth should be wasted in such a place as this; and I can not accuse you of any fault in it, that it is so for some purpose which will result in good hereafter. It may be—I trust it may—I will still some before long. I am convinced of it."

How little he knew! I could scarcely have received out cold of all comfort and society on this almost barren island, only with him, than return to England, under any circumstances without him. But I could not say it; and he went into the hut, in answer to a call from Mr. Hart, and left me.

I felt frenzied on the subject of fever. That I should not share it with him! I walked through the room; but I kept as close as I could to it, that we might at least run some equal risks during the time of convalescence. After a few days he told me that he had been mistaken, and that I might remain in my own room. I did so, but I went to see him; and, in my first transport of delight, I fell on my knees before him, and seized his hand. He turned away from me his face that I had observed on the former occasion; but he only said,

"Yes you remain with me, Ellen, if you can nicely a little longer?" Then, more gravely, "I am afraid, before long, I shall be your only companion."

I had, of course, a certain amount of regard for Mr. Hart, as a sufferer, under such peculiar circumstances, and I was shocked and grieved at the news; but it did not affect me as intensely as it seemed Mr. Loring. He shook with emotion; I had never seen him so agitated before; and again the startled look came into my heart that I had seen him do that first night of our sleeping in the copse.

Two days after, I was abroad in the wood collecting firing, my almost daily occupation. I was unsuccessful in finding any dry faggots into a bundle, when Mr. Loring joined me. He had been among the outer branches of the copse, and in doing so he could procure suitable for an invalid. He took the branches from my hands and commenced arranging them in a bundle. I stood by him, watching his strong arms doing so readily what would exceed me in any attempt. He was fully engrossed with his occupation, and I with watching him. I was a little viper cruel hardly of the wood and the chaplain's hut, that I could not move: my heart seemed to stop beating; I darted instantly to the wood-pile, and, without my moving, and I should bring upon him what I dreaded. Mr. Loring looked into my face as he finished tying the bundle, and said, "Ellen," in a smile was quickly changed into a look of alarm as he saw my countenance. "Ellen, my child!" he was hurried over to me. He started, exclaiming, "Margaret, what is it? Are you ill?" but the next moment he checked me, and added with an exclamation, "How toward him, and he held aside his chair; then, without speaking, on a dark spot. The reptile, glad to escape, glided away. I placed my lips to the wound: Mr. Loring tried to regain his seat, but it was from my arms round him and clung to him as if my life depended on it. We sat in this life-form for many years.

It makes me shudder even now to think of it. Then, suddenly, a strange consciousness flashed across me. I felt my face crimson with confusion, and I walked some paces away from Mr. Loring, and burst into tears. He did not speak to me; he did not even thank me; but he lifted the bundle of faggots from the earth and looked at me inquiringly. I was still in tears, but I was beginning to excitement. Presently he held out his hand to me, but I pretended not to see it. I traveled to look at his face, but had not nerve to do so for some time. Then, I saw that he was walking with his eyes on the ground, but looking inexpressibly happy. He seemed to have forgotten his distress about Mr. Hart. While I was thus watching his face he raised his eyes, when I withdrew them and, stretching out his hand again, he said:

"Margaret, I half believe you love me. Look me in the face and tell me so, before it is too late!"

I did look him in the face. I would have died, believe I cannot, I believe it from your very heart;" but I could find no voice.

That evening, as I stood at the door of our hut —Mr. Hart was asleep—he came toward me, and, without a prefatory word, drew me to him, with his accustomed protection, and, in a low voice, offered to me the meaning of his words, "Before it is too late." He invited me to receive from the chaplain died. The proposal did not come strangely from him, strange as it was in itself. It seemed to him what he ought to do, and, had he not done, Mart would die before I had learned to love him.

I did not hesitate a moment in my compliance; why should I? As he moved toward the house, I said: "Are you going to speak to him now, Mr. Loring?"

He nodded and smiled; then observed, quietly, "My name is Henry," and left me.

That evening we were married by Mr. Hart, who needed no preparation for the event. He repeated the date of adieu through the book. He drew up a sort of certificate, with a wooden pen; on a piece of calico, with some ink manufactured from berries.

After this Mr. Hart sank rapidly, and it was not many days after his death that Henry Loring and I were left alone.

These were days, to me, as happy days as I can fancy those of our first parents must have been before they fell. I could never have desired a change but for his sake; and it was with gratitude—feeling by on his account—that I hailed the message which one day he brought me from the top of the hill, and trembling voice, that a boat had put off from a ship at sea and was making for the island. "For his sake I pray to God that we may again in England" after an absence of more than two years.

All that dread life is over. I have only to be talked of to our children, and to be looked back upon almost as dreams.

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

Paris Weather—The Arrival of Prince Napoleon's Bride—Queen Victoria on her Royal Progress to her Daughter—Two great Balls—Fancy Dress Ball of the Society of the Faubourg St. Germain is like—French Husbands and Wives—Marriage—Husbands Left behind and Fish—Lovers of Paris Life to American Ladies—Mrs. A——'s Ball—The Ballet of Paris—Assembling of the Lovers.

I MUST say that the accounts last week of the appearance of pour January rather made me rejoice in that of Paris, which has been mild as spring; violets selling commonly in the streets, the flower-markets lively with all the early plants and gay-colored birds, and the most delightful afternoon quite too overpowering even with that thermometer at 50 degrees. Indeed, a French dress is with this we have little sunshine, and much rain and mud. It seems to promise to be fine and dry day for the arrival of the Princess Mathilde in a little bride; but this will not take place until three o'clock, that is, precisely as I write to you, as this letter must be in the post before then, and I shall have hastened with others to secure a good place in my favorite window in the Rue de Rivoli for the brilliant procession.

It is a great thing to have a real Princess arriving again as a bride in this old Paris, which, in former days, was witnessed so many such entries; and the thought of the gay preparations of such a bridal procession, are made to rush quickly back to old historical times, and deprive the present of the world's chances and changes—not that I have any intention of inflicting all this upon you.

The last arrival of royalty was taken to (I hope sympathizing) America the news of the brave death of the Princess Marie Louise, daughter of Queen Victoria, who seems destined to be as fortunate as a grandmother as she has been in her other domestic relations. I am not quite sure, however, any more than others, do exactly what is expected of them; but this proving a fine boy will, at any time, really may be called "doing it handsomely." The Queen's maternal anxiety is represented to have been intense; and when the telegraph flashed that requested that no telegram might be sent to Windsor until the result was known, I think that this was not obeyed; and the final happy message, it is said, found the good Queen upon her knees in prayer in her own private apartments. Great is the joy throughout England and wherever there is English blood in the veins; and the fine loyalty of his stout-hearted ancestors, and will find a historian as elaborate as Macaulay to celebrate his proved to his greatest progenitor.

There were two great balls given on the 27th, evening in the Rue-Saint-Dominique, and that sometimes dividing, sometimes uniting, its principal persons, and one of the most remarkable. One of these, Madame A——'s, I had no difficulty in procuring an invitation for our friend Frank. To the other I could not have taken the liberty of asking one, as it is a house peculiar in its exclusiveness, and I am sure that the host himself, if he heard that your correspondent professed to have been in his salons, would immediately proclaim himself a victim to the most daring cheek ever. I shall be unable to take you any more to these extraordinary réunions. Not that there is much to describe there excepting the indescribable, that stamp of refinement and high breeding which, is more remarkable in assemblies like this, without admixture from any extraneous source, and which particularly belongs to what is called "the society of the Faubourg St. Germain." Not but that the members of it get very weary of one another, and are enchanted to escape into other scenes and to find something new; and this is one secret of the success of strangers who entertain in easily securing a large proportion of the Faubourg St. Germain upon their side of the invitation-list cards. They may not go to other French houses than those of their own circle; but Russians, Turks, Germans, what not, may have them in crowds for the asking—and crowds they do. The rooms are large and well lighted, the music of the best, the supper very fine, and provided that they find there others of their own set, and meet a few of the members of their host's own country people.

These combinations are curious; it is astonishing how condescending they become, even to the allowing of their sons to give their sounding titles and aristocratic names to, it may be, rich brewers', "Jones, Brown, and Robinson" daughters—provided always that you give in return sufficient money to secure to those sons and their heirs the hereditary luxuries of their position, in houses, and horses, and carriages, and appearances. I have often been consulted in the preliminaries of these marriages, and have been much struck with the singular aptitude of the French for bargaining and old, or rather long, gains. No "knock" "check-maker" or Californian gold-digger could excel them in this.

A grand point in their stipulations generally is that the young couple shall be "en bonne odeur" (literally bridged and fed) by the parents of his bride. I have known more than one marriage set beyond hazard by the parents consenting to comply with this demand; and I once heard a lady whose son had married a great courtesy, and was only "bon pour encore" her son in every way provided for his life, say that when the young couple came to stay with her in the summer of the present Exhibition, she should expect them to pay "their own washing, their own candles, and bougies" (bed-room lights); and yet this fine Countess was not less than what she was saying was extraordinary or "chic," and she to complain of her daughter-in-law. Things will hardly be believed among you; but I speak from positive knowledge, and in the country of a land of exaggerations.

I do not know that all this is of any moment during these bustling spring days, or in the street you way, and there is a fair exchange of money for a title—food, and lodging, and opera-boxes for an introduction and a bow from a Princess's carriage! And I do feel sorry when I see my country women wasting upon their kind-hearted and really principles wealth of their warm, delicate affections. I am sorry when it is the young bride who is destined to the disappointment, for she is ignorant of what her heart can ever be sympathized with by the love of youth and of worshiping—how much she has bestowed herself; and when she has discovered this, as discover it she must, she can turn that the evening at second life, with the full knowledge of her own heart, may lead her to seek consolation in the social excitements of the world, and unfortunate liberties, who is pleased with their insipid flattery, and trusts their professions of friendship. I know, and others know perhaps, that she is deceived, and that he to whose she has sacrificed so much is in reality the best friend of her unworthy husband of his own, of the demi or sense other wounds, and with whom she has found a kind and natural sanctity, and the good dinners and excellent opera-boxes which he owes to her romantic fondness.

I have seen sorrow and confusion in these things, and I long to raise the warning voice and to urge that the sensitive professions of the heart is done so sometimes, and received for my pains what I perhaps deserved for intermeddling, certainly what my kindness of heart should have taught me to let me to expect—first the incredulous repoussé and super-lucid, and then the cold and distant look, and friendship of her whose eyes were not willing to be opened.

But I have been a long time arriving at Mr. A——'s, and it is not surprising, for the string of carriages reached from the Tuileries. Arrived at last, I find very fine rooms, with profusion of lights and flowers, a still contrasting bosters, crowds of pretty women and very handsome men. Among the "handsome and wife" at all the good halls of the Paris season. The men are now living in the French Empire fawn waiting for me at the door of the ballroom, that I might "tell him the name of the most beautiful girl in the room, and he would seek her."

"Did I hear her?" Could I introduce him?"

"Willingly," answered the man, with unbiased his direction;" but I must tell you that lovely lady is married."

He looked looked as if he could have gladly beaten me. The lady of his fancy is an English woman, with that peculiar beauty which is the very antipodes of expression to which the term angelic may be applied; indeed, she so much resembles it that the Empress has often sent for me to look at angels in the picture of St. Cecilia, by Dolaroche, which is in the Pantheon Gallery, and which is, I think, her purely and delicately cut the profile, so pearly the tint of the skin. She was dressed in a blue tulle, with diamonds in her hair, contrasted with a profusion of white tulle trellises; in her hair a wreath of blue forget-me-nots and the most perfectly looked very celestial. This lady has won many hearts in her time, and been the cause of no little mischief and many erratic exploits among her admirers. The Emperor himself admired her so much, and flirted with her so openly, two or three winters since at one of the balls at the Tuileries, that the Empress indignantly left the room, and from the tint of the countenance to a second. She has been married about a year to a scion of a lordly house; but her beauty is always as remarkable and as winning, and she must continue to be the observed of all, and to win random hearts like poor Frank's, whose evening was completely spoiled because "that young-looking thing," as he said, "was so absurd as to be married."

But when I get upon this theme of fair women my pen seems to run away with me, and that runs away with my time and paper, and leaves me with many themes untouched upon for another week. I would gladly know if "what is writ" is what amuses my readers. I have been so long a wanderer in other lands that I may fail to strike the chords which interest the attention or arrest the sympathies of the dwellers in my own; but here one can never be at a loss for a variety in one's topics. Adieu.

OGLETHORPE'S BARRACKS AND TOMBS.

We engrave herewith, from sketches furnished us by an attentive correspondent in the South, the ruins of General Oglethorpe's barracks at Frederica, St. Simon's Island, Glynn County, Georgia; also "Oglethorpe's Tombs," in which lie the mortal remains of many of his officers and soldiers, the first settlers of Georgia.

The events which give historic importance to Frederica occurred in the year 1742. In that year the Spaniards entered the spacious and beautiful harbor of Brunswick, with a fleet of thirty sail of Spanish armed ships, brigs, etc., and landed some four or five thousand "veteran troops" of Spain to conquer Georgia, and, if successful, to carry the war into the then colony of South Carolina, and annex that noble province to the aspiring diadem of Spain.

To resist this overwhelming force General Oglethorpe had but seven hundred effective men and about forty Chickasaw and Choctaw warriors. The enemy effected an unopposed landing at a place then called Gascoin's Bluff, near the south end of the island, on the east bank of the south branch of the Altamaha River, where it disembogues into Oglethorpe's Sound, or Brunswick harbor. The event, by-the-way, demonstrates most conclusively the importance of fortifying this accessible port on the southern sea-coast of Georgia, and establishing, with the least possible delay, the commanding position of a naval depot at Blyth's Island, recently purchased by government, opposite the beautiful site of Brunswick.

The enemy were commanded by Don Arrodondo and Don Antonio, and took up the line of march for Oglethorpe's spacious intrenchments and tabby fortifications at Frederica, situated on the east bank of the south branch of the Altamaha, near the middle of St. Simon's Island. At an early hour in the morning, just as a bright Southern sun rose above the outer islands to illuminate the scene of their utter defeat, the Dons, somewhat fatigued, it is presumed, by their hasty and early march through a tangling chaparral, bivouacked for a hot cup of coffee and breakfast as they entered on a spacious marsh. Here Oglethorpe's van of forty Chickasaw and Choctaw warriors and a small detachment of volcdtes opened a deadly fire on them as they sat on the ground devouring their meagre ration. Many left their arms on the spot, while others fled for the path they had left, and were rejoiced to find themselves once more safe at Gascon's Bluff. In the mean while two ships of twenty guns each had been sent up the river to attack Oglethorpe by water at Frederica. Their heavy cannonade compelled our gallant commander to hasten back from the pursuit of the Spaniards to defend his works at Frederica. He soon compelled the bombarding brigs to slip their cables and make all sail for Gascon's Bluff.

Meanwhile the Spanish leaders, chagrined by their rapid retreat from Bloody Marsh (the name it has ever since received, and still retains), and their ill-reps, which the war-whoops of the furious Chickasaws and Choctaws had nearly rendered frantic, set to work to rally them on a stronger line in his strong-hold at Frederica. They were crossing an extensive savanna, or prairie, in advance of Frederica, when Oglethorpe, who lay in ambush in a thick wood (where our church now stands), poured into their compact column a most deadly fire. Here tradition relates that Tomo Chichi, the brave and dauntless chief of the Chickasaw and Choctaw tribes, became personally engaged with Captain Sanches of the Spanish army. The latter threw a pistol and shot the chief in the arm. The Indian had just discharged his rifle, and seizing his tomahawk, cleaved Sanches's skull in twain. The enemy were again most thoroughly defeated; but our cautious General, unwilling to risk his fortune in battle, ordered a retreat to Gascon's Bluff and re-embark on board their shipping. Thus spread all sail for St. Augustine, and the Spanish chimera of conquering Georgia was forever abandoned.

In the tombs herewith depicted rest some of the brave men whose efforts saved Georgia from becoming a Spanish province, as the Floridas were at that time. Their memories, like their manes, have been forgotten by history. In a field in the rear of these ancient tombs—both sad hollow shells have been plowed up, and a lentil of them sent to the Historical Society of Savannah, where they remain unnoticed. These tombs are called Oglethorpe's Tombs, although he died in England. Their tenants were his officers, soldiers, or citizens, the first settlers of the country.

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

HINTS FOR THE MONTH.

THROUGHOUT this article many "hints" will be given for things which should have been done before this time; but as they are often neglected, we will take notice of them, on the principle of better late than never.

Whether the spring is early or late will, of course, have much to do with the progress of the season's work. Sometimes plowing can be done in March, but, because of the state of the soil, it may be impossible or inadvisable. Of course these circumstances will govern the applicability of many of the hints for the month; but we will begin, lest spring-time be before us; as it is better to be too early than too late.

Examine the farm, or a map of it, if the condition of the land be well known, to lay out the work for the year. We should consider carefully the shape of preceding years, state of the land, preparation, cutting, and application of fertilizers.

The week before last we spoke of some of the advantages of rational plowing. This is the time to decide which land should, and which should not, be subsoiled. We must be governed by the condition of the soil, quantity of land to be cultivated, and the ability to sow and plant in season.

Stock should receive special attention. Look well to good ventilation and the necessary warmth. Feed and water regularly. Animals become fretful when not attended to at the proper time, which prevents them from thriving well. Watch cows expected to calve. Breed them so that they may have a young stock than your farm is able to support in the best manner, or else you will be overrun with lean or quarter starved animals, of no exceedingly sparseness, and unprofitable. This is true of every domestic animal, from a calf to a colt or a horse. We have often seen calves of four months oldyard calf, as heavy as half-starved yearlings. A calculation of the food consumed by each, time at an element, quality and value of the beasts, will show which is the more valuable practice—starving or feeding.

Examine all cattle regularly to see if a chaff is on the eye of any of them. If discovered, take it out or the accident, burn a little alum, pulverize it, and, from a pencil, blow some of the powder into the injured eye. The chaff will be removed after one or more applications, made a sufficient number of days apart, to allow the eye to heal between.

Feed roots, water, and give salt to sheep regularly. Watch for infectious diseases, and use means to prevent injuries from insects. A decoction of tobacco, if used in time, will kill ticks. One bad sheep infects a flock.

Feed horses, carrots and oats to strengthen them for spring work. Groom regularly, and keep stables strictly clean. Many diseases are caused by unnecessary gases pervading the atmosphere of ancient stables.

At intervals, during this month, colts should be handled.

Feed to oxen and steers roots and other strengthening food plentifully, to prepare them for work. Handle young oxen at night work, easily performed, until they know the orders of the driver. If you have three or four years old without training, put rings in their noses and attach lines to noses of the ox, and, by the aid of a stout stick, lead them to the field. Then yoke them to a plow, and, by the aid of the stick, lead them through the furrow. Do this for a few days, and they will be ready for the yoke. Use those made of light and strong wrought iron. Those bent in by the tongs of the blacksmith are very apt to break. Do not be loosened or tightened, or if the cartilage of the nose gets sore, taken out or put in easily. Clean stables, barns, granary, poultry-house, and wash-tubs. The spreading of dry and pulverized muck over the floors will assist in preventing noxious vapors from pervading the atmosphere. Leave wood-ashes for poultry to dig in, and quick lime to whitewash and sprinkle over the floor.

With but few exceptions manures might have been composted any part of the past winter. Much time can not now be spared for this purpose if spring work is pressing. Protect those that are much exposed. Cart prepared muck and throw it on the liquid portions of the barn-yard manure, thence to the waters of the deep. If the season opens early manures will have to be carted at once to convenient places in the fields, made into heaps, not too large, and protected from drenching rains by a proper covering of pulverized muck. The glowing spread only so much on the soil as can be covered the same day, otherwise there will be loss by evaporation, and perhaps by dashing rains, especially on hill-sides, where water, washing the manure, will carry the best of it to the bottom, after the labor of getting it to high places, accessible with difficulty, and generally the want of liberal fertilization. All manures not used in the spring should be thoroughly composted, and protected for future use.

Examine out-edifices, and put every thing in its own place. Attend to peas, beans, oats, or other grain to be thrashed immediately.

The cutting of a full supply of wood, if neglected as to winter, should now be done.

Look well to tools, and see that they are in good working order. There is often much time lost in looking for a nut or a bolt when, perhaps, the hurry of work is most pressing.

Count flaw lists, and plow and ox chains. Do not be looking for them when you should be starting in good cheer with God speed the plow.

If harrow-pins are loose make them fast, but not with a wisp of hay, to have them falling out any where and every day, thus causing a loss of time to driver and team while the former is searching for them, perhaps all over a ridge of land, from one end of the field to the other.

Repair farm roads, bridges, walls; draw stone, and build such as are needed.

Examine springs and drinking-places for cattle, and put them in order.

If posts, rails, and brakes were not all cut, split, and the latter pointed, lose no time. Draw them, if extra quantities, to convenient places, selling for what there is enough of frost out of the ground for making and repairing fences, they will be ready for use. Remember this at a late date even causes the necessity of drawing them over spring grain, which is soft and rolled, and is a very bad practice to doing general farm-work at a proper time, which is just as important as doing it in a proper manner.

In next week's hume we shall refer to the treatment of grain and various crops, soiling for working animals, preparation of land for spring grain, planning land for root crops, the orchard, kitchen garden, etc.

CHESS CHRONICLE.

BY C. H. STANLEY.

PROBLEM XVII.

BY DR. B., OF PHILADELPHIA.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play and checkmate in four moves.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Dr. B. (Philadelphia). Your communications are always received with pleasure. Pray do not think us too practical to rejoice. In your last move private there is certainly no room for enjoying ——— "GERMAN" in answered by mail—which, by-the-way, is a sort of reply not practicable under ordinary circumstances.

R. (Savannah). Mate in SIX. Black plays 1. R. to K. 8. White replies 2. Q. to Q. 6 (ch), and still has the mate in four moves. Mate in SEVEN. Black to move. Key to the importance of the "Evening Amusement Chess Club," and feel obliged by the Problem received at the request of said establishment. Just mention, by-the-way, to our juvenile friends, that White Queen on King's 4th square, and Black King on King's Bishop's third, would bring certain royal personages so rather too close proximity to claims it with propriety as at present considered. ——— C. F. (Valparaiso). Mr. Paul Morphy's pre-eminence at the chess-board has not been acquired without the most patient and enduring study, despite of his natural adaptation to and fondness for the game. He first learned the moves, as he himself informed us, on occasion of the playing of the great match by Staunton between Mucklow and Williams, in Sicily, when his uncle, Mr. Ernest Morphy, likewise a distinguished amateur, was also present. He was introduced to the former gentleman, and was thus induced to take a personal interest in the South, and Master Morphy thought he would like to have a game with about the game. Eight will but be avenged the chess world. ——— Several Correspondents. Mr. Queen will have no further intelligence as to mere matches between Mr. Morphy and Messrs. Owen and Co. The first and most interests is left for him to do in Europe, and hope that he will receive as long ——— W. P. (Cincinnati). Received, verily. We are pleased to hear of the contemplated visit to Cincinnati of "Long Johnny," of whom Mr. Staunton thus Closes Chess of Brown? We do not see existing rule to the contrary, and think that the Problem would be applicable in this as in other cases. As to the Problem, the solution of position 2. Q. to Q. 6 (ch) seems limitation—any either fifteen, twenty, or thirty minutes. ——— Chess Player. "Long Johnny" is "the celebrated" will likewise effect mate in the required number of moves.

SOLUTION TO PROBLEM XVII.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. B. K.	1. Any move
2. K. to B 4 dbe check	Kt interposes
3. Q. to Kt 4 (mate)

(*) This position is susceptible of many variations; but the first, or key move, White must play, otherwise he loses for any subsequent contingency. If, for example, for 1. Q. to Q. 6 (ch), White should move the Black King's Knight, White would checkmate with Queen at her fifth square, supported by Knight at his fifth (if Q. B. 5 take f (ch), White mates in the same manner as that above given.

SOLUTION TO ENIGMA VII.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. Q to K R 7	Any thing
2. K or B checkmates.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, Feb. 26, 1859.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been more active for Flour, which has increased in value. Wheat has been in good request, and prices have advanced. Corn has ruled steady. Corn-spirit has declined. Provisions have met with a fair inquiry for sound new. Rye, Barley, and Malt have been unchanged. Cotton in small parcels demand at bungold rates up to Friday. On that day 1,000 bales were sold at an improvement of ¼ d. per pound. The market closes vigorously, influenced by the Liverpool Advices. FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Saturday, Feb. 26, 1859.

THE week ending to-day has been moderately active in business circles, and the demand for money has been quite as great as during the previous week. The great prevalence of country winds keeps many ships with cargoes windbound in port, and consequently many of the entries are light, and the payments into the Sub-Treasury small. The receipts on Monday last, for duties, range from 41 @ 54, according to the securities offered, and payments for the week have been about the best short paper is done at 6 @ 6½; and ordinary business paper, at 7 @ 8. The payments into the Sub Treasury during the week have been moderate; at present the Government has no pressing demand for funds to take up their proportion of the government loan late in course of negotiation at par.

Stocks are somewhat lifeless; Reading, Michigan Central, and Michigan Southern, the New Jersey roads, the Illinois Central, and Galena and Chicago among the speculators of the board, there is a tendency to buy for a rise. The Pacific Mail Company had their dividend declared yesterday, and recorded their compact. This has had a tendency to keep the shares in active demand, though very little faith is entertained in the duration of the truce.
